A great deal is being said these days, Mr. President, about the people's rule—about restoring the people to rule, which I had not observed they had lost nor they either, I imagine. I am forced to concede that during the generation of Republican administrations, which are now passing, the interests of the plain people seems not to have been the inspiration of our national legislation. As I have remarked, I have no doubt that the popular impression upon this question is that LORIMER should be unseated, but I do not conceive it to be aiding the restoration of popular government to substitute popular impression for the solemnity of my oath as Senator. The difficulty of inviting direct action of the people upon measures, under our system of Government, is the physical difficulty of presenting the facts fully and fairly, and of securing a general expression from the people, rather than any distrust of their deliberate conclusions. When they know the facts their judgment can be relied on.

Montesquieu, the prophet of the American Constitution, says (Book II, 2)— that the people under a republican form of government are extremely well qualified for choosing those whom they are to intrust with part of their authority, but are not capable of conducting an intricate affair; that the great fault in the ancient republics was that the people exercised the right of active resolutions, whereas they were more peculiarly fitted to choose representatives for that function.

Again (Book XI, 6)—

that democracies are subverted when the people deprive "the senate, the magistrates, the judges of their functions"; and when the people "want to manage everything for themselves—to debate for the senate, to execute for the magistrate, and to decide for the judges."

Clear-cut issues, such as the tariff, the Republican idea of revision downward, extravagance in national affairs, the election of Senators by the people, and other constitutional amendments—these, and yet other matters, are all issues which the people can and should decide, but no man can contend that the people of the United States have absorbed an accurate statement of this investigation from the public press, or that they desire to sit as judges upon this voluminous record, or that if they were to pass judgment, they had opportunity or time to read this mass of evidence.

Mr. President, day before yesterday I sent up to the document room to inquire how many copies of the hearings had been taken out, and I was informed that but 41 had been removed from the document room—not enough to supply half the Members of the Senate; and so far as I am advised not a single copy had been sent to any citizen in private life.

No Senator can evade his responsibility for a consideration of the evidence and an independent conclusion upon the facts; and for the consolation of any Senator whose conviction may tremble before the superstitious suggestion which has been made that every Senator who voted for LORIMER has been defeated for reelection I desire to call attention to the reverse of that suggestion. When I look around the Senate I am unable to find the brilliant Beveridge of Indiana in this Chamber—the first of the so-called anti-Lorimer Senators to "bite the dust." And where is the late vibrant Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Burkett? Where is my good friend Frazier of Tennessee? And how fares it with the worthy and respected Senator from Oregon [Mr. BOURNE], and my good friend the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BROWN], and the chivalrous PERCY of Mississippi, and that splendid old newspaper man from Iowa, Mr. Young? All these opposed LORIMER on the former hearing.

In this case the Senate is both prosecutor and judge, a dual relation that demands the greater care and hesitancy in resolving the burden of proof for a judgment of conviction. The duties of the prosecutor are done; you now sit as judges. And in that connection it may have occurred to some minds that the present tendency to criticize this body would be in some degree relieved by the expulsion of Mr. LORIMER, that your pride and the dignity of membership in this body would be protected or augmented by the expulsion of a Member enjoying popular disfavor. The merit of the Senate must be inconsiderable if it labors under such a necessity. There is enough and more of Pharisaism in public life. Col. Roosevelt declines to break bread at a public banquet with an American citizen, convicted of no crime and proven guilty of no personal act of moral turpitude, and chosen by the legislature of his State to sit in this body. He has not heretofore been so choice in his table mates. Un-American, undemocratic, and un-Christian charlatanry of this kind produces scoffers, not converts, to the cause of progress and reform. The same gentleman charges a large number of the leaders of his party with being accessories before or after the fact to grand larceny.

There is another fact in this case that should have weight. I do not suppose that as many as 20 Senators have read all the evidence in this case. Seven Senators were assigned as a subcommittee to hear it on the first trial, and a special committee of 8 Senators to hear it on this trial. Of these 15 Senators, composed of 8 Republicans and 7 Democrats, 11 have agreed in their findings in favor of Senator LORIMER and 4 only to the contrary. In the first trial the members of the committee, with the exception of Senator Frazier of Tennessee, were unanimous, and on this trial they stand 5 to 3 for acquittal, and of the 5, one Senator—one of the ablest and truest in this body (the senior Senator from Washington, Mr. JONES)—voted against LORIMER on the first trial and has entirely changed his mind after a patient and impartial hearing of the evidence in a long and protracted sitting.

This is the judgment of the men who have heard the witnesses, observed their aspect and bearing, and were better able to weigh their credibility. I have not the slightest pride of opinion that makes me desire that my conclusion on the facts, or the conclusion of the committee, be sustained by the Senate. I merely suggest that the repudiation of the majority report by the Senate would constitute a substitution by the Senate of the conclusion of Senators who have not heard the witnesses, and who have not been charged with the specific duty of considering it exhaustively, for that of your committee which has proceeded upon the unpleasant duty assigned them with the utmost patience and deliberation, and with that opportunity for weighing the testimony which is regarded as indispensable to a judgment upon the facts by every civilized system of law.

I heard all the evidence in both trials, the last covering about 9,000 pages of printed testimony; observed the witnesses, their demeanor, and manner of testifying; and I was not convinced, or reasonably satisfied, that LORIMER's election was secured by corrupt methods. I know that many people who have neither heard the evidence nor read it believe that LORIMER is guilty. I am sitting under my oath as a judge, and if I knew that every man in the United States believed LORIMER not entitled to his seat, I should decide the case according to my conclusions upon the law and evidence, whatever the result. Should I decide against my judgment and conscience, I would be unworthy to sit in the Senate. I would lose my own self-respect and be unfit to associate with honorable men. For a judge or juror to decide a case in accordance with what he believes would be pleasing or displeasing to the general public would show him unworthy to sit on the bench or the jury. Can any man, however honest and able, who has neither heard nor read the evidence, or who does not know the law applicable to it, be competent to decide such a question? Should any man who has not even read the evidence justly condemn those who have? If so, our entire administration of justice is wrong; our political convictions erroneous, and all functions of government should be left to a vote of the people. Until the people, in the exercise of their plenary power, assume the duty and right to pass upon solemn matters pending before this body it behooves the Senate to give effect to our ancient institutions. Among them is a system of justice which is deaf to popular clamor, entertains no presumption of guilt, and acquits in the absence of a definite and conscientious conviction to the contrary.

The people have not heard the evidence as I have. They have not taken an oath to do impartial justice according to the Constitution and the laws. I have. I can not render judgment upon their convictions, nor can they transfer to themselves my punishment if I violate my own. I would be unworthy of my place, if, for any fears of public retribution or disapproval, or for the sake of securing popular favor, I should disregard the convictions of my judgment and conscience. If every member of the Legislature of Alabama and every citizen of the State should demand that I should yield to the popular clamor for the conviction of anyone, upon their belief about the facts, contrary to my judgment, my convictions, and my oath as a Senator, I should promptly resign my commission and permit them to choose a successor who might be more willing than I to sacrifice his honor and self-respect for a seat in the Senate. I have taken no oath and made no promise to cast my vote according to the edict of the press. I ran before the wind of no popular temporary issue; I rode into this Chamber upon no hobby selected for political effect. I believe that the dignity of a Senator is not consistent with catch-penny platforms, patent issues, or maudlin generalities, and that my presence here is based upon the conviction of my people that upon all public questions my experience, and my record of service in the past, justified them in relying upon me to consider patiently each question in the light of the public welfare and vote my convictions. I am not convinced from the evidence that WILLIAM LORIMER had any knowledge or notice whatever that corrupt means were used to secure his election, or that his election was actually secured by corrupt methods or practices. I shall therefore vote against a judgment of ouster and leave the matter to the people of the State of Illinois, which, through her legislature, formally selected Mr. LORIMER to represent her in this body.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in view of the discussion that has been had on this case, thorough and complete as it has been in the Senate, I would not take the time of the Senate to discuss it at all were it not for the fact that on the former hearing I voted against Mr. LORIMER, and on this hearing I expect to vote to sustain his right to a seat in this body.

I do not think that it is necessary for me to say that my action on the former hearing was based on a conviction made up from the record in that case as to what a Senator ought to do, nor do I think it necessary for me to say that in this case my change of opinion has been forced upon me by reason of the testimony and the record made in this hearing.

I have been impressed as never before with the importance of seeing witnesses on the stand, hearing them testify, and considering their characters as they appeared upon the witness stand in determining the force and effect that shall be given to their evidence, and that has had much to do with my change of opinion with reference to this case.

There seems to be abroad in the land the opinion among the people that a vote for Mr. LORIMER is a vote to sustain bribery and corruption, and that the man who casts it approves bribery and corruption, and that a vote against Mr. LORIMER is a vote against bribery and corruption in elections, and that the man who casts it is the special enemy of such bribery and corruption. I judge this by remarks that I hear and by letters that I receive. I regret that there is such a sentiment throughout the country. It is not true. The men who vote for LORIMER are just as strongly opposed to bribery and corruption as those who vote for him. It is the duty of every Member of the Senate to so vote and so express himself as to show to the country that this Senate is independent, so far as a matter on which it acts as judges is concerned, of political clamor and political passion and prejudice, and that every man here votes his honest conviction based upon the law and the evidence, and to prove to the people of the country that this Senate is worthy of the Senates that have preceded it. We should do all in our power to eradicate the feeling throughout the country of distrust of public officials, of distrust of men in authority and in high place, that seems to influence the masses. It seems to me that this feeling in the country has had more to do with the situation with reference to this case than almost anything else.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, it is my respect, my very high respect, for the Senator from Washington which prompts me to interrupt him at this point. I know that he is thorough and honest and fearless and that his investigation into this case has satisfied him that the course he intends to pursue is the appropriate and proper one, but I must confess to a sense of irritation over the covert and insinuating intimation that has run through every speech that I have listened to in this Chamber on this case since it was reopened, challenging either the honesty or the integrity or the fairness or the courage of those who disagree with the Senator from Washington and his colleagues.

I have read this case through from top to bottom. I know the evidence and have satisfied myself as to the course I ought to pursue, and it is not in obedience to any public clamor. I hold my seat here as highly honorable as the seat of any Member. But if I am convinced, I will say to the Senator from Washington, that around the election of Senator LORIMER there is more bribery and perjury, more dishonor and infamy, than ever surrounded the election of a Senator to this body, it is my duty to say so. Clamor outside or inside of this Chamber has no influence whatever with me, and the rule of men here who arrogate to themselves superiority and control of the deliberations has no terror for me either.

I suggest to the Senator from Washington that it is worth a man's political life in this Chamber if he opposes certain elements who pretend to control our course. I have encountered that spirit from the time I entered here, and, undismayed by it, I propose to do my duty as I have the light to see it. The intimation of lack of courage is false, and I resent it both in the name of my colleagues who have reached a conclusion similar to my own and myself.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I was unfortunate in my expression if I gave the Senator just cause to conclude that I was referring to Members of the Senate. I was referring to the state of the public mind outside of the Senate, and I was just going to proceed to say what the Senator from Michigan has said much better than I can say, that however there may be those who may intimate that Members of the Senate will be controlled in their action by anything other than their honest convictions upon this case, I myself do not believe it. I am willing and glad to concede to every Member of this body the same honest conviction, the same conscientious devotion to duty, the same courage to carry out his convictions that I claim for myself. I want the declaration that he has so well made to go to the country that the Senators who are voting to sustain the right of Senator LORIMER to his seat in this body are just as much the enemies of corruption and of bribery as are the Senators who vote to exclude Senator LORIMER from this body. I am glad he made that declaration. I would like every Senator to make it because it is absolutely true, but those outside of this Chamber opposing Senator LORIMER seek to give the opposite impression. This is not fair, it is not just, and those of this body who know it is not true should say so in no uncertain tone.

I desire to say that so far as I am concerned after hearing the testimony in this case, after weighing it from every standpoint possible, after spending days and weeks and months in regard to it, after attending, I think, every day of the hearing except two and hearing practically all of the witnesses, I was convinced that Senator LORIMER's election was not secured by corruption, and being convinced of that fact I can not do other than vote to sustain his right to a seat in this body.

In saying that I want to repeat that I do not impugn the motives or the courage or the honest conviction of any Senator on this floor, and much less the courage and honesty of the Senator from Michigan and his colleague, for whom I have the greatest respect and in whose courage and honesty I have the greatest confidence.

There are many outside this Chamber who seem to think that those of us who do not believe Senator LORIMER's election was secured by corruption should disregard that belief and vote to exclude him. None in this Senate believe that, and they should so declare to the country.

Mr. President, this committee was appointed to investigate the charges of corruption in connection with the election of Senator LORIMER, at the request of the Legislature of the State of Illinois and upon allegations of the existence of new and material evidence that was not brought out on the former investigation. The former judgment of the Senate was not vacated, has not been vacated, and is not now vacated, and was not affected by the action of the Senate in the appointment of this committee, nor was the question of its vacation given any special consideration, although it was stated by some when the resolution to appoint this committee was pending that they would not vote for the resolution except because of the allegations of new evidence.

This committee was appointed, and more than 8,000 pages of testimony have been taken. In my judgment, not a scintilla of competent and credible evidence has been produced showing corruption in the election of Senator LORIMER.

The Senator from Michigan refers to perjury and declarations of corruption, and all that sort of thing, surrounding this case. There is no question but that there is perjury in this case. Perjury? Perjury? Perjury? Yes; but it is perjury on behalf of those and on the part of those who attack the seat of Senator LORIMER. I do not say that there is no perjury on the part of some who have been brought, as it were, to the support of the contention of Senator LORIMER. I think there has been. There is perjury on both sides of this case; but, to my mind, the question is, Was there corruption in the election of Senator LORIMER, and was his election secured by corruption?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When I referred particularly to perjury I referred to the testimony of Link, which the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] referred to the other day.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator it is my intention to refer to these particular witnesses a little later and give my view of their testimony.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They have been referred to. For fear that my statement might seem to be amiss, I simply wanted to say, if the Senator from Washington will permit me, that Mr. Link, before whom the alternative of the penitentiary or his home was held up before his eyes, committed perjury twice—first when he said he was not at St. Louis, and reaffirmed it on his oath when the district attorney told him not to add perjury to his crime. "I am not adding perjury." The district attorney reached down under his chair, took out the register of the hotel, handed it to Link, and said, "Is that your name? Did you write it? Were you there that day?" "Yes." "And why do you say you were not?" "I lied." That is his language, "I lied." He had perjured himself before this dreadful picture was held before his eyes, and it was time to hold this picture before his eyes and at least attempt to deter him from further crime.

I can go through the case and cite instance after instance of perjury. Far be it from my purpose to put this on the shoulders of the Senator from Illinois. I know that he has not perjured himself. If he had risen in his place in this Chamber when the charges were first made against him and made the statement that he made at the close of the last hearing, instead of inviting this investigation I would have accepted his statement as absolutely true. But it passed that point, and the details before us and can not be ignored. The attempt of men who had not been true to cover up their tracks, scurrying from place to place to avoid the officers of the law, shielding themselves behind flimsy privileges, was sufficient to attract my attention, and I have given it very careful study.

The conclusion that I have been forced to reach I reached reluctantly, because 10 years of service with the Senator from Illinois, in which our personal relations were most cordial and pleasant and honorable, admonished me that I ought to have some deep, substantial, solid reason for impugning his title. I think that exists in this testimony and shall govern myself accordingly.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator brought this point up, although I expected to touch on it later. Yes; Link committed perjury, and yet he is one of the witnesses relied upon to show that LORIMER should be excluded. The Senator seems to conclude that because Link denied he was at St. Louis, when in fact he was, is proof that he was bribed to vote for LORIMER. I do not question the fact that Mr. Link had a reason for denying that he was at St. Louis. It was not, however, the fact that he had gotten money for voting for Senator LORIMER. It was the fact that he got money, and he knew it, out of a "jack pot," or fund for retarding or advancing certain legislation in the Legislature of Illinois. He knew he got it at St. Louis. He was afraid he would be arrested for this, and that is the reason he denied being in St. Louis. There is not one line of evidence from the beginning of this case to the end of it that shows that Mr. Link ever received, ever was promised, or ever expected to receive a single dollar for his vote for Senator LORIMER, and the Senator from Michigan can not find one word in the testimony that tends to show that he got that money for voting for LORIMER, except as he may infer it from the statement of White, that he got money for voting for LORIMER and that Link was there when he got his money. Nowhere in all of Link's testimony and in all of his statements to the prosecuting attorney of Cook County does he say that he expected a single dollar. Upon the contrary, he swears repeatedly and states to Wayman, and Wayman swears to it, that Link always contended he was never promised and never received a single cent for voting for WILLIAM LORIMER for Senator. When it is conceded that Link got some money for some other reason, is it fair or just or reasonable to conclude that he got other money for voting for LORIMER when there is no proof to show that he did so?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. From whom did he get his money?

Mr. JONES. He got his money, if he got any, from Lee O'Neil Browne.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The leader of the Lorimer forces in the legislature—the acknowledged leader.

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The bellwether.

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The man whose name was to attract all other Democrats to his support.

Mr. JONES. No. I fear the Senator has not read this testimony.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do not be so sure.

Mr. JONES. When he says he has, I accept his statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Do not be so sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators should address the Chair before interrupting other Senators on the floor. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. JONES. Oh, certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I guess the Senator from Washington spoke hastily when he said I had not read this testimony.

Mr. JONES. I did not say the Senator had not read it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am very familiar with the testimony, and I spoke particularly of the perjury charge, because perjury attempts to cover up something wrong.

Mr. JONES. I admit that; and I admit that it was intended to cover up something wrong in this case, but it was not connected with the election of LORIMER, and there is no proof to show that it was connected with the election of LORIMER. Even with a perjury charge pending against or over him and with the promise of immunity and the assurance of immunity if he would connect LORIMER with this money, Link never connected him with it in any way, shape, or form, but continually said that it had nothing to do with his vote for the Senator. That is what he said to the last. If it was for his vote for Senator, why did not he say so? Why should he conceal it when he admitted that he got it improperly? When he admitted getting money at St. Louis from Browne there is no earthly reason why, if it was money for his vote for LORIMER, he should not say so; and when he persistently denies it it is the strongest possible proof that he did not get it for that reason.

I should like to have the Senator—and I will yield to him for that purpose—point out anywhere in the record some testimony that with reasonable directness shows that Link got the money for voting for LORIMER. I do not deny that he got it from Browne, who represented certain interests in the legislature. I want to say that there is just as much, yes, there is more, evidence in this record that the money that was distributed at St. Louis came from other sources than there is that it was in connection with the election of Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have gathered the impression from a careful reading of the case that the moment the inquiry into the title of Mr. LORIMER's seat was begun the scurrying among the jack-pot crowd began; and if those two things were not related, why did they all disappear from their homes, gather at out-of-the-way places under suspicious conditions, and then lie about having been there?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this scurrying to and fro, and so forth, began when the jack-pot story was published. This story involved the jack pot as well as the senatorial election, and that is what these men would naturally do when they knew that they had gotten money out of that legislature improperly. When this matter was brought out it was brought out under the title of the jack pot. White's story was about and connected with the jack pot, as well as the senatorial election, and they knew very well that this matter would be investigated.

I submit to the Senate—of course, if the Senator draws other conclusions from it I know that he draws them honestly—if it was not the natural thing, the reasonable thing to expect these men to scurry about and deny their presence at St. Louis, and so forth, because of their connection with the jack-pot fund, regardless of any senatorial election. I want to ask whether or not it is fair to disregard their connection with the jack pot in connection with these conferences and in connection with these denials, and to conclude absolutely that Senator LORIMER's election was the cause of it? The Senator from Michigan honestly looks at it that way, while I do not, and I am just as honest in my viewpoint as he.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want to say one word more if I may without intrusion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I tried very hard to dissociate the jack pot and all that followed it from the case of Senator LORIMER, and I was unable to do so. I think the jack pot was formed before the senatorial election took place; I think it was formed for other purposes than the election of a Senator; but it was the most convenient whip imaginable for Lee O'Neil Browne to use on the heads and shoulders of members of that unholy band to bring about the election of a Senator, and I connect the two. I do not believe that they can be truthfully separated one from the other. I even go so far as to connect this evil attempt to besmirch the character of Mr. Funk with the circumstances surrounding the election of a Senator, and yesterday a jury sitting in a Chicago court dismissed it——

Mr. JONES. Oh, Mr. President, I do not think——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (continuing). Because of lack of every element of honesty, although it was intended to blacken the character of a witness who had collaterally come into the Lorimer case.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Michigan if he believes that the fact that proceedings of that character were brought had any effect upon any member of this committee in the consideration of this case?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it was intended to terrorize a witness who thought he knew something leading up to the bribery in this case.

Mr. JONES. It was brought long after he testified before the committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I know it was; but it was to blacken his character.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator think that that had any effect upon the committee or any member of the committee in considering this evidence?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is the case of Henning——

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think it was intended to influence public opinion against Mr. Funk and destroy his testimony against Hines.

Mr. JONES. There is nothing in the record to indicate or show anything of that kind, and I hope the Senator does not think this case influenced them in any way.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have a very high opinion of them; but the committee did not know the character of the Hennings; the committee did not know but that Funk had alienated the affections of Mrs. Henning from her husband—the committee did not know their character—but somebody knew that it was not true, and the facts came out this morning, to the eternal damnation of those who instigated that false charge in order to bring crime upon crime and protect men who were close to the fire.

Mr. JONES. I do not know that I really ought to say to the Senator from Michigan that I gave no attention whatever, and that in my judgment not a single member of the committee give any attention whatever to the case against Mr. Funk. We made no inquiries as to those charges or the character of those making them. I gave no thought to the charges. We ought not to have to say this to him or this Senate. There is nothing in the record about the case to which he refers, and it is absolutely unjust and unfair to Senator LORIMER to connect him with it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the Senator from Washington knows that, so far as I am personally concerned, the fact that the Senator, after the second hearing, changed his views has not in any way lessened my estimation of the Senator from Washington or my confidence in him.

Mr. JONES. I know that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have been somewhat puzzled, however, to know how the Senator from Washington reconciled the position that he takes that the jack-pot fund and the payment of the money to Link and others is entirely dissociated from the election of Senator—the Senator may fully cover it in his speech—but I wanted simply to call attention to this situation, which impresses me very strongly.

It seems to be admitted by the Senator from Washington, and was admitted by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], whose discussion of this testimony was certainly judicial and impartial from his standpoint, that the charges of a corrupt use of money by Lee O'Neil Browne and of the corrupt payment of money by Lee O'Neil Browne to these people at St. Louis did actually occur. How does the Senator explain the significant fact that the men who received this money were Democrats who voted for a Republican, Senator LORIMER, and that the man who paid the money assumed to conduct a campaign in behalf of Senator LORIMER in the direction of securing these votes for him? There certainly can be no question about the fact that Lee O'Neil Browne, after his conferences with Mr. LORIMER and with Speaker Shurtleff, started out and undertook to gather together these votes for Mr. LORIMER.

Here is the man who handled this corrupt fund and paid it. These men have never explained where it came from. Link said he would not do it, because it would involve in trouble men whom he did not want to so involve; but the man who got the money from some source and was guilty of these corrupt actions and the men who received the money were the men who were voting for this Senator, and Browne undertook the job of getting them to vote for this Senator.

Mr. JONES. I think I will explain that as I get along a little bit further, although I will say this: I do not take a position with reference to the jack pot quite so broadly as do some of the other members of the committee. I do not believe there is any proof here of the existence of what has been generally known as a corruption fund, or a jack-pot fund, with reference to the Illinois Legislature. I do not believe that it was "reeking" with corruption and bribery, as some assume, and there is no proof that such was the case. I have collected nearly all of the testimony in the record with reference to a jack-pot fund or a corruption fund, which is understood to have been a fund contributed by different interests in the Illinois Legislature for the purpose of distributing it after the legislature had adjourned; and you can not find any testimony throughout this record, other than rumors and gossip and such, as I venture to say, you hear in connection with almost any legislature throughout the country, proving the existence of such a fund. I intended to submit this so-called testimony to the Senate, but I will not take the time to do so. It consists wholly of rumor, gossip, joking remarks, beliefs, and current newspaper reports, as an examination of the record will show. The specific instances referred to during the last 10 or 12 years to show the existence of such a fund really demonstrate to the contrary. There is one instance given with reference to an offer of $200,000 to the speaker of the Illinois Legislature for his influence in connection with a certain bill. That was a specific offer to the speaker of a specific amount, to be paid at that time, if you please, and not to go into a fund to be distributed at the close of the legislature. The only other instance, as I remember, was in connection with a traction bill. That was a charge of an attempt to corrupt the legislature with reference to that particular measure by the bribery of members, and not the contribution to a common fund that was to be distributed afterwards.

I am satisfied from the testimony in this case that there was no general corruption fund in the forty-sixth general assembly. The testimony goes to show that before the meeting of that legislature steps were taken to prevent what were called "hold-up" bills and "regulator" measures, which it was denied had been introduced in previous legislatures. Some of the railroad companies, which had been held up or claimed that they had been held up before, called Gov. Deneen to a meeting before the legislative session began and asked him to cooperate with them in resisting this class of corrupt practices and the introduction of this class of legislation. Speaker Shurtleff also testifies to the fact that, at the invitation of some of the transportation interests, he went to a dinner with them, where they discussed these matters, and asked him to help them to relieve the legislature from such a condition as that. So that when the Forty-sixth General Assembly of the Legislature of the State of Illinois met, it met apparently under different conditions from those under which previous legislatures had met. It met under conditions that the interests that had been contributing, if they had been contributing, to a corruption fund theretofore, had, as I think some one has expressed it, signed a declaration of independence, and they did not intend to be held up any more. There is no proof other than that of the existence of such a fund, and most of the witnesses said that all they ever heard of a corruption fund was from the newspaper reports.

I want to say that if the people of this country are going to accept as conclusive newspaper suggestions of corruption, there is not a legislative body in this country which, according to their reports or suggestions or insinuations, will be free from a corruption fund. There will be no great political gathering throughout the country, if these newspaper suggestions are taken as correct, that will be free from corruption.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. Does the Senator from Washington agree with the statement of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], expressed in a colloquy with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] the other day, that Lee O'Neil Browne distributed some kind of a fund at St. Louis to certain boodling members of the legislature in June following the term of the legislature?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; I will agree to that.

Mr. KERN. And if the Senator agrees to that, has the Senator's mind come to that conclusion from the evidence in the case?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERN. From what evidence—from the evidence of the men who received the money?

Mr. JONES. Well, upon the suggestions that have been made, some by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. KERN. From the circumstances of the case as developed by the evidence—is not that true?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. Then, does the Senator from Washington believe that Robert E. Wilson distributed another fund or some other money in St. Louis in July?

Mr. JONES. I do not think he distributed any other fund.

Mr. KERN. Did he distribute money there?

Mr. JONES. Possibly so; but it came from the same fund.

Mr. KERN. Very well. Then, is it not true that that evidence of the distribution of money by Lee O'Neil Browne in June and by Robert E. Wilson in July and the payment by Broderick of money to Holstlaw is entirely new evidence that was not conceded at all by the friends of Senator LORIMER in the previous investigation?

Mr. JONES. Certainly not. That evidence was all brought out in the other investigation and was all considered by the Senate.

Mr. KERN. But did not the friends of Senator LORIMER here in the former investigation utterly discredit that testimony as to the distribution of money by Lee O'Neil Browne and Robert E. Wilson?

Mr. JONES. I am not here to say what the friends of Senator LORIMER did. I do not know just what relevancy the Senator attaches to that matter at this point. I expected to consider it just a little bit later in connection with the res adjudicata proposition. The Senate, however, passed on all this evidence when it made its decision.

Mr. KERN. I wanted to get the views of the Senator on that question, as to what is and what is not conceded by the majority of the committee.

Mr. JONES. Some of the friends of Senator LORIMER, according to my recollection, admitted the payment of this money, but denied that it was paid in connection with the election. But it is immaterial, so far as I am concerned, what the friends of Senator LORIMER admitted or conceded. I do not recognize that I am here as a friend of Senator LORIMER or as an opponent of Senator LORIMER. I am here to try to reach a correct judgment as one of the judges in this case, upon all of the evidence as I see it and as I view it, and not as some one else looks at it, whether friendly or unfriendly to Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. I will ask the Senator if the Burrows committee, in its report, did not utterly discredit the testimony that sought to fasten upon Lee O'Neil Browne and Robert E. Wilson the distribution of these sums of money in June and July?

Mr. JONES. That may be true.

Mr. KERN. I am asking if it is not true.

Mr. JONES. That may be true, but it has no weight with me in connection with this case. I am not going to decide this case upon the testimony in the Burrows investigation, except as it may have to come in here because some of the witnesses then examined are dead. I am deciding this case upon the testimony in this investigation.

Mr. KERN. I want to ask the Senator whether or not part of the same testimony which fixes upon Lee O'Neil Browne the payment of this money and which fixes upon Broderick the payment of the money does not show that part of the money was paid to Beckemeyer as Lorimer money and whether or not the testimony——

Mr. JONES. No; I can not admit that.

Mr. KERN. Wait a minute.

Mr. JONES. But wait. The Senator has put one question and suggested that the testimony shows that money was paid to Beckemeyer as Lorimer money. I want to say that in my judgment the testimony does not show that a single dollar of the money paid to Beckemeyer was Lorimer money.

Mr. KERN. Did not Mr. Beckemeyer so declare?

Mr. JONES. He did not. After repeated attempts to get Mr. Beckemeyer to testify that he got money for voting for LORIMER he told Wayman that when Browne handed him the money he said it was Lorimer money. That is the testimony, and he denied to the last that he expected or was promised a dollar for his vote for LORIMER.

Mr. KERN. I will ask the Senator whether or not Mr. Holstlaw, whose testimony must be received as true if Broderick's testimony is false, did not explicitly declare that Mr. Broderick told him when he paid him the $2,50 that that was the Lorimer money?

Mr. JONES. He did not.

Mr. KERN. Did he not testify that when he was solicited to vote for LORIMER, after he said he intended to vote for him, whoever solicited him said, "There is $2,500 in it for you"?

Mr. JONES. I think that is the language Holstlaw testified to—that after he had told Broderick he was going to vote for LORIMER Broderick said, "There is $2,500 in it for you."

Mr. KERN. Are we not now discussing the question of whether or not there was Lorimer money there to be paid out? And if Holstlaw told the truth when he testified to that, does not that indicate that there was Lorimer money there to be paid out? And does not——

Mr. JONES. Just wait right there. I want to say to the Senator that I do not believe Holstlaw told the truth when he said Broderick said to him, "There is $2,500 in it for you." I will take up that matter a little bit later.

Mr. KERN. Will the Senator explain why he accepts Holstlaw's testimony as true on the main point and discredits it on this point?

Mr. JONES. I will give my views of Holstlaw's testimony a little later on. You can not find any important witness in this case whom you will not have to discredit on one point if you believe his testimony on some other point, and that is especially true as to those upon whom the case against Mr. LORIMER rests.

Those who are opposed to Senator LORIMER can not sustain their position without discrediting the witnesses upon whom they rely to exclude him from this body. When they say Beckemeyer cast his vote for Lorimer money, they say Beckemeyer lies when he says he did not do it. When they say Link accepted money for his vote for LORIMER, they say Link lies when he says he did not do it. When they contend that Holstlaw voted for LORIMER because of Lorimer money, they say Holstlaw lies, because he swore to the end he did not, and that it had no influence upon his vote. And so it is with all the witnesses, except White, upon whom they rely to exclude Senator LORIMER.

Mr. KERN. I had understood the Senator to say that there was no testimony here, save that of White, connecting Senator LORIMER's election with the distribution of the money. Does the Senator forget the testimony of George W. Meyers, who testifies that Lee O'Neil Browne, who was active in Senator LORIMER's interest, said to him, when soliciting his vote, that there was "plenty of the ready necessary" if he would vote for Mr. LORIMER? Does he consider that as of no value, or does he disregard Mr. Meyers's testimony altogether?

Mr. JONES. I hope the Senator does not think I have overlooked Mr. Meyers's testimony, because I have not. I may say right here that I think, under the circumstances, Mr. Meyers's testimony is very improbable. It does not seem reasonable to me that one member would go to another on the floor of a legislative body, without any caution or secrecy or anything of the sort, and offer him a bribe and go away without asking him to say nothing about it—and that, too, just before the vote was to be taken, nor does it look reasonable that Mr. Meyers would have kept quiet at that time if such a suggestion had been made to him. I do not know what Mr. Browne suggested to Mr. Meyers. I do not believe he made the suggestion Mr. Meyers says he made, because Mr. Meyers himself testifies that at the close of that conversation, when he told Browne he could not vote for LORIMER, Browne suggested to him that he go and see Speaker Shurtleff; and he said he went and saw the speaker, and the speaker asked him if he could not vote for LORIMER, and he said "no." Nothing more.

That was the end of the conversation. There was no suggestion of corrupt influence, no suggestion of money, no suggestion of place or profit, or anything of that sort. Mr. Meyers did not attach any special importance to whatever Browne did suggest. He was not offended; I do not believe he thought any attempt was being made to bribe him, and I do not believe any such suggestion was made.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. KERN. One more question, and I will not disturb the Senator further.

If the Senator believes that Lee O'Neil Browne did distribute the money in June, 1909, then he must believe that Lee O'Neil Browne committed perjury when he testified before the committee that he did not distribute it. That being true, does not the Senator think the testimony of Mr. Meyers, whose character has not been impeached at all, ought to be given equal credence with the testimony of a man who the committee concede has committed perjury?

Mr. JONES. Nobody has impeached the character of any witness in the hearing, except as the witnesses may be contradicted by each other.

Mr. KERN. No; but there has been such testimony adduced before the committee that the majority of the committee are now compelled to admit that Lee O'Neil Browne committed perjury when he testified that he did not distribute money in St. Louis in June, 1909.

Mr. JONES. He is not the only one who has committed perjury in this case.

Mr. KERN. That is true.

Mr. JONES. The case of those against Senator LORIMER is based and buttressed on perjury, and nothing else. White is a perjurer time and again, and the Senator must admit it. Beckemeyer was a perjurer time and again; everyone must admit it. Link was a perjurer, and all must admit it. Holstlaw perjured himself before the committee time and again, and no one will deny it.

So it is with practically all of these important witnesses. They are not entitled to belief to any extent. Therefore, when men like these were confronted with indictments and threatened with prosecutions for perjury, and they were told, or it was suggested to them, "If you will connect LORIMER with this case, we will dismiss these indictments," it would be expected that every one of them would jump at that bait to save himself.

These are the men upon whose testimony we are to exclude Senator LORIMER from this body. These are the methods pursued to get their testimony. They have confessed to bribery in one form or another. They have admitted perjury, but none have been prosecuted for any of these confessed crimes.

Think of it, Members of the Senate—and I hope the country will consider it when it thinks calmly of this case. Link admits that he got money in connection with corrupt practices in the legislature. He admits perjury. He never has been prosecuted. White admits that he got money in connection with corrupt practices. He says he was bribed to vote for LORIMER. He says he was to get money from the "jack pot" and he says he got it. He never has been prosecuted. He has never even been indicted. Beckemeyer admits that he got money for corrupt practices in connection with the legislature. He admits perjury. He never has been prosecuted. It is claimed that Luke got money for corrupt practices and for bribery, but he was never prosecuted. It is claimed that Shephard got money in the same corrupt way. He goes scot-free. It is claimed that Clark got money corruptly. He never was prosecuted. It is claimed that Holstlaw admits he got money. He admitted it under the pressure of an indictment for perjury and under insinuations and intimations that if he would connect LORIMER with the matter he would get an immunity bath, and he got it. He never has been prosecuted from that day to this, either in connection with the deal in which he admits he was corruptly engaged or in connection with the Lorimer matter or for admitted perjury. No one was prosecuted and brought to trial but Lee O'Neil Browne. All these men went scot-free in order to get evidence against Browne; because it was felt that Browne's conviction insured LORIMER's exclusion from this body. Browne was acquitted by a jury of 12 American citizens sworn to try the case on the law and the evidence. That counts for nothing, however, and, according to some, our jury system is a farce. Really, is it any wonder that a jury, believing in a "square deal," as all Americans do, should refuse to convict a man on the evidence of such men as White and Beckemeyer?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator further yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. KERN. If the Senator believes that all these men who were in St. Louis in June and July were perjurers, and their testimony before the committee was perjured testimony, utterly unreliable and unworthy of belief, where is the testimony upon which the Senator from Washington and the Senator from Vermont base their asseveration to the Senate that Lee O'Neil Browne did distribute money in June, 1909, and that Robert E. Wilson distributed money? The Senator says the testimony to that effect is false; that it is the testimony of perjurers. Yet two members of the committee come here and state before the Senate that they have no doubt Lee O'Neil Browne did distribute that money.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I did not say their testimony in that respect was false and I did not say I had no doubt about it.

Mr. KERN. Oh!

Mr. JONES. I did not say that. I am willing to concede it for the purposes of this case. I will say frankly to the Senate that I have some doubt about it, but I am willing to concede it for the purposes of this case for the reason that, in my judgment, there is no testimony anywhere in this record that connects Senator LORIMER or his election with that transaction. On the contrary, I think it clearly appears throughout the testimony that these men connected Senator LORIMER with it in order to secure immunity from prosecution for their own crimes. There were some of them, whatever else may be said about them, who were brave enough and honest enough not to go so far as to connect Senator LORIMER with it. Beckemeyer and Holstlaw are the only two men aside from White who connect Senator LORIMER with this matter at all; and right here I will point out how I think it happened that Beckemeyer connected LORIMER with it.

On the former hearing of this case I did not attach any importance whatever to the contention that these witnesses had been forced to testify as they did by what are known as "third-degree" methods on the part of the prosecuting attorney of Cook County. I assumed that they were men of ability, men of courage, men of more than ordinary sense and judgment, and that they would not be influenced or browbeaten by any prosecuting attorney. I have changed my mind in that respect. I saw Beckemeyer on the stand—a weak, vacillating, nervous, fearful, easily controlled and easily frightened man—he is the very kind of man that the methods pursued by the prosecuting attorney of Cook County would influence and affect wrongly.

I do not condemn the prosecuting attorney of Cook County. I suppose he did not do any more than any other prosecuting attorney with his ability and energy would have done under the circumstances. He was endeavoring to convict somebody. He was endeavoring to convict Lee O'Neil Browne. I do not question his motives at all. Charges against Lee O'Neil Browne had been brought to his attention in connection with LORIMER's election and he was trying to prove them and convict Browne as the most effective way to discredit LORIMER. He was doing his duty as he saw it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does the Senator indorse the statement which, as I recall, was practically made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], that Mr. Wayman practically put words into the mouths of Link and these other witnesses, told them that they must swear to them, and undertook to dictate to them the things they must say in order to secure the immunity that was granted to them? Is there anything in the record that sustains any such charge?

Mr. JONES. I do not know that I would go quite that far, although the record will very nearly sustain such a charge. We do not all view these things alike. We do not all attach the same importance to a suggestion or a statement in the testimony. The Senator from North Dakota may be satisfied in his mind that that is a correct statement. I would hardly go that far myself. But I do say that the prosecuting attorney of Cook County, who is a very forceful man, a very strong man, a man of domineering manner that would affect a man like Beckemeyer in that way, pressed Beckemeyer and Luke and Link very strongly, and, I think, made it plain to them what he wanted and what statements from them would bring them immunity. I do not say he wanted them to lie, but he wanted them to tell what he thought was the truth, and if they said that they would get immunity. That Beckemeyer lied to get immunity, I have no doubt.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, it has always seemed to me that that was a very serious charge to make against a prosecuting attorney—that he was going so far to make a case in this matter that he was compelling these men to swear to falsehoods in order to secure immunity, and was practically putting in their mouths the words which he insisted they should utter in order to secure immunity.

I must say that I examined with care the testimony in the former record and in this record with a view to ascertaining whether or not such a charge was well founded. I read Wayman's testimony and all the testimony, and it does seem to me that the charge is without foundation. It seems to me that the utmost the record shows the State's attorney insisted on was that they should tell the truth; not, as the Senator from North Dakota seems to assert, that they should tell only part of the truth and withhold part of it, except as there was involved a conflict of jurisdiction between Sangamon County and Cook County.

I should like to know where the testimony is upon which the charge is made that the State's attorney of Cook County imposed as a condition that these men should testify to falsehoods in order to secure immunity.

Mr. JONES. I do not make that charge myself, and I do not propose to go into the record here with reference to all the testimony in this respect. I want to say, as I said before, Mr. Wayman is a very forceful man and would, no doubt, be considered by a weak man like Beckemeyer as very domineering. I have no doubt that he went after Beckemeyer hard and strong, and Beckemeyer was what we term browbeaten or "third degreed." This is the situation with reference to Beckemeyer. Beckemeyer had denied that he was at St. Louis, as I remember it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. In reply to the suggestion made by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] that he saw nothing in the testimony that would show any attempt upon the part of the State's attorney to secure less than full evidence, let me ask the Senator from Washington if time and again the State's attorney did not request Mr. Link not to answer certain questions before the grand jury because they would incriminate him?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the basis was not because of lack of jurisdiction but because if he went beyond a certain matter it would incriminate him, and that, as a matter of fact, he should not be incriminated any more than he was.

Mr. JONES. There is no question about that. The Senator from South Dakota, I think, concedes that.

Now, as to Beckemeyer, I am going to point out right here why I think Beckemeyer connected LORIMER with this money. Beckemeyer was at St. Louis. He denied that. He was indicted for perjury. That was the point. He was brought up to Chicago. He was taken before the grand jury, and he denied that he was at St. Louis. An indictment was brought against him. Then it was suggested that he could tell something else. He went before the grand jury again, and he told a little bit more. Finally, after he had been before the grand jury about three times, he told the grand jury that he was at St. Louis; that he had received a thousand dollars from Browne and $900 from Wilson. But this did not relieve him. This did not take away the indictment. This was not enough. Apparently the prosecuting attorney did not give him any hope of immunity. He had not gone far enough. He had not yet connected LORIMER with either transaction. His sick wife was held up before him, and the result that would come to him in his family relation in case this indictment was made public and he was prosecuted under it weighed upon his mind.

I am not going to tell the Senate how he was taken to saloons and other houses, how he was taken by the officers and all sorts of influences brought to bear upon him; but he could not get immunity for what he had said thus far. He no doubt had heard and knew that they were trying to convict Browne of bribery, not in connection with corrupt purposes in the legislature, but in connection with the election of LORIMER. He was a lawyer. He knew what was wanted. So he no doubt said to himself: "If I will connect LORIMER with this matter, then I think that will get me release." He then went into Mr. Wayman's office and told Mr. Wayman that when Browne gave him a thousand dollars he said, "This is Lorimer money"; and that secured him immunity. He was permitted to go home immediately. That was what was wanted.

I want to say that from his manner on the stand, and judging of him as the man he appeared to be, and from all the circumstances, I have no doubt in my mind that Beckemeyer connected LORIMER with that thousand dollars for the sole purpose and in the hope of securing immunity, and for no other reason whatever.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KERN. Was not that proposition expressly negatived by Mr. Wayman and his assistants in the office?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Wayman testifies that Mr. Beckemeyer did not say at any of the three times he appeared before the grand jury that anything was said about LORIMER when this money was handed to him by Browne, but that he told it to him in his office after he had been before the grand jury three times, and then he let him go home.

Mr. KERN. No; Mr. President, that was not my question. My question is whether or not Mr. Wayman and his assistants did not expressly and explicitly negative the idea that this man had been coerced by any word or promise on their part.

Mr. JONES. Oh, Mr. President, I have a right to form my judgment as to the testimony in this case and the effect of it. It is not denied by Mr. Wayman that what I have said is the truth. Of course, Mr. Wayman would deny that he coerced Mr. Beckemeyer; but I want to say that, taking Mr. Beckemeyer as he is and Mr. Wayman as he is, the circumstances that I have related were the very strongest possible coercion that could be brought upon Beckemeyer.

I do not question the honest judgment of other Senators who do not look at this matter as I do, but I will state my conclusion. From all the evidence and circumstances I am firmly convinced that Beckemeyer connected LORIMER with that thousand dollars simply and solely for the purpose of getting immunity.

Take Link. He was dead before this committee started its investigation, and we had to take the testimony on the other hearing. My recollection is that he first denied he was at St. Louis. Then he was threatened with an indictment. I believe he was not indicted for perjury, but he was threatened with an indictment. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] read the testimony in regard to the matter. But with all the suggestions that were made to him, with all the inducements that were held out to him, he did not connect LORIMER in any way, shape, or form with this money, but he denied it time and again.

From the beginning to the end he denied that anything was said by Browne when he handed him this money in regard to LORIMER. He expressly denied that LORIMER's name was mentioned. If Browne had said to Beckemeyer, "Here is your Lorimer money," would he not very likely have said the same thing to Link? Yet Link denied over and over again, with a threat of perjury held before him, that Browne said anything about LORIMER. Wayman, in his testimony, corroborates Link to the extent of saying that Link contended with him, as well as before the grand jury, that Lorimer money had nothing to do with his vote and that Browne said nothing about LORIMER when he handed the money to him. It is said, and the country believes, that Link confessed to getting money for his vote for LORIMER. This is not true. On the contrary, he swears time and again that he did not get any money for voting for LORIMER, was never promised any, and never expected any.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but I want to get his view. This same man denied, did he not, that he got any money at all?

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes. I have not touched on that, I will say.

Mr. REED. There was some coercion, the Senator claims, brought to bear upon him. He then admitted he did get money.

Now, is it the view of the Senator that that coercion resulted in him telling what was not true, admitting there was coercion, or did the coercion result in nothing more than getting the truth?

Mr. JONES. I am admitting that the coercion got him to tell the truth. I am contending that when he said that, it in no way connected LORIMER with it. I expressed the opinion awhile ago that I had some doubt upon the distribution of the money, but I am willing to admit it for the purposes of this case, and to concede that Link was paid money at St. Louis.

Mr. REED. I am trying simply—not to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. JONES. That is all right. I am not objecting to the interruption.

Mr. REED. It appears that there has been great complaint made by several Senators about harsh methods being used with these gentlemen.

Mr. JONES. If the Senator will permit me, I have not accused the prosecuting attorney of Cook County of using harsh methods. I have simply told the Senate what he did, and from that I make up my mind as to its effect on these men after seeing them on the stand. Other Senators, of course, can make up their own minds from the information they have.

Mr. REED. Those harsh methods or those methods, whether harsh or otherwise, did get this man to admit certain facts which you now concede were the truth, so that the result of the pressure, whatever it was, was not to get a falsehood from him but to get the truth from him. It therefore appears to be admitted that these gentlemen did get money. Now, from what source does the Senator understand that money came?

Mr. JONES. I will come to that a little later on.

Mr. REED. I wish the Senator would discuss it for my benefit.

Mr. JONES. Very well. I will say now, because I am simply trying to bring out the facts and reasons for my conclusion in this case, I believe if money was paid to these men by Browne it came from the liquor interests of the State of Illinois. That is where I believe it came from. It was admitted in the record that Lee O'Neil Browne represented the liquor interests in the legislature. All these men—White, Luke, and so forth—were liquor men. It is shown in this record that the liquor people were active in the forty-sixth general assembly, and they were about the only interests the record shows which were active, especially with reference to legislation. My theory is that Lee O'Neil Browne, as the representative of the liquor interests, had placed in his hand money to do with practically as he saw fit, and that he distributed this money to these men, for what purpose or for what reason I am not going to go into especially, but probably to keep their good will and support in the future. As some of them testify, there was a "bunch of good fellows" in the legislature, and who would be more likely classed as a "bunch of good fellows" than these liquor men?

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that it is his theory mainly that this was liquor money. He, of course, is more familiar with the record than I am. He heard the testimony, and I did not. Is there any evidence whatever in the record that the money was furnished by the liquor men, or is that a mere inference and theory outside of the record?

Mr. JONES. I will say that it is based very much as I see it upon the same theory and upon the same basis that our friends connect Senator LORIMER with this money. I think other Senators may not look at it as I do, but I have almost a conviction, so far as I am concerned, taking all this record into consideration, that that was the source of that money.

Mr. REED. But the Senator says that there is utterly no evidence whatever to connect Senator LORIMER with the furnishing or the expenditure of any money.

Mr. JONES. Except White.

Mr. REED. Now having contended there is no evidence to connect LORIMER with the furnishing of any money, the Senator declares that he believes the money came from the liquor interests upon the same theory that it is claimed LORIMER furnished the money, by which I take it he insists that as there is no evidence in his view that LORIMER furnished the money there is therefore no evidence that the liquor men furnished the money. Consequently he concludes that the liquor men did furnish the money. That does not seem to be a logical position.

Mr. JONES. No; the Senator does not state the position of the Senator from Washington correctly. The Senator simply stated that from the record in this case his theory or opinion is that that is the most probable source of this money. There is no direct evidence in this case. There is no evidence that would be admissible in a court of law showing that the money was furnished by the liquor interests of the State of Illinois. Neither, as I said, is there evidence that would be admissible in a court of law showing that Senator LORIMER raised any of this money. I take it that in a case like this, the proper rule to apply is that if there is any theory inconsistent with the theory that attacks Senator LORIMER'S seat upon which these alleged bribery charges can be sustained that theory must be accepted; that is, the presumptions will all be in favor of the sitting Member and his right to a seat in this body; and if my mind is as strongly convinced—and it is more strongly convinced in this case, that the money came from some other source as from the senatorial source, then I must find for the Senator.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask the Senator if there was any specific legislation pending in the Illinois Legislature in relation to the liquor interests?

Mr. JONES. There was.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What was it.

Mr. JONES. A local option measure.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Was it voted on at that session?

Mr. JONES. The bill was referred to the committee of the house that had charge of that character of legislation, and the committee reported the bill to the house—my recollection is unanimously—and when it came up for passage a few amendments were put in, and it was defeated.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Was there a roll call?

Mr. JONES. I am not sure, but I think there was a roll call.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think I can explain that. It was in the testimony of Mr. Hull.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. His testimony was that it was a bill that forbade brewers to have any interest in the local saloons. My recollection is that the bill was of this nature; that it forbade the brewers and distillers to have any interest in saloons in any part of the county or in any part of the State, and that bill was reported favorably by the whole committee unanimously. It went up to a second reading and was vigorously urged at the time of the second reading, and it looked as though it was going to pass. It came to a second reading in the afternoon. When evening came and it passed to the third reading nobody had any interest in it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was in the house?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That was in the house. Mr. Hull testified that he then took it up and tried to get the bill to the third reading, and out of the committee of 24 that had reported it favorably 14 voted against it, only 2 for it, and 8 did not vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was in committee?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; that was in the house of representatives, showing that of the committee which had reported it favorably 14 of them voted against it when it came to a third reading, 8 did not vote at all, and only 2 voted for it.

Mr. JONES. Browne was really considered as the representative of the liquor interests in the legislature.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to ask a question.

Mr. REED. I beg pardon.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Was this bill considered in the senate?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think the evidence shows that it was.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Was any temperance legislation considered in the senate?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think there was general legislation, but I do not recall any specific legislation. The legislature was very sharply divided between what were called the "wets" and "drys." That was the issue.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It would require some legislation to create that issue, and as to whether any pending bill was there and voted on——

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not recall.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The legislation referred to a moment ago by the Senator——

Mr. JONES. I think the bill was pending but I do not think it came to a vote in the Senate. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I understand the Senator's position to be that in his opinion Browne represented the liquor interests and corruptly used money in their behalf. The Senator also concedes, I take it, that Browne represented Senator LORIMER and was his principal champion in the legislature. Does the Senator have any idea that the liquor money was also used so as to assist Mr. Browne to gain control and influence over the votes in the Lorimer election?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. At least I do not think it necessarily follows, and there is no proof of it at all, nor do I concede that Browne specially represented Senator LORIMER or that he was his special champion.

Mr. REED. The Senator said it was a band of good fellows who were being paid, and Browne was handling the corruption fund as manager for the liquor interests and also for LORIMER. This money was used to make these men good fellows. Browne then made these good fellows vote, or induced them to vote, for Senator LORIMER. Can the Senator draw the line where that money ceased to be potential in favor of LORIMER and where it began to be potential in favor of the liquor business?

Mr. JONES. The Senator has put a great many things in his question that I have not in mind and that I do not concede can be shown by the testimony here. I do not believe that these men expected any money at the close of the legislature. I do not believe that Beckemeyer expected to get any money. I do not think that Link expected to get any money. My idea is——

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. JONES. Of course there is no use for us to argue over my theory because it is just simply a theory. My idea is that Browne representing those people as their attorney, and so on, had the money. They turned it over to him to use as he saw fit. He was under no obligation to turn any of it over to these people and had no agreement with them to turn anything over. They did not know that he had any money. They were not expecting any money. But for reasons probably known only to himself, that I can surmise, he gave them something. He may not have given them anything like the amount he had; he may have given them all of it; I do not know. I am simply giving the Senator my theory, which I think is supported just as much by facts, if not more, than the theory of those who contend that this money was used in connectoin with the election of Senator LORIMER. I can conceive how Mr. Browne might have a fund of money to be used for certain legislation yet not be intrusted with any money to be used in connection with the election of Senator.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the Senator to contend——

Mr. JONES. I expected to get to the matter of Senator LORIMER'S title a little bit later on.

Mr. REED. Just one moment and I think I shall not interrupt the Senator again. I have been trying to get his view. Do I understand the Senator to contend now that Browne had this liquor money, given by direction or indirection, and promised none of it to any of these men in the legislature; that they did not expect to receive any of it, but that when the legislature had adjourned he then generously donated them some money? Is that the Senator's theory?

Mr. JONES. I will say that upon the testimony of those who testified against Senator LORIMER here that same question might be asked with reference to them. It is contended here that Holstlaw got money for voting for LORIMER, and yet, according to his testimony, he told the people that he was going to vote for LORIMER before any suggestion of money. On the same theory, Broderick could have kept the money and kept it in his pocket. So, with reference to assuming that this money was senatorial money, these men did not expect anything. They had not been promised anything. They had not talked with anybody to hold out any inducement to them. Therefore, even if it was senatorial money, he could have kept it all.

Mr. REED. But the Senator, Mr. President, is not a Yankee, and therefore he ought not to answer a direct question by shifting the ground to some other place and asking another question, in effect. I want to get really the Senator's viewpoint.

Mr. JONES. Does not the Senator think that he has got my viewpoint in regard to that?

Mr. REED. I wish to know whether the Senator really means to tell us that a lot of scoundrels got together in the legislature——

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; I did not suggest anything of that kind.

Mr. REED. Well, a lot of gentlemen got together.

Mr. JONES. No; I did not suggest anything of that kind. I did not suggest that any of them were getting together in the legislature.

Mr. REED. Well, there were a lot of gentlemen in the legislature.

Mr. JONES. I have no doubt there were. Some seem to think there were not.

Mr. REED. And Browne went down to East St. Louis and then and there divided up some money; and these gentlemen did not know what they were getting it for; there had been no prior arrangement that they should get it, no hint that any money should come to them, and they had become Browne's adherents, friends, and followers without any expectation or hope of reward, and Browne, meeting them down there, simply handed them this gratuity. Does the Senator really think now that that ever happened in the whole course of the world's history?

Mr. JONES. I am inclined to think so.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand the Senator from Washington concedes from the evidence in the record that there was a jack pot.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I said a while ago I did not take quite the same view that some of the other members of the committee did with reference to the existence of a jack pot in the legislature, using that term in the sense that it is used throughout the record, in that there was a fund contributed from various sources which it was understood would be distributed at the close of the legislature. I said my judgment was that that condition did not exist in the forty-sixth general assembly, and gave my reasons for it.

Mr. POMERENE. In any event it seems to be the opinion of some of the members of the committee that there was a corruption fund of some sort. I think it can be reasonably inferred from what has been said in the course of this discussion that some of those legislators were corrupted, without now having reference to the purpose of the corruption, and that Mr. Browne——

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator that I will not concede that myself; that is, there is nothing in the record here to show that any member of the legislature aside from White ever expected anything for any action that he took in the legislature.

Mr. POMERENE. I will then assume that it has been conceded by others that there was this corrupt fund, that members of the legislature were in fact corrupted, and that Mr. Browne played a part in this corruption. Now, assuming that to be the fact, as I understand, the Senator was elected on May 26. The legislature adjourned on June 1.

Mr. JONES. On June 4, I think.

Mr. POMERENE. Early in June, in any event.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. And this fund was distributed partly on June 21 and partly in July. Now, that being the case, is it not just as reasonable to suppose that this money was used for the purpose of corrupt methods in the election of a United States Senator as it is to suppose that it was used with reference to legislative matters?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. I will tell the Senator why, and I will do it right here. I intended to cover it later on. If there was a fund for the purpose of influencing legislation, it was collected along as the legislature progressed from time to time. The question of Senator LORIMER's candidacy did not become a question before that legislature until about 10 days before the election. He did not definitely decide to be a candidate until, I think, four or five days before his election, and there is no suggestion anywhere which is entitled to any credit that anybody or any agency or any interest contributed to raise a fund or took any interest in the collection of a fund to promote Senator LORIMER's candidacy.

Nobody appeared at the legislature in his behalf; no special interest of any kind in the State of Illinois was represented there urging his election; nor was there any suggestion that they had contributed to his election or to any fund. So it seems to be a far-fetched suggestion to conclude that necessarily, because there may have been a fund in reference to legislation collected during the entire session of the legislature and because Senator LORIMER was elected, a contribution was made from that fund to assist in his election. It was a legislative fund anyway, if there was any fund at all, and I do not believe that the senatorial matter was connected with it in any way, shape, or form, and there is nothing in the record upon which I myself could base a belief in such a proposition as that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington further yield?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. It seems to me the work of the legislature had been completed——

Mr. JONES. Oh, no. The Senator is mistaken in that. Practically all the legislative work of the session was right there at the close, almost like every other legislative body.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Washington did not wait until I had concluded.

Mr. JONES. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. POMERENE. The work of the legislature was completed before there was any distribution of this fund. The Senator from Washington has just stated that there was no interest there represented in the election of Senator. It seems to me as I have read this record—and I have read most of it—that there were certain very powerful interests that were at work.

Mr. JONES. What interests?

Mr. POMERENE. The tariff question was connected with this proposition. A leading lumberman, not to mention the name now——

Mr. JONES. I wish the Senator would mention the name.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. Hines was there, and took an extremely active interest in this matter.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is mistaken about that. Mr. Hines was not at Springfield at all.

Mr. POMERENE. Possibly that is correct. When I said "there" I meant having some connection with this election.

Mr. JONES. I do not want the Senator to understand me to say that nobody that was connected with the interests was not interested in Senator LORIMER's election. I did not say that. I said there was nobody at Springfield and no interest represented there and no agents of those interests. I am going to take up the Hines matter in a very short time; and possibly right now, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. POMERENE. I think perhaps the Senator made his statement a little too broad when he said that there were no interests connected with this matter.

Mr. JONES. I wanted to confine it to the legislature and before the legislature.

Mr. POMERENE. But it seems to me that the Senator has not yet made clear why this fund should be distributed with reference to legislative work, rather than with reference to the election of a Senator. I do not mean to say, so far as the discussion has gone, that it had reference to one rather than reference to the other; but it seems to me that it is just as reasonable to suppose, assuming for the sake of the argument that there was a corruption fund, that it was distributed, and that it was distributed by Mr. Browne; but we have the same right to draw the conclusion that it was distributed with reference to the election of a United States Senator as we have to say that it was used with reference to legislative work.

Mr. JONES. I want the Senate to understand that I am not conceding that the testimony shows that there had existed in the Illinois Legislature this so-called corruption and jack-pot fund; I know that there were rumors and gossip and newspaper reports about it, as I have already said; and that is the sole testimony upon which it is based; yet conceding that there was a corruption fund, it has always been contended that that corruption fund was raised in connection with legislative matters, in which certain people or corporations or individuals or associations were interested. Therefore, if the fund was contributed for that purpose, it would be expected to be handled with reference to legislation, and it would be the reasonable inference that it would be used in that way.

The election of a Senator is certainly distinct from legislative matters. A corporation would be interested in a bill affecting corporation interests, and yet it might not take any interest whatever in the election of a United States Senator and would not be connected in any way, shape, or form with it. So it seems to me that any jack-pot or corruption fund, in the sense usually used in connection with the Illinois Legislature, was and must have been understood to be a fund in connection with legislative matters and not in connection with the senatorial matter. We have no right to assume and there is certainly nothing in the record showing that Senator LORIMER knew anything about such a corruption fund or that those who were promoting his election, other than Lee O'Neil Browne, may have known about it; and yet Lee O'Neil Browne was not supporting Mr. LORIMER because of a special interest in his election, other than for reasons that we shall take up later on, but for the purpose of ending the deadlock, for the purpose of defeating Hopkins, for the purpose of getting rid of this question, he gave him his support; and while it is said here that Lee O'Neil Browne led his followers, the record does not show it; the record does not establish it. We called almost every member of the legislature, especially the Democrats who voted for Senator LORIMER, and they gave good and valid and reasonable reasons for doing so, independent of Browne. So I can very naturally see how they might have had a corruption fund in connection with legislation and yet it have had no connection whatever with the election of a Senator. I do not know whether I have made my view clear in regard to that or not, but there is nothing in the record that I see which impels me toward the conclusion that the legislative jack pot, if there was a legislative jack pot, was connected with the senatorial election in any way whatever.

Mr. POMERENE. Then it seems to be the Senator's opinion that, assuming that there was a corruption fund in the possession of Mr. Browne as trustee, he was such an honest trustee that he would use that fund only for the purpose of corrupting legislative matters and not use it for corruption in other directions.

Mr. JONES. I see no reason why he should use it for corruption purposes in connection with the senatorial election. There was nothing special that Browne hoped to receive out of it, except what any other Democrat might get for voting for Senator LORIMER, which is the reason given by some people that they thought possibly it would be well to have a friend here; they recognized Senator LORIMER's human nature, and that he would probably pay some attention to those who had befriended him, just like every man would pay some attention to those who had helped or assisted him. Some thought it a good thing from a party standpoint, and others wanted to end the contest and get home, and many were personally very friendly to LORIMER, and all were against Hopkins. There is nothing in this record to show that Browne expected to get anything out of the election of a United States Senator, or that any such expectation influenced him in his support of LORIMER, and nothing to warrant him in diverting any legislative fund which he may have had to secure the election of a Senator. He was to gain nothing by it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I want to make the suggestion that the Senator from Washington has been speaking about an hour and a half, and I observe that he has got through only three pages of his manuscript. The whole time has been taken up with interrogatories on first one question and then on another, and he has had no opportunity whatever to deliver the address which he has prepared and in which he gives his reason for his action. After yielding an hour and thirty minues to interruptions of that kind, I think that, in fairness to him, he should be permitted to proceed with his speech.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I appreciate the friendly interest of the chairman of the committee, but I will say that in these interruptions I have covered a whole lot of my speech further on, which will therefore not have to be taken up, so that the Senate is probably losing no time and I am enjoying the interruptions very much.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I have taken the liberty of asking the Senator from Washington a few questions, and, therefore, am one of the parties guilty of the interruptions.

Mr. JONES. The Senator is not guilty of anything wrong.

Mr. REED. I rather dislike the idea that interruptions are regarded by any Senator as mere interruptions. I have been trying to get the Senator's view for my own benefit. I have to vote on this case, and I have a good deal of respect for the Senator's opinions. He sat on this investigating committee, and he has announced that he intends to vote differently from the way he voted before. Therefore, it seems to me that whatever light he can shed, and is willing to shed, upon these matters will help some of us who more desire to get at the truth than to listen to a very excellent speech.

Mr. JONES. The Senator will give me credit for not objecting to interruptions at all.

Mr. REED. The Senator has been very courteous and very kind; and I desire to get a little more light.

Mr. JONES. I appreciate the suggestion that possibly I have given the Senator some light.

Mr. REED. At least the Senator has elucidated his own opinions; and it is a very different thing for a man sometimes to listen to the opinions of another than to listen to his reasons for the opinions. There is a matter that troubles me some, that I should like to get the Senator's view upon. I will have to take a moment to state it. It seems to be conceded by everybody that Lee O'Neil Browne was the agent of Mr. LORIMER.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not concede that he was an agent of Mr. LORIMER; I contend that he was a friend of Mr. LORIMER, and was simply doing what he could as one individual member of the legislature to secure Democratic votes for Mr. LORIMER when Mr. LORIMER became a candidate. In the matter of his being an agent in the way of binding Senator LORIMER by a promise or by the distribution of money or anything of that kind, I do not think there is anything that shows that at all. He was no more the agent of Mr. LORIMER than were several other Democratic members there of possibly not quite so much prominence as Mr. Browne, but who interested themselves in Mr. LORIMER's behalf.

Mr. REED. Well, I will try to get language that is unobjectionable. It seems to be conceded that Mr. Browne was very active in securing the election of Mr. LORIMER; it seems to be conceded by the Senator who has the floor that Browne was the agent of the liquor interests; that he had a fund derived from the liquor interests or elsewhere for distribution; and that he did distribute that fund to certain members of the legislature.

Mr. JONES. Well, they all swear that they did not expect anything for voting for LORIMER excepting White, and there is nothing in the record that, to my mind, impels me to believe that they did expect anything for their vote for him.

Mr. REED. Then, can the Senator explain whether he really thinks that money or the expectation of money in the Illinois Legislature influenced the votes of any of those men now charged with corruption or whether he thinks that their votes were simply votes cast in accordance with conscience and principle?

Mr. JONES. That is, you mean in connection with the election of Senator?

Mr. REED. I mean in connection with anything.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that there is nothing in the record here that shows or even indicates that any of those people except White voted upon any measure hoping to get any compensation or pay for it, and they all swear to the contrary.

Mr. REED. And the Senator's view, then, is that neither money nor the expectation nor hope of money had any influence in tying these men to the fortunes or to the dictation of Mr. Browne?

Mr. JONES. I think not; that is, there is nothing shown in the record to that effect, and there is nothing to show that they were tied to the fortunes or dictation of Browne. They recognized him as the leader of their faction, because he had received a majority vote for minority leader, and that is all.

Mr. REED. Well, the Senator means direct. Does the Senator——

Mr. JONES. Well, I want to say to the Senator——

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to say that it is his judgment, after hearing all this evidence, that there has not been some kind of understanding that the men who had adhered to the fortunes and followed the dictation of Mr. Browne would receive compensation?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I think this case is to be decided, of course, upon the record, and there is nothing in the record which, to my mind, indicates that any of these people expected anything for their votes upon any of these measures or that they to any extent followed the dictation of Browne. I might have an opinion, of course, in trying to explain their action in view of what happened after the legislature adjourned, and I might think that possibly they did expect something of that kind, although I have no special reason to think so unless it is with reference to the man Holstlaw. I have a theory—there is no direct evidence to support it—with reference to Holstlaw in connection with his evidence in regard to his campaign, in connection with the source from which he got his money, and in connection with his disposition and the character of the man that he either had an understanding or that he expected in some way to be reimbursed for his campaign expenses. As I have said, there is no real direct evidence to support a theory of that kind.

Mr. REED. I do not want to be importunate about this matter, but I have a very grave reason in my own mind for wanting to get the Senator's real opinion. The Senator, of course, says there is no evidence, and I take it he means direct evidence.

Mr. JONES. Well, neither direct nor really indirect.

Mr. REED. But taking into consideration the fact that these men rallied to the standard of Browne; that they obeyed his will and followed his dictation——

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. President, I do not think the Senator ought to state it in that way. There is no evidence here that they obeyed Browne's will or his dictation on legislation or other matters either.

Mr. REED. Well, they voted with him.

Mr. JONES. Oh, yes; sometimes and sometimes not.

Mr. REED. And they went to him for advice; they selected him as leader; he became in fact their leader; afterwards they went to St. Louis where this money was divided up, and certain sums of money were indubitably paid to Mr. White by Mr. Browne, as shown by Mr. White's letters. Now, what I am trying to get from the Senator is this: Does he not believe he is warranted in the conclusion from this record that these men expected to get money from or through the hands of Mr. Browne in consideration of their services and friendly offices in the legislature?

Mr. JONES. I will say frankly to the Senator that I do not think so.

Mr. REED. That is the answer I had thought the Senator would make. Then, the Senator thinks that, without any agreement, express or implied, without any understanding whatsoever, Mr. Browne sent for or had these members of the legislature assembled at St. Louis; that he paid them this money or caused it to be paid, and that without any understanding, express or implied, in advance he wrote these letters to Mr. White asking him to meet him, and paid him various sums of money which he has admitted receiving.

Mr. JONES. I have no reason to think otherwise.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say with reference to the suggestion of the Senator in regard to Mr. Browne being the leader and these people following him, and so on, that I assume that the Legislature of Illinois is very much like other legislative bodies. I have noticed from my service in the Senate and in the other branch of Congress that men usually follow those who have been selected as leaders, and some one is usually selected as a leader by the minority as well as the majority. I have never thought that there was anything wrong about that. I can remember how in the House of Representatives when we came in to vote on a proposition we usually asked how so and so was voting, and then we voted that way; and I have noticed that our Democratic friends in this body usually vote together upon every important proposition, and I see nothing wrong about that.

Mr REED But Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. And I would like to see the Members on this side of the Senate follow that course a little bit more than they do.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me another question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that it is customary to follow leaders and vote as a unit and that that is done in the Senate. Does he know of any instance where in this body or in any other honest legislative body the members have afterwards gone out and cut up a lot of money among themselves?

Mr. JONES. Oh, the Senator does not mean to ask a question like that seriously with the suggestion it implies. Of course the Senator from Washington intimated nothing of that sort.

Mr. REED. No; but I am trying——

Mr. JONES. But there is no reason to assume simply because men got some money after the Illinois Legislature had adjourned that all the members or any considerable number of them or any of them who were in what was known as the Browne faction supported Browne or followed Browne in the hope or expectation of getting money. The Democrats of the House of Representatives of the Illinois Legislature had a very active contest over the minority leadership. Leadership there means something, just as it means something in the National House of Representatives. There were two candidates in the minority for speaker. Browne received a majority of the Democratic votes, and he received practically all the Democratic votes when it came to voting for speaker. After two ballots practically all of them voted for a Republican. After the speaker was elected Browne was recognized as the leader of one faction, just as another gentleman was recognized as the leader of another faction. The members of each faction did not vote together upon all propositions. They frequently divided, but they recognized him as leader, just as all legislative bodies recognize men as leaders. There is nothing in this record to show that the men who followed Browne or took him as their leader did so in the hope or expectation that they would receive anything during the legislature or after the legislature. If we are to infer that because many of the men who followed Browne and voted for Senator LORIMER were corrupt, we could with equal justice draw the same conclusion with reference to other legislative bodies.

Browne's faction was not the only faction that supported Senator LORIMER when it came to a vote. A large number of what was known as the Tippitt faction of the Democratic Party voted for Senator LORIMER. While it is suggested that possibly one or two members of the legislature received pay from Tippitt, I submit that there is no proof in this record to show anything of the kind, and that it is an absolute injustice to a man who was elected six times to the Illinois Legislature and who was honored and respected by all of his neighbors and his people to infer and insinuate that, simply because some poor drunken member of the legislature who had followed Tippitt was flourishing a little money, he got that money from Mr. Tippitt. I think such an inference is unjust, unreasonable, and unfair, and if it is to be followed, then no recognized leader in any legislative body is safe from suspicion and infamous suggestion. Others may not agree with me in regard to that, but that is the way I look at it.

I might just as well now refer to these other members of the legislature and give my reasons for thinking that they did not receive money for voting for Senator LORIMER. This whole case is buttressed about Charles A. White. It is not necessary for me to go through and analyze his testimony. That has already been done most completely by the Senator from Vermont. I simply want to call the attention of the Senate and the attention of the people who are insisting that this was a corrupt election to the fact that it must be determined primarily upon White's testimony. While I will admit that a man without character, a man without any moral conception of what is right and just, while I will admit that a perjurer and a blackmailer—not a man merely charged with blackmailing, but a self-confessed perjurer and a self-confessed blackmailer, a man who confesses that he lied time and again for the purpose of securing something from one of his best friends, a man who is contradicted, whose testimony is impeached time and again in this record, and impeached conclusively upon material propositions—while I will admit that such a man can tell the truth sometimes, I do think that his testimony ought to be scanned very closely; I do think that he ought to be supported by strong and conclusive corroborative evidence before we should believe him and overturn the testimony of a man with a record, with a character, and with a reputation like that of WILLIAM LORIMER, and especially so when not one Senator who heard the testimony on this hearing or the other one contends that WILLIAM LORIMER was personally guilty of improper conduct in connection with his election or that he was cognizant of any such on the part of any of his supporters. I will admit, with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], that the character, the record, and the reputation of WILLIAM LORIMER should not overturn convincing proof of corrupt practices in connection with his election; but, gentlemen of the Senate, I want to say that I do not believe we ought to overturn a character like that and a reputation like that and repudiate the testimony of such a man upon the testimony of a man like White, unless it is corroborated so as to prove almost conclusively that White's testimony where it involves Mr. LORIMER is true and correct.

What kind of a man is WILLIAM LORIMER? His personal character is above reproach. He is temperate in his habits, chaste in his conversation, honest in his dealings, and of unquestioned veracity. His word is as good as his bond in private life, in business dealings, and in politics. He is gentle in manner and considerate in action. He is sympathetic, tender, conciliatory, frank but firm in his opinions and convictions. A good neighbor, a faithful friend, a fair foe, a model husband and father with an ideal home life. That is the kind of a man WILLIAM LORIMER is personally. If he differs from other men in Illinois politics, it is in this: He is honest, true, and courageous in politics as in private dealings. His word given is never broken. A promise made is always kept. He never deceives. If he is for you, you have no doubt of it; if he is against you, you know it. Slow in promising, he is faithful in performance. He is true to his friends and followers in defeat, and never forgetful of them in victory. Always ready to help when in his power the humblest citizen regardless of politics. These, with great executive ability, are the elements of his success. Whatever the people may think from the reports they have read, this is the kind of a man WILLIAM LORIMER is—in character, home, business, and politics. If we are to condemn a man like this on the evidence of a man like White unless clearly and conclusively corroborated, then why should the people expect a man to live an honorable and upright life either in his private life, his business dealings, or in his political activities? How can anyone hope to escape the perjurers and blackmailers if an upright life counts for nothing against perjury and avarice?

I will admit that White a few years ago had a good reputation. While he was at work down at St. Louis he received some nice recommendations from his employers, and I have no doubt that those recommendations were given in good faith and were deserved at that time. Here is the way I look at it: The highest wages White had ever received, I think, were about $2 or $2.25 a day. In the forty-fifth general assembly of Illinois he was selected as a representative of the labor interests, and he was paid $6 a day and his expenses. He left his work, went to Springfield, and fell in the way of high living and dissipation and riotous associates. When the legislature was through he had to go back to work at $2 or $2.25 a day, and he found he could not maintain his high living. He saw somewhere that some labor man had obtained $5,000 as a bribe from some interest to induce him to use his influence in its behalf, and he took the money without doing the work for which it was given and used it for himself; he heard also of another labor man who got $20,000 for doing the same thing, and he used the money for his own benefit; and I have no doubt but that he said to himself, "That is a good way to get money; I can not live on this wage of $2 or $2.25 a day, as I have been living; I do not like this kind of life; and I am going to the legislature. I have heard there have been rumors of corruption up there and chances of getting money, and I am going there. I will make some money in that way. I will get better wages than I am getting now and not have this hard work. The pay is $2,000 for a session, and I can get much more on the side."

So, he got himself nominated for the legislature; he was elected, and went to the legislature; and he tells this committee and the country that he went there for the purpose of disclosing and exposing corruption. He went to the legislature; he continued his riotous living; he became worse and worse. The dissipation shown in this record on the part of White is really appalling. He got his $2,000, but it was all used up in two or three months. He made trips to Chicago; took his friends there, and they went to all sorts of disreputable resorts and places, and his money did not last long. If he got money from Browne, it was soon spent. After his return from his trip with Browne in August, it entered his mind and heart that he could extort money from LORIMER, and he told Zentner and Sturmer that he voted for LORIMER and he could say he got money for it and LORIMER would have to put up. Then, apparently, he conceived the idea that he would get money by connecting LORIMER with some part of his ill-gotten money. He must concoct a bribery story, so he says that Browne came to his room in Springfield on the night of May 24 and took him to his (Browne's) room and there entered into a deal with him by which Browne was to pay him money for the election of Senator LORIMER.

Mark you, he says that that was the first time any man had spoken to him in regard to voting for Senator LORIMER—May 24. Is that true? If it is not true his whole story relating to LORIMER is stamped as a pure fabrication. Homer Shaw came before our committee and he impressed me, like he impressed all the other members of the committee, as being one of the most honorable, high-class men who came before the committee. He was a Democrat. He did not vote for LORIMER. He tried to maintain the Democratic organization, and yet he testifies unequivocally in substance that White told him a week or 10 days before that he expected to vote for LORIMER. White denies it. But I do not believe there is a member of our committee who will not say that Shaw must be believed with reference to that proposition. Shaw had no incentive to lie. He did not lie. He told the truth. Senator LORIMER also swears that White told him several days before the election that he would vote for him. So White lied when he said that May 24 was the first time he had been spoken to in regard to the election of Senator LORIMER.

Further, Shaw testifies to White's dejected appearance in the subsequent session of the legislature, and of his telling Shaw that he regretted his vote, and that his people would not have very much to do with him. White denies this, but there can be no doubt in the mind of anyone who saw the two men as to which told the truth. White lied in this also.

Again, with reference to the night of May 24, White, in order to bolster up his story, said that Otis and Sidney Yarbrough were there; that they were in his room when Browne came there. At the former hearing one of these Yarbroughs was not called. I remember that I wondered why he was not called. Both the Yarbroughs were called before this committee. They both testified in support of White's contention that they were in Springfield the night of May 24; that they were in that room when Browne came there; and yet, mark you, the testimony in this record shows, and it shows it conclusively, that one of the Yarbroughs, at any rate, was not in Springfield that night. It shows that White and the two Yarbroughs were in Chicago on Sunday, May 23; that they stayed there that night, and that one of them remained there while White and the other one went to Springfield, arriving there about 11.41 the night of May 24.

I will not go into and analyze the testimony, but I assert, and no member of this committee will contend otherwise, that White perjured himself when he said the two Yarbroughs were in his room in Springfield on the night of May 24, and that the Yarbroughs perjured themselves when they swore they were there. They lied when they said they saw Browne that night, and White lied when he said Browne promised him money for his vote for LORIMER. The minority of the committee have nothing to say in their report or in their speeches about the Yarbroughs. Their perjury was too plain, not only from the contradictory evidence produced, but from their own testimony and their manner on the stand. If White lied in stating that the two Yarbroughs were present, and he did, why should we believe him at all? Can anyone believe him? This is a material part of his story. It is clearly false, and the whole Lorimer story should fall with it. Why did the Yarbroughs swear to it? They were close friends of White. One had been given a place by him. They seemed to be willing to go any length for him. One of them admitted, in the Browne trial in Chicago, of writing a letter saying, in substance, this: "I will go to hell for White, and in his interest," and he was perjuring himself to sustain White's story, because White wanted it corroborated. There is no question but that White's story as to the 24th of May is absolutely false. He had told Shaw and LORIMER before this that he would vote for LORIMER. The Yarbroughs were not in his room that night. Browne did not come to his room and did not promise him a thousand dollars for voting for LORIMER. This story is simply a part of his blackmailing scheme.

White has made no confession in this case. He has simply written a story of corruption in which he was an actor to sell and sold it. Under the claim that he was going to the legislature to expose corruption he got money corruptly, according to his own story. He did not expose the corruption. He used the money. He had a good time. His funds were out. He must raise some money or his good time would end. How could he do it? He conceived the idea, as I said before, that he would make Browne and LORIMER put up. After he and Browne had returned from a trip in August, after the legislature adjourned, he was at the Briggs House in Chicago; he was drinking. He was there with two men, named Zentner and Sturmer, and they testified to this statement on the part of White.

White said that he was going to take a trip in the fall; that he was going down to O'Fallon; he was going down to visit his people, and then go down to New Orleans, then to Cuba, then come up to New York and have a good time. These men suggested to him that he must have considerable money. White said, "No; I have not a lot of money, but I am going to get it, and I am going to get it without working." Then Zentner asked him how he was going to get it. White said,

"That Lorimer crowd, and our old pal Browne, too, have got to come across good and hard when I say the word, and I am going to say it." Sturmer then asked White whether he had anything on them, and White said, "No; I ain't. I got the worst of it down there in Springfield, but that makes no difference. I voted for LORIMER, and I am a Democrat, and I can say I got money for voting for LORIMER. Do you suppose that they can stand for it a moment? I guess they will cough up when I say the word to them."

We are asked to exclude a man from this Chamber upon the testimony of a man of that character, a man who in his drunken condition gave up possibly the inner thoughts of his mind and who said, "I voted for LORIMER; I did not expect anything, but I can say I got money for it, and they will have to cough up." This is corroborated by Zentner in every particular. This was the first conception of the plan to extort money from LORIMER and the beginning of the White story.

Now, what sort of a man is White? James W. Doyle, an honest laboring man, a machinist, of Springfield, was about the legislature representing labor, and he testifies to a conversation with White, as follows:

He said to me, "How is railroad legislation coming on?" I said, "All right." He said, "You fellows are the damnedest, cheapest bunch I ever saw. How do you expect us fellows to live around here on wind?" I said, "I do not know. I have not got a dollar to give you or to cite you as to where you can get any. I am surprised at your making that statement, elected as you were." Somebody stepped up, and the conversation ended there.

Doyle is not impeached. Doyle is a man of reputation and character. There is no reason in this record why we should conclude that he was stating anything that was not true. It simply illustrates the character of White as demonstrated all the way through this record.

Then Officer O'Keefe, with whom White was placed in Chicago, testified to a conversation he had with White after White had been on the stand in the Browne trial. White stated to O'Keefe, in substance, that he had lied in his testimony.

Officer O'Keefe testifies that White, in substance, admitted that he testified falsely, referring to his testimony in the Browne trial.

Senator KENYON. That he lied on the witness stand?
Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, sir.
Senator KENYON. At the time he told you he lied on the witness stand you knew another case was coming up—that the jury would discredit?
Mr. O'KEEFE. Why, the case was still on, sir. This was the first trial when I knew that he lied.
Senator KENYON. Oh, it was during the first trial?
Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, sir.
Senator KENYON. But the case was complete?
Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, sir.
Senator KENYON. He told you then that he had lied?
Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, sir.
Senator KENYON. That he had lied under oath?
Mr. O'KEEFE. He was sworn, anyhow; yes, sir.

Then in pursuance of this plan that he had conceived White went to writing a story. He did not call it the Lorimer scandal; he did not call it the Lorimer election; he did not call it the Lorimer bribe. He called it "The jack pot." That was the title of his story. And what did he do? While he was writing his story he wrote a letter to Senator LORIMER, which appears in the record—a pitiful sort of letter—setting forth his bad condition, and asking for some help, a letter that would appeal to any man of the disposition and character of Senator LORIMER, and would appeal to any man who had been favored by the writer. Yet White on the stand said that in that letter he lied. I do not say he lied. He says he lied.

He wanted something from LORIMER he could use against him in his story. He says so. That letter did not bring anything. So he finally concluded that he would make a straight blackmailing proposition to Senator LORIMER, and he wrote and told him that he had written a story of the legislative proceedings of the Illinois General Assembly, and suggested to him that he had been offered $2.50 a word for that story, and that there were about 30,000 words in the story. In other words, he suggested to Senator LORIMER that he ought to put up $75,000 for that story.

White says on the witness stand that his statements in that letter were lies and that he had not received any offer, but he hoped to get something from Senator LORIMER that he would be able to use against him. He did not get it. In the meantime he was also writing to Browne. The record contains letters from White to Browne and from Browne to White—letters from White to Browne telling Browne that he did not know where the next meal would come from; telling Browne that he was in dire distress, asking to borrow some money, and he inclosed a note in one letter for money, which he trusted Browne would send him. Browne sent him some money and gave him some good advice. And yet on the witness stand he testified that his statements in those letters were lies; that they were untrue; that he wrote in that way in the hope that he would get something from his friend Browne that he could use against him. He got money on these misrepresentations, and he used it for his own purposes.

But finding he could not get anything from LORIMER, he wrote to Everybody's and several other magazines, and, getting nothing from them, he says that some one suggested—Mr. Wright—that the Chicago Tribune would buy his story. He went to the Tribune people and made a proposition to them. Asked them what? Keeley, of the Chicago Tribune, says that White asked him $50,000 for his story. White says Keeley is a liar. I do not believe it. I think White lied when he said he did not ask him $50,000. He did ask him $50,000 for that story. Keeley would not pay it.

Finally he came down to $4,000. The Tribune people said they would give him $3,500 for the story if he would agree to corroborate and sustain it, and he agreed to do it. The sale was made. He started out to corroborate his story.

It is very significant as showing White's character that about the 28th or 29th of April, a day or two before this story was to be printed, he threatened not to go through with his story. White had been down in southern Illinois with a man by the name of Turner or Tierney trying to corroborate his story, talking with the different members whom he had implicated. He had gotten away from Turner. Turner was over in St. Louis. White was in East St. Louis with a couple of friends. He had been carousing around and did not have any money. He went to a hotel to get a room. He told the night clerk he had no money, and the night clerk said, "I can not let you have a room; it is contrary to the orders of the proprietor." White asked for the proprietor; but he had gone to bed and he could not get him. So White said, "Call up Turner, over in St. Louis, at the St. James Hotel." The night clerk sent the message and they got Turner. White wanted Turner to "put up" for him; and this is what Mr. Ellerhof says White said:

Mr. White said that he was down there broke; had no money; that Turner was across the river having a good time, and he was over there broke and could not get any lodging for himself and his friends.

Mr. HANECY. Did White say anything to you as to what he would do if the Tribune did not do something for him?
Mr. ELLERHOF. Yes. He said he would not go through with it. If he did not get settled up by Monday morning he would not go through with it.

Through with what? Through with the story that he had turned over to the Tribune for $3,500 and that he is now trying to sustain and corroborate? If they did not put up money for him, he would not go through with it.

Mr. HANECY. Did he say anything about wanting money and wanting it damned quick?
Mr. ELLERHOF. Yes, sir. He said, "I want money and I want it damned quick."

He then had them telephone to Chicago, to the Tribune office, and they got a Mr. Hammer, who was said to be the editor of the Tribune. Mr. Hammer told Mr. Ellerhof to let White have a room, saying the Tribune would settle for it. Ellerhof said he could not do it, because it was against his orders. Then Ellerhof said White started out of the door and said, "I will show you what influence I have got, from the governor down."

This shows that White was ready to "throw down" even the Tribune if he could not get a little money for his expenses there.

Soon after he had written or while he was writing his story he talked to Mr. Webb, his attorney at East St. Louis, and asked him about the matter. He talked to him about the "jack pot." He did not say anything about the election of LORIMER. He did not say anything about having gotten money for that, but talked about the "jack-pot" money. Webb advised White not to publish his story, saying that it would very likely get him in the penitentiary. What did White say?

Mr. HANECY. What did he say in reply to that?
Mr. WEBB. He said he did not care; that he had been deceived; he had been promised more money than he had received, and he intended to have what had been promised him; that if he did not he would drag down those involved with him, and they would all go down together.
Mr. HANECY. What was his language—"I do not care a damn"?
Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; he used that term.

I think Mr. Webb impressed the committee as a man of reputation and a man of truth. There is no doubt that White made those statements to him and he was evidently referring to the "jack-pot" or legislative money. If the senatorial election had been connected with it he would surely have said something of it to Webb.

I could take from the record the statements of other witnesses showing White's avaricious nature and his blackmailing character; but it is not necessary. I have given enough to show his character. I have given enough to show the character of the man and the purpose for which he prepared his story. If it be true that he got money from the "jack-pot" fund, that he understood he would get money from the "jack-pot" fund, it is not unreasonable to conclude that White conceived the idea that he could make money by connecting LORIMER with the matter, and from his statements and actions this conclusion is irresistible.

In my judgment, Shaw's story is correct that White told him 10 days before the election that he expected to vote for LORIMER. I have no doubt that White voted for LORIMER without any expectation or hope at the time of getting any money. I have no doubt that he voted for LORIMER without any promise of any money. I have no doubt that he afterwards conceived the idea that by connecting LORIMER with the matter he could make money out of it, and he did it; and he took his story to the worst enemy Senator LORIMER has in this country and sold his story to them.

I do not charge the Tribune with using the story corruptly; but they were glad to get it. The Tribune's policy had been for years to drive LORIMER out of Illinois politics. It would employ any means to do it. The character of the Tribune's opposition to Senator LORIMER and its desire to get something to use against him are well exemplified in the story Mr. Keeley told on the stand of a man named Glavis coming to him and telling him he knew of some books that would implicate Senator LORIMER while a Member of the House, and saying that if Keeley would pay him $750 he would get those books for him. Keeley paid the $750. No books were secured. He admitted that he had been buncoed, and that the books never were produced. Nobody seemed to know anything about them. The chances are, the probabilities are, the indications are, that Mr. Glavis, simply presuming upon the intense hostility of the Tribune to Senator LORIMER, concocted his story and got from them $750, which they paid with the hope that they would find something they could use against LORIMER.

This is White's story, and he is the only man that says anywhere in this record that he was promised anything for voting for LORIMER or that he hoped to get anything for voting for LORIMER. I do not believe he ever was promised a cent. I do not believe he expected a cent. There is absolutely no corroborative evidence that he got his money for voting for LORIMER. It is so plainly a blackmailing scheme and is so full of perjury that it is entitled to no credit. It is said he confessed. The country believes he confessed. He did not confess. He wanted money. He wrote his story. He sold it. He was never arrested. He was never indicted. He was never prosecuted, and is scot-free to this day.

The country thinks—and those who know better keep on saying—that Beckemeyer, Holstlaw, and Link have confessed to receiving money for their votes for LORIMER, and upon these continued false statements the people have largely formed their opinion of this case. These men have not so confessed. Upon the contrary, every one of them has denied from the beginning to the end that he was promised anything for voting for LORIMER, that he expected anything for voting for him, or that he voted in the expectation or hope of getting anything. Not one of them connects LORIMER with this matter except Beckemeyer, and he does not do it until he is threatened with the penitentiary upon an indictment for perjury; and then he simply goes so far as to say that Browne said when he handed him the thousand dollars that it was "Lorimer money." But he contends after that, and until the very close, and contends now, that he did not hope for, did not expect, and was not promised a single dollar. And Mr. Wayman, the prosecuting attorney of Cook County, who had him indicted, and who talked with him privately and otherwise, says Beckemeyer contended the same thing to him all through his conversations with him.

I have no doubt, as I said awhile ago, that Beckemeyer connected LORIMER in this way only and solely to secure immunity, to be relieved from this indictment. He went before the grand jury three times and never mentioned LORIMER's name. This brought no immunity, and then in a private conversation with Wayman he used LORIMER's name, as above stated, and he was at once released. He simply lied to get immunity.

We hear a good deal about Holstlaw. He was a member of the State senate. In my estimation, even White is a better man and more entitled to our respect and pity than this man Holstlaw. Words can not express my opinion of or contempt for Holstlaw. There is some excuse for White, if you can excuse anybody for such a thing, as swearing falsely, trying to get money corruptly, in order to live high. But there is absolutely no excuse whatever for Holstlaw. He was a man worth from $100,000 to $200,000, respected in his community, of great profession of piety; and yet he is a man always looking out for and trying to get money for nothing. He is avaricious beyond expression. He will take a dollar at any time and from any source and ask no questions, and thinks it all right. He has no perception of immorality in connection with the receipt of money. In a furniture deal he was on a committee to purchase for the State, and suggested to the representative of the furniture people that there "ought to be something in it." He wanted about $2,000. Finally they promised him $1,500. He did not think there was anything wrong about that. On the stand before the investigating committee he said he did not think there was anything wrong about it. He said it did not come out of the State; that the agent of the company simply took it out of his commission, and he thought he might just as well have it as anybody; and he regretted very much that he finally did not get it, and expressed that regret on the stand before this committee.

That is the kind of man Holstlaw is. The prosecuting attorney's office at Springfield found out about this furniture deal. They found a letter that he had written to one of the representatives of the furniture company. When Holstlaw came back from a church convention in Baltimore, to which he was a delegate, he was called before the grand jury and asked if he had written a certain letter, and he said "No." Then he was allowed to go out of the grand jury room, and they indicted him for perjury. They then advised him of his indictment.

As soon as Holstlaw learned of the indictment for perjury he remembered that he had written the letter, and wanted to go back and explain the matter. He requested of Mr. Burke, the prosecuting attorney, possibly through one of the deputy sheriffs, to be allowed to come back before the grand jury and explain. Burke sent word to him that he would not be permitted to come back unless he told all he knew about the Lorimer deal.

My recollection is that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] yesterday gave the impression that LORIMER was not mentioned until the time a statement was being prepared in the office of his attorneys. But he overlooked the testimony of Mr. Holstlaw in which he said that one of the deputy sheriffs came to him and told him that Burke would not let him come back until he told all about the Lorimer deal. That was repeated, and he told that to his attorneys. Then his attorneys talked with Burke, and they brought back the same word.

What about Holstlaw? Is he a brave man? Is he a courageous man? No! He is more cowardly in his nature than White himself; more cowardly than Beckemeyer; more cowardly than Link. Holstlaw was ready to swear to anything in order to get immunity. He passed an almost sleepless night, he says, thinking over this matter. He had also put up a cash bail of $5,000; and I have an idea that the possible loss of that $5,000 worried him more than almost anything else. He was ready to swear to anything the next morning in order to get immunity, and to get back his $5,000.

Then Holstlaw told his attorneys this Lorimer story. First Burke sent word that he would not let him off until he told all about the Lorimer deal. I do not contend that Burke was in any conspiracy in regard to the matter. I think probably Burke had sized up Holstlaw. He knew his connection with corruption in connection with the furniture deal, and he probably thought he would "take a chance" on getting something out of him in connection with LORIMER.

Holstlaw, with his cowardly nature, with his avaricious disposition, was looking for any opportunity to get rid of that indictment. He was willing to say anything, and he knew that connecting LORIMER with corruption would get him immunity. Burke insisted on a written statement. So he told his attorneys who had been recommended to him by the sheriff's or prosecuting attorney's office of the furniture deal, and then that Broderick came to him the day before the election, I believe it was, and said, "We will elect Senator LORIMER to-morrow," and he said, "Yes; I am going to vote for him." Then Broderick said, "There is $2,500 in it for you." He told his attorneys that Broderick's statement had nothing to do with his vote; that he intended to vote for LORIMER anyhow; and that he did not expect anything for his vote. They prepared a statement, and prepared it in the way that they knew would bring immunity to this man. They prepared that statement, not as Holstlaw had given it to them, not as Holstlaw intended, but prepared it so as to make Holstlaw say that Broderick had said he would give him $2,500 if he voted for LORIMER. That was the idea. In other words, that statement was prepared in the way of a direct confession that he had received $2,500 in consideration of his vote for LORIMER.

He read it over, probably, in a hurry. He said himself he did not pay much attention to it. No; he did not care. He wanted to get immunity. He was ready to sign anything that would get it for him. And it is significant that his attorneys would prepare a statement of that character for their client, a statement that made him confess that he had voted for a United States Senator for a consideration, when he had told them that there was no consideration for his vote; that he had intended to vote for LORIMER before; that he would have voted for him anyhow; and that he did not expect anything for his vote, and that the $2,500 was not paid him for his vote. Notwithstanding he had told his attorneys that, they did not put anything of that kind in this statement. Not only that, they wrote the statement, as I said, in such a way as to make him confess he received $2,500 for his vote. That would be hard to understand if the record did not show by a number of reputable and reliable witnesses that at the very time these men were preparing this statement for Holstlaw, as his attorneys, they were employed by the Chicago Tribune in connection with the White story. Senators, what do you think of such action? What do you think of attorneys acting for their client preparing a statement for him contrary to his statement to them, and acting at the same time for the political opponents of Senator LORIMER, and framing that statement so as to support their contention in regard to his election? What do you think about their preparing a statement for their client to sign making him confess to bribery, when he had told them the contrary? I am not surprised that he signed it. Many a man signs an affidavit prepared by his attorneys. It often does not state exactly what he intended. He does it innocently. Holstlaw did not intend what was put in that statement. He probably paid little attention to it when he signed it. He wanted immunity. He was willing to sign almost anything to get it and the return of his $5,000. Holstlaw swears now, and swore from the beginning, and swore repeatedly, that the statement in that declaration was not correct, and that he had not been promised and he did not expect a single dollar for his vote for LORIMER. What reason was there for him not to tell the truth in regard to this matter before this investigating committee? He was not under indictment then. An order of immunity had been entered in the court. There had been a judgment of the court giving him immunity for the furniture deal and for the Lorimer matter. There was no earthly reason why he should not tell the truth, and, in my judgment, he did tell the truth when he said he did not expect and did not get a dollar for his vote for LORIMER, and his vote for LORIMER was just as honest a vote, so far as any corruption in connection with it was concerned, as the vote of any man in that legislature.

Why, Holstlaw had told his neighbors, days before the election, that he was going to vote for LORIMER; he had told quite a number, and he named quite a number of men whom he told he was going to vote for LORIMER. It was known about the legislature that he expected to vote for LORIMER if he was a candidate. And what reason would there be for his asking for something for his vote, or expecting something for his vote?

But the suggestion comes—and it has already been suggested by some of the Senators—why did Broderick pay him $2,500 if he had not promised to do it? Broderick did not pay Holstlaw $2,500. He paid him $3,200; that is what he paid him, if he paid him anything. He paid him $2,500 at one time and then $700 at another time—$3,200 altogether. No one contends that he got more than $2,500 for voting for LORIMER, and yet he says that when Broderick paid him the $2,500 he said there would be $700 more, or some more soon, showing that it all came from the same source. You can take Holstlaw's story from any angle, and there is nothing in it that supports the theory or the contention that he voted for LORIMER with the hope or expectation, or under a promise, of receiving money. He never had the talk with Broderick that he relates. He may have told him he would vote for LORIMER, but Broderick never told him he would get $2,500 for it. It is incredible that he would do so when he knew Holstlaw was going to vote for LORIMER. He would not do it so openly and boldly as related by Holstlaw, and there is absolutely nothing in the record showing that Broderick was taking any special interest in LORIMER's election or that he expected anything from his election or that he had received any money from any source to assist in LORIMER's election. No; that $3,200 came from some other source, and was paid to Holstlaw for some other reason; what, I do not know.

This committee has been unable to find where that money came from. I have my opinion, based upon certain facts appearing in the record and pointed out by the Senator from Vermont in his remarkably able and exhaustive speech. Holstlaw knew before he entered into his campaign for his election that he would be reimbursed for his expenses, and that was the purpose of the $3,200. This is the character of the men and the character of the testimony upon which it is expected to deny Senator LORIMER his seat. I can not analyze it all. It is easy for anyone to find something in the several thousand pages of the record to sustain any contention he may desire to make. If he simply wants to find something in the record pointing to a given theory, he can find it. I have tried to weight all the evidence from every standpoint, and I concede that other Senators have done the same thing. I am firmly convinced that these men did not get any money for voting for LORIMER.

I am firmly convinced that they did not vote for him in the hope or expectation of getting any money; and, believing that as strongly as I do, I can not vote otherwise than to sustain his right to a seat here.

It is suggested in the minority report that there were other men who got some money for voting for LORIMER, and they mention Representative Wheelan. What is the basis for charging that Wheelan got money for voting for LORIMER? Absolutely nothing, except that he voted for him and that, I think in October of that year, he paid $1,900 for a home, paying $1,000 down, I believe, and giving a mortgage for the balance, and that there were some hundred-dollar bills in this payment. That is all they have got in the record to connect Wheelan with the election of LORIMER corruptly. He voted for him. Several months afterwards he bought him a home. I want to submit, Senators, that if you are going to convict men on testimony like that, there is no man elected to the United States Senate but that somebody can bring something against him, bring up the fact that some man who voted for him had a little money a short time afterwards, and say that he should be excluded from this body.

What did the committee do with reference to Wheelan? Why, we called Wheelan before us. He gave his testimony. He told about the money he had paid for that home. He told about the $100 bills that he had, and told where he got them. What did we do then? We did not stop there. We called the men that he said he got the money from, and inquired of them with reference to their private affairs and their business relations, and had them explain where this money came from. One of these men had been prosecuting attorney of his county, a man of reputation, standing, and ability. He loaned Wheelan some money; $700 I think it was. He told where he got the money and explained all about it. We called the other man, from whom Wheelan got $300, a hard-working man, a stonecutter I think he was. He had saved up a little money. He loaned Wheelan $300. He had three $100 bills. He told how he got them. He said that he had had money in one bank and took it out and put it in another bank, and he had saved up some money in small bills, and he put that in and took it out in $100 bills. But it is contended that Wheelan sold his vote for LORIMER and that these facts prove it. I can not accept such proof as showing corruption, but I find no fault with other Senators who may see in those transactions evidence conclusive of corruption. If they do prove corruption, however, it seems to me it will not be very difficult to show corruption in connection with any election. No man is safe, however innocent he may be.

Then they say Tippit, the other Democratic leader, or, rather, the leader of the other Democratic faction of the legislature, was corrupt. They said he paid money to Blair for his vote for LORIMER, and therefore Tippit's vote is corrupt. Senators, I agree with the contention that the bribe giver is just as corrupt as the bribe taker. I do not know but he is worse, if there is any difference in degree. And if Mr. Tippit was corrupt, if Mr. Tippit did pay this money to Blair for his vote for LORIMER, then his vote was corrupt and should be excluded.

But what is the proof that Tippit furnished Blair money? Poor Blair! I feel sorry for him, wrecked body and mind by drink, a man who had had considerable practice as a lawyer and of good native ability. The testimony shows that while he was in the legislature he was drunk pretty nearly all the time. The poor fellow was drunk, also, when he came before our committee, and he told a rambling, inconsistent story. Yet I am not surprised at that. He could not have told a consistent story in the condition that he was in. The testimony shows that he probably was in Olney on a certain day, and the next day he was up at Centralia, where they had a ball game. Somebody saw him with some money. Tippit says that he did not see Blair in Olney, which was his home. Some one unfriendly to Tippit swears that he did see Tippit and Blair together in Olney; and from this they contend that Tippit bribed Blair, or, rather, paid Blair for his vote for LORIMER. Tippit had been elected six times for 12 years, to the legislature of his State. Nobody attacks his reputation for truth and veracity—a man of high character, of high standing in the community and the Democratic Party. Yet on this testimony they conclude that he paid Blair this money and that he paid it to him for his vote for LORIMER. Blair denies that he accepted money for his vote; that he was ever promised any money for his vote; that he ever got any money for his vote, or that he ever expected any money for his vote. He tried to explain where the 100 dollar bills came from. He said that he had saved up some at home, that his wife was keeping it, that he went down there before the ball game and got the money, and so on. We can not harmonize the statements in Blair's testimony with each other, but I submit that there is absolutely no proof that is to be regarded and considered as competent proof that shows that Blair received a dollar for his vote for LORIMER, or that it shows that Thomas Tippit ever paid him a dollar or ever promised him a dollar for his vote. So it is with the other members that they suggest must have been corrupt in connection with the election of LORIMER.

My judgment of the testimony in regard to it is that it is just as lacking in force, just as lacking in evidential relevancy, as that with reference to Tippit or Blair or Wheelan. They voted for LORIMER and they afterwards participated in some business transactions, which they explained fully and clearly, and all of which appeared to be perfectly honest and legitimate.

Now, I desire to notice the new testimony, the testimony upon which the Senate ordered a reinvestigation of this case.

First, I think I will say that the political situation, as I look at it—the political situation in Illinois—resulted inevitably in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER as United States Senator. As I look as those conditions I can not see why WILLIAM LORIMER should pay one dollar, even if he was disposed to do so, in order to secure his election. There was no earthly reason why he should do it. All the political conditions pointed to his election when his candidacy was brought up or suggested to the legislature. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] the other day spoke of the stage setting with reference to the political conditions as surrounding the election of Senator LORIMER, and he said that the Nation was divided into two great political parties differing on the tariff, and that that issue was before the country and being talked about everywhere. He said we were in extra session here trying to revise the tariff downward, and that the people of Illinois were sharply divided on this great question, and that it is inconceivable that so many Democrats would vote for Senator LORIMER—a Republican, a stalwart Republican, a man disagreeing with them upon all the fundamental principles of their party—unless they were corruptly influenced.

Mr. President, that was not the proper setting to give this question. The stage setting should not be in the National Capitol, should not be in national politics, but the stage setting for this senatorial election should be in the State of Illinois, where factional differences rent each party, and especially the Republican Party. Local divisions affected the people more than anything else. They were not looking at the national issues; they were looking at the State situation; they were looking at the State issues, at the State conditions, and we went at great length into these conditions in this hearing, as the record shows. That the Republican Party in Illinois was divided into factions; that the great political leaders of each faction were suspicious of each other; that they were charging each other with deception, with treachery, and all that sort of thing, is clearly shown. One thing, however, stands out prominently throughout this record and throughout the history of Illinois politics, as brought out by the testimony before us, and that is that with all their criminations and recriminations, with all their charges of treachery and violated promises, no suggestion is made that WILLIAM LORIMER has ever been untrue or unfaithful to a friend; that he ever had made a promise that he had not kept; that he ever violated his plighted word. I want to say that when a man can go through the politics in Illinois without some charge of that kind being brought against him it speaks more eloquently than anything that I can say for his truthfulness, manliness, and uprightness not only in his private or personal life but also in his political conduct.

Then they had had a great contest, rather a great agitation, over the deep-waterway proposition. Senator LORIMER had taken a very prominent stand with reference to this matter. He had gone up and down the State talking about the proposition. He had gone down the canal, down the Illinois River, down the Mississippi River, taking some of his colleagues with him in order to create a sentiment in favor of this great proposition. It was one in which Illinois and her people were vitally and specially interested. LORIMER had for years been the leader in the movement, not only in the State but in Congress.

Two divergent opinions were advanced in connection with it as to the best way to accomplish the result desired by all. One indorsed by the governor of the State, which was opposed by LORIMER; the other, indorsed by Senator LORIMER, was opposed by Gov. Deneen. This divided the forces in the legislature, irrespective of party affiliation. The Democratic Party was apparently in the minority, and largely favored LORIMER's idea. The Republicans were divided into political factions, and upon the canal issue. Senator Hopkins had secured the plurality vote in the primaries, but it was charged, apparently with some foundation, that he had not expected to abide by the primaries if it did not go his way, and therefore there were many in the legislature who did not consider the result of the primaries binding on them. He appeared to have no real, earnest, sincere friends in his own party and he was especially unpopular with the Democrats of the State. LORIMER was especially popular with the Democrats and with the members of his own party, regardless of factions.

I have taken from the record some statements made with reference to Senator LORIMER and Senator Hopkins and their relations to the Democrats that I want to submit as showing the political conditions not in the Nation, but in Illinois and at the State legislature. In my judgment, the members of the Illinois Legislature in considering the election of a Senator did not consider very much whether he was for a high tariff or a low tariff; whether he was a standpatter or a progressive. They were influenced almostly solely by local conditions, local differences, and the local effect. Many Republicans wanted to defeat Hopkins, and practically all the Democrats wanted to defeat him. With them it was anything to defeat Hopkins, there being no hope of electing a Democrat. That was the sole proposition with some of them. Thomas Tippit, the leader of one faction, said:

> At one week's end adjournment when I went to my home my wife suggested to me that Mr. Wilson, ex-Democratic State treasurer of Illinois, wanted to see me when I came home.

I want to say Mr. Wilson was the only Democrat elected to a State office in Illinois since the war up to that time. He was elected State treasurer.

> She stepped to the telephone and called him and told him I had come. He said he was indisposed; that he wanted to see me. I went over to his house, which joins my property, and he said, "What I wanted to see you about was this: Can not you Democrats get together and unite on some liberal Republican and beat that man Hopkins?" I said, "Yes; but what will become of us?" He said, "It will not hurt you; it will not hurt you."
> Mr. HANECY. When you quoted what you said, "What will become of us?" you touched your breast—you meant yourself?
> Mr. TIPPIT. Yes, sir. I meant what would become of us if we voted for a Republican for United States Senator, you understand. He said, "It will not hurt you; you can not elect a Democrat"—which we all knew. After further conversation I said to him, "Whom would you suggest?" "Well," he said, "I would say Shurtleff."
> Senator KENYON. Was this before the legislature met?
> Mr. TIPPIT. That was probably in February or March; I do not believe it was later than March.
> Senator KENYON. Was it after the legislature had met?
> Mr. TIPPIT. Oh, yes.
> Mr. HANECY. He said it was at the end of a week's session; at a week-end adjournment.
> Mr. TIPPIT. Yes; during the deadlock. He said, "I would suggest Shurtleff." I said, "Well, we have talked about that very thing; we have talked about Shurtleff; we do not think we could get enough votes for Mr. Shurtleff." I said, "What do you think of Mr. LORIMER?" I am referring to Mr. Wilson, you understand, who was not a member of the house. He is the first Democrat that has carried Illinois, I think, since the war. He said, "I do not like Mr. LORIMER so well, but anybody to beat Hopkins."

And he advised him to vote for LORIMER.

Now, that is from a prominent Democrat outside of the legislature. He was conferring with the leading Democrats of the legislature, and he gave his opinion as to what was wise for them to do. Anything to beat Hopkins was his advice, and there is no suggestion that he was acting corruptly. Mr. Tippit also stated:

> I could state further that it was my information, has been my information, and is now, that the election of Mr. LORIMER to the United States Senate was favored by Adlai E. Stevenson, late candidate for governor.

And you all remember that Mr. Stevenson was Vice President of the United States, and yet the Senator from Indiana would have us to believe that the bipartisan support given to Senator LORIMER was corrupt and that the support given him by Mr. Stevenson is to be condemned. Is there any Democrat in this Senate who believes that Adlai Stevenson would countenance corruption or a corrupt alliance, or that he was acting corruptly when he urged Democrats to vote for LORIMER? While it is true that many Republicans supported Adlai E. Stevenson for governor, there is nothing in the testimony showing that Mr. LORIMER supported him. They said LORIMER's friends supported him, and that Stevenson got a whole lot of Republican votes. That is true. Was it wrong for Democratic candidates to seek Republican votes? Was it proof of corruption that they got them? It was the natural result of the condition in Illinois. Some of the Republican witnesses said there were Republicans who voted for Stevenson not because they were Lorimer people, not because they liked Stevenson, but because they did not like Deneen; they did not like the Republican State administration. There was State-wide opposition to Gov. Deneen and the State administration regardless of Mr. LORIMER, and the attempt to hold LORIMER responsible for Deneen's small majority is unjustifiable.

Mr. Tippit said that he was informed that Mr. LORIMER had met with the Democratic committee and agreed to support Stevenson for governor. Mr. LORIMER emphatically denied this. Mr. Tippit said that he had been told this by somebody. He did not know it of his own knowledge, but he had been told that Senator LORIMER met with the Democratic State committee and agreed to support Stevenson; but Mr. LORIMER denies that. He said that he was not present with the committee, made no agreement of the kind, and no member of the committee testified to anything of that character. I think I have a statement from the National Democratic committeeman, showing just the contrary, which I will read a little later on.

Homer E. Shaw also testified as to the Democratic sentiment toward LORIMER. He, as I said, was one of the strongest men, and impressed me as being one of the most reliable men that came before our committee. Senator KERN was asking him as to the various reasons given by the members of the legislature for voting for LORIMER, and he said:

Mr. SHAW. They gave various reasons, Senator. I do not know that any of them said they were going to vote for Senator LORIMER, but there was a large number of Chicago Democrats who were extremely friendly to LORIMER, and we simply made no headway whatever in talking party politics to them.

Mr. Shaw tried to organize the Democrats of the legislature, and hold them from voting for any Republican. He got about 25, I think it was, to go into his organization; but that was all he could get, beause of the personal friendly feeling toward LORIMER.

Senator KERN. They seemed to have personal friendship for him?
Mr. SHAW. Personal friendship; yes.
Senator KERN. And they based their friendly feeling toward him on that?
Mr. SHAW. Yes.
Senator KERN. When you formed this organization first, was it understood that LORIMER would be a candidate for the Senate?
Mr. SHAW. Yes; I think it was rumored. I think that was the reason this organization was formed.
Senator KERN. You felt that he was the most formidable Republican?
Mr. SHAW. I knew that from the start. I knew that if any Republican could be elected on Democratic votes in the State of Illinois it would be WILLIAM LORIMER.
Senator KERN. You thought he was the one Republican who could probably get more Democratic votes than anyone else?
Mr. SHAW. Yes.
Senator KERN. You say that was your impression from the start. You mean from the beginning of the senatorial——
Mr. SHAW. From the day he was first voted for.

Senator LORIMER got 1 vote, I think, from about the 13th of May.

Senator KERN. From the day he was first voted for?
Mr. SHAW. Yes. He was voted for a great many days before he was elected, receiving just a few votes.
Senator KERN. And that was what you had to fight more than anything else—to get members of your organization?
Mr. SHAW. That seemed to be the principal trouble.
Senator KERN. The feeling toward LORIMER?
Mr. SHAW. The feeling toward LORIMER; yes. In fact, we made no headway with the Chicago people at all.

Mr. Lantz, a Democratic member of the legislature from Cook County, had a talk with Senator LORIMER possibly two weeks before he was elected, and says, as he recollected it:

The house had adjourned and Mr. LORIMER called me over and we sat and talked about the general condition of things, and he asked me what I thought about his being a candidate for United States Senator. I said that nothing would please me any better than to see him elected United States Senator. He wanted to know what I thought about the Democratic end of it supporting him, and I said, "Mr. LORIMER, I know that there is a very strong sentiment among the Democrats here that if the opportunity is ever offered to them they will vote for you for Senator. As to the extent of that sentiment I have no definite knowledge, but I know that it is extremely strong in your favor. If you can get votes enough by a combination of Democrats and Republicans, I would advise you to be a candidate."

Mr. Lantz voted for Gov. Deneen on one ballot and was affiliated with the Tippitt faction more than any other.

Democratic Senator Isley, who voted for Mr. Stringer to the end, said:

Mr. HANECY. That is not what I asked you, Senator. There was no Republican that you knew who stood as high with the Democrats because of the waterway fight Mr. LORIMER had made as Mr. LORIMER?
Mr. ISLEY. That is probably true.

And he goes on to say that Mr. LORIMER had a great many friends among the Democrats in the general assembly, having also stated that the Democrats had more knowledge of Senator LORIMER than any other Republican in the State.

Representative Espy, Democratic representative, said that he liked Senator LORIMER personally, and "I voted my own judgment, which was that I thought I was doing the best thing for the Democratic Party when I voted for Senator LORIMER."

There were some suggestions throughout the record here by some of the witnesses that they advised the Democrats to vote for LORIMER because they thought it would divide the Republican Party, and I submit that from a partisan standpoint that was a valid reason and a good reason, and the events have certainly justified this contention.

Representative Espy also says that while they were calling the roll on the final ballot he went into the speaker's room and Senator LORIMER asked him to vote for him, and "I told him I would, and went back and did it in 10 minutes. They were calling the roll then."

Mr. Browne's reason for supporting Senator LORIMER and the arguments that he used with his colleagues to secure their support—and they are good ones—are found on page 4922. (Vol. 4.) And on page 4925 he states that in all the conferences he had with Senator LORIMER there were no suggestions made as to the kind of arguments he should use with his colleagues.

Mr. Campbell, a Republican representative who voted for Hopkins, said this, as showing the views of some of the Republicans in regard to this matter, and those who were not friendly to Mr. LORIMER:

Mr. HANECY. You heard it generally talked of by Republicans and Democrats in Springfield before Mr. LORIMER was elected, that Mr. LORIMER was the most popular Republican with Democrats in Springfield or in the State, did you not?
Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh, yes.
Mr. HANECY. That was common talk there, was it not?
Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes.
Mr. HANECY. And that was largely because of Senator LORIMER'S campaign in the interest of the deep waterways measure, and because of what they claimed was his pleasing personality in coming in contact with people. Will you not please speak and not nod in answer?
Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not know whether you wanted me to answer that. Yes; I will say yes, sir, to that.
Mr. HANECY. The reporter might not get the nod.
It was the common talk in Springfield, before Senator LORIMER was elected, and all through that session, that Mr. LORIMER could get more votes from the Democratic members than any other Republican in the State, was it not?
Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. And those talks and those rumors were in no way coupled or connected, directly or indirectly, with any improper influences, were they?
Mr. CAMPBELL. Not to my knowledge.
Mr. HANECY. It was general talk, early in that session of the legislature and down to within a few weeks before Mr. LORIMER'S election, that Mr. LORIMER was not a candidate and did not want the Senatorship, but wanted to remain in the House, was it not?
Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not know whether I heard that or not. Possibly that is true; yes, sir.

I want to call this to the attention of the Senate as a significant circumstance, that from the beginning, when Senator LORIMER was approached by his friends in regard to being a candidate for the Senate, he absolutely refused, and said he did not want to leave the House of Representatives; that he occupied a position there upon the committee having charge of the waterway matters that he did not want to give up. Gov. Deneen himself testifies that he urged Senator LORIMER to be a candidate for the Senate, and that Senator LORIMER said no, he would not be. Senator LORIMER suggested to Deneen that they ought to get together and elect Shurtleff. Deneen said that he thought probably he could do it, but he urged him not to do it. He said, "If you have the power to elect Shurtleff, you have the power to elect yourself, and you ought to use it in a way that would increase your power and influence. You ought to be a candidate yourself." LORIMER told him no, and it was not until about 10 days before the election that Mr. LORIMER consented to be a candidate for the Senate.

I submit that the record shows that Mr. LORIMER was acting in perfect good faith in telling his friends that he did not want to be a candidate, and that he would not be a candidate for the Senate. Senator LORIMER did not consent to be a candidate until it appeared that no other Republican could be elected. Some of the Democrats feared that the Republicans might get together just before adjournment and elect Hopkins. The Democrats were afraid of that; they were afraid the Republicans would elect Hopkins; and hence they wanted to vote for LORIMER. Judge Cantrell, State committeeman from the southern part of the State, a man of high reputation and great influence in his party, not a member of the legislature, was asked by many Democrats for his advice as to voting for LORIMER, and he stated that he did not give his advice as a member of the State committee, but said:

"If I were a member of this general assembly I could tell you what I think I would do. In my judgment, it is good politics to vote for Senator LORIMER, for this reason: It is absolutely impossible to elect a Democrat. They had been in session there all those months, and the people throughout the country were getting tired of their doing nothing, and I said, 'I think it is good politics. Of course, if you could elect Mr. Stringer, you ought to vote for a Democrat.' But it had gotten to the point where they were voting complimentary votes for everybody around and were really making a farce of it on our side, as I thought. I said that, in my judgment, it was good politics to vote for Mr. LORIMER; and I gave as a reason for it—if that is proper for me to state."

Mr. HANECY. Yes; go on and tell what you said.

Mr. CANTRELL. That at that time there was a breach in the Republican Party—I had been somewhat familiar with the Republican conditions in my State for some time and I knew the two factions very well, the Lorimer faction and the Deneen faction, and I knew there was a break, and I said, "It will do more to widen that breach than anything we can do if you can elect LORIMER. It is either LORIMER or Hopkins, and of the two men personally I prefer LORIMER."

He says that he made these statements publicly and that everybody knew his position. My recollection is that he also states that 10 or 15 members of the legislature talked to him in regard to the matter. Mr. Donahue came before the committee. He was one of the strong men who testified and impressed the committee with his integrity, with his devotion to principle, and with his intelligence. He voted for Stringer all the way through, and this is what he said:

Mr. HANECY. You never knew or heard of any money being used to induce anybody to vote for Senator LORIMER, did you, before the Charlie White story that was published in the Tribune?

Mr. DONAHUE. No; I did not.

Mr. HANECY. It was common talk in Springfield at that time that Senator LORIMER was more popular with more Democrats than any other Republican in Illinois, was it not?

Mr. DONAHUE. That was the talk, and I guess that was true to a certain extent.

Mr. HANECY. And that was largely true, not merely because of Senator LORIMER'S personality, but because of his activity in the deep-waterway matters, was it not?

Mr. DONAHUE. Well, I do not know now. The reasons, I think, that we assigned for it were that there was a strong feeling against the present administration and LORIMER was never a very ardent supporter of the administration; at least that impression went out. I mean the present State administration.

You will note that they were not thinking about national affairs, about the tariff proposition, or anything of that sort, but it was the State administration; it was the State condition that was influencing the members of the legislature.

That may have made him popular to a certain extent among Democrats.

Mr. HANECY. That is, a great many Democrats were for Shurtleff, because Gov. Deneen was against him?

Mr. DONAHUE. That is right.

Mr. HANECY. And there were a great many Democrats for Senator LORIMER for Senator because Gov. Deneen was against him?

Mr. DONAHUE. That is right; yes. That is the way they were up and down my country. I felt that way to a certain extent myself. I did not believe very much in the present State administration, and of course that feeling was pretty general among the Democrats.

The Democratic national committeeman from Illinois, Mr. Roger Sullivan, came before the committee, and he throws considerable light upon the conditions there. It has been suggested by some that Senator LORIMER and Mr. Sullivan had a sort of a bipartisan alliance under which they worked together for mutual benefit. Mr. Sullivan was asked in regard to that.

Mr. HANECY. Did you tell Mr. Marble—

Mr. Marble was one of the committee's attorneys—that Mr. LORIMER had more political friends among Democrats in Illinois than any other Republican whom you knew of in the State?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I told him that he had a great many friends among the Democrats, and that he always had affiliated with the Democrats to a great extent, and that he was constantly boring into the Democrats by doing favors and things that would naturally get some of them; and I think I told Mr. Marble that I thought he was a very dangerous man from our point of view.

That suggests a statement contained in an address by one of the Senators—I think by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN]—that Senator LORIMER, by reason of his connection with politics in Illinois, had done a great many favors to Democrats, and that the record shows that he had secured positions for thousands of men, and this is held up against him. Is a man to be condemned for standing by his friends or doing a favor for a man when he comes to him and asks him to do it, whether in office in Cook County or whether as a Member of the House of Representatives? I venture to say that there is not a Senator in this body who, when a man comes and asks him to do something within the range of his official duties, does not do it without asking him his politics; and I venture to say that, if it comes to securing a position in an honest sort of way, an honorable position, there is not a man here who would ask whether the man applying for it is a Democrat or a Republican, unless he had somebody whom he wanted especially to favor in connection with that place. To me, instead of a matter of condemnation it is a matter of commendation that Senator LORIMER has stood by his friends and has stood by those who have helped him; and that in his official life, when men have applied to him for assistance, he has given it without asking whether they were Democrats or Republicans.

Again, Mr. Sullivan said:

I think that possibly in the past he has been able to do more with the Democrats than any other Republican I know of.

Mr. HANECY. And when you say because of favors he did for Democrats, you mean that whenever anybody went to Mr. LORIMER for favors Mr. LORIMER never stopped to ask him whether he was a Republican or a Democrat or a supporter of his or his enemy. That is a fact, is it not?

Mr. SULLIVAN. I do not think he ever stopped because the man was a Democrat. He generally helped them if he could. That is his reputation, anyway.

That may not be a good reputation for a man to have in Indiana, but it is in my State.

Mr. HANECY. It is a fact, is it not, that there is not anybody whom you know of in the State of Illinois who could get more Democratic votes, without regard to the Democratic leaders or the Democratic organization, than Mr. LORIMER?

Mr. SULLIVAN. Any Republican?

Mr. HANECY. Any Republican.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I should say that was so. Now, you know there has been a little sentiment created against Mr. LORIMER, and whether it would be so to-day or not I would not say.

Then pages 4412 and 4413 give Mr. Sullivan's ideas with reference to Republicans supporting Stevenson, and also give a very good idea as to the changing character of Illinois political affiliations, and show that a man might be a friend of Mr. LORIMER one year and working for him, while the next year he might be opposed to him and working for somebody else, and that Republican votes for Stevenson were cast for Stevenson, not because they were friendly to LORIMER, but because they were unfriendly to Deneen. Those who desire to get a pretty fair idea as to political conditions in Illinois can get it by reading Mr. Sullivan's testimony.

Mr. Sullivan also states that he has sufficient knowledge to affirm that no compact or agreement was made by the Democratic executive committee, or with any committee representing them, for Republican support of Stevenson, but they took advantage of the factional differences in the Republican Party to help Stevenson. This answers Tippit's statement to which I have heretofore referred.

George Alschuler was a Democrat, elected from Senator Hopkins's own county. He became a candidate for the legislature largely by reason of his antipathy to Hopkins and his desire to have him beaten for reelection to the Senate. He says this:

It made no difference to me who the man was, whether Mr. LORIMER or any other Republican of standing in the State, because I was there to do what I could to accomplish the defeat of Mr. Hopkins. The first day I went down there I commenced working against him as much as I could. I think it was three or four days previous to his election that Mr. LORIMER became an avowed candidate, although I think Senator McElvain voted for him a week before, gave him a vote, if I am not mistaken.

Bear in mind that George Alschuler was elected unanimously as the leader of the minority of the Democratic members of the legislature in the forty-seventh general assembly, following the election of Senator LORIMER and after he had voted for LORIMER for Senator.

It seems that the Democrats before the legislature was organized had some idea that they, being so much in the minority, might decide to vote for some Republican. Alschuler had that in mind, and he was so much opposed to Hopkins that he wanted to be sure that anything he might do might not tend to result in the election of Hopkins; and it seems that Browne, in seeking to be minority leader, was taking a paper around to every Democrat to sign who wanted to support him. He brought this paper to Alschuler, and Alschuler said:

When it came to signing up I said, "Mr. Browne, I do not believe in this signing up. I am for you and I will vote for you." He said, "There are several here who will not sign up unless you do." I remember very plainly that I said to Browne at that time, "All right; I will sign up under one condition." He wanted to know what that was, and I said under the condition that if the time ever arose that Mr. Hopkins—no; I do not think I put it in that way—that I wanted him to pledge me that he would never be for Hopkins; knowing, as I said before, that there were a number of Republicans who were antagonistic to Hopkins and who would not vote for him. Then I signed up, and from that time on, of course, Mr. Browne and I consulted, off and on, at different times.

That illustrates the intense opposition, especially on the part of the Democrats to Mr. Hopkins, and generally their desire to elect some one other than he, and that they were willing to vote for any Republican in order to defeat Hopkins. Then Alschuler stated that some argument was made that to elect LORIMER would have a tendency to break up the machine in Illinois. I submit that in view of the sentiment throughout the country now against machines that ought to have been considered a very laudable purpose. The cry now is "anything to crush the machine" or "to break the machine," even if a new one must take its place; and one of the purposes of the election of LORIMER, according to Alschuler, was to break up the machine in Illinois.

Senator KERN. Which machine were you referring to?

Mr. ALSCHULER. The Hopkins machine. And with others I used the argument that Hopkins in all his career as Congressman and Senator never had had a kind word to speak of a Democrat; that in his addresses he had vilified them; and that any of them who had heard him speak would bear me out in the statement I made. A great many of them were very anxious to defeat him. They had nearly all heard him deliver speeches. There is such a thing as having decency among political enemies, but Hopkins was vicious toward the Democratic Party at all times, unreasonably so, and was very unpopular, and I honestly felt——

There he was interrupted by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] who was very persistent in his inquiry of the Democratic members in regard to Senator LORIMER'S attitude on national questions and his adherence to national policies. The answers almost invariably show that they did not consider those things at all; that it was the local and State conditions that moved them. For instance, Senator KERN asked:

Senator KERN. And so far as you knew, they were both strictly loyal Republicans?

Referring to Hopkins and LORIMER—

Mr. ALSCHULER. Yes, sir. It made no difference to me who it was. I was there to try to defeat Hopkins, right from the start.

Senator KERN. Even if you had to vote for a stronger Republican than Hopkins in order to do so?

Mr. ALSCHULER. Yes.

I am not going to take the time to read some additional statements that I have here from Senator Donahue in regard to these matters; but they carry out exactly the same idea that the great result the Democrats wanted to bring about at that session of the legislature, so far as the Senatorship was concerned, knowing that they could not elect their own man, was to beat Hopkins, and they would vote for any Republican to do it.

Right at this point, because I have the memorandum here, I am going to refer to a little matter that I do not think really amounts to anything; yet something was attempted to be made out of it during the hearing, and I think some suggestions regarding it were made by the Senator from Indiana in his speech. That was in regard to the large number of janitors employed in the forty-sixth general assembly. The impression was given that many persons were given positions where they had nothing to do, and that those positions were given to them from improper motives, or something of that sort. A great many questions were asked as we went along during the testimony in regard to those janitors. Some men said, "Oh, yes; there were 150 janitors, and some of them had nothing to do"; and they never saw any of them doing anything, and it seemed to be taken for granted that there was a loose way of filling places that were not necessary. Yet there was one witness who came before the committee who did not take mere gossip and mere suggestion in regard to this matter, and that was Mr. Donahue. Mr. Donahue was asked about this:

Senator KENYON. We have had testimony before us that there were 150 janitors in that session. Is that correct?

Mr. DONAHUE. I do not think it is correct.

Mr. Donahue was asked to give the reasons why he made this answer. He was not speaking carelessly; he was not speaking loosely; he was not speaking from mere rumor or suggestion or newspaper report; but he had actually investigated the matter, and this is what he said of it:

I know there was a statement of that kind made, and I called at the auditor's office to get a report. The auditor is required by the constitution of the State to publish a detailed report of the number of employees during the session of the legislature.

Senator KENYON. Have you that report with you?

Mr. DONAHUE. No; I have not. I looked the matter up and found out that was not true.

Senator KENYON. That was after the testimony given in this committee?

Mr. DONAHUE. I think the committee of seven wrote it up a year ago last summer. They were some reformers that were reforming the State, and I think they made a statement that there were 300 or 400 employees, and I had business down at Springfield, and I called at the auditor's office. I knew he was required to have a list of the employees, and to publish it, because no money can be taken out of the State treasury except by warrant of the State auditor and cashed by the treasurer. You can get the list there. He had a published statement of it, and the other statement was not true.

Senator KENYON. How many janitors were there?

Mr. DONAHUE. If I recollect correctly, if I averaged them all up during the time of the employment, some men were only employed a day and some would be employed probably 4 days, and some 10 days, and I think they averaged probably 50 or 60 all told.

Mr. President, this shows the political conditions in the State of Illinois; it shows that the conditions in the Republican Party pointed toward Senator LORIMER and that the conditions in the Democratic Party pointed almost irresistibly to Senator LORIMER as the only man who could defeat Senator Hopkins. His election was the logical and almost inevitable outcome of the political conditions and the expenditure of a single dollar was wholly unnecessary, even if there had been any inclination to resort to bribery or corruption.

The testimony shows that at one time during the session of the legislature there was a serious proposition made to elect Gov. Deneen, and Senator LORIMER favored it. He was not a candidate; he did not want to be elected; he was ready to elect Gov. Deneen; but Gov. Deneen decided that he would not take the office. Then it was suggested that Shurtleff, having received a large vote for speaker among the Democrats, could probably secure the Democratic support; but it was found that he could not secure enough of the Republican votes to elect him. So it went on through that legislature, until finally, when they were getting near the time of adjournment, when everybody was tired and the Democrats fearful that the Republicans would get together and elect Hopkins, were ready almost to a man to support Senator LORIMER, and a great many of Gov. Deneen's friends, outside of the legislature and in the legislature, voted for Senator LORIMER; and he was elected. "But," it is said, "charges of corruption were made the day of the election and subsequently."

There was some talk, or rather hints, of corruption like you will find in or at the close of every political contest. I do not believe I have ever been familiar with any hard political contest where the defeated candidate or his friends did not charge that corruption was used to defeat him; and not long since the papers were filled with charges that corruption was being used in behalf of candidates for the highest office in the gift of the people. If we are to believe newspaper reports, if we are to take rumors and suggestions as conclusive, if we are to take the statements of those disappointed by defeat or their friends as absolutely true, then we will have to conclude that there is no purity in our political contests and in our political institutions.

If I believed this, I would despair of the Republic. I do not believe it. There were some suggestions made and opinions expressed that men had been corrupted; that members of the legislature had been improperly influenced; and it was suggested—and this was the principal reason given in the record for the suspicion that members voted corruptly—that it could not be explained why 53 Democrats should vote for a Republican except on the theory that there was something wrong about it. That suggestion was made on the floor of the Senate the other day.

I wish the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] were here, because I desire to refer to a suggestion that he made in his address. He said this:

But I say, in a legislature where there is a close and a serious contest and a Democrat votes for any Republican for the position of United States Senator it is a strong presumption, to my mind, that there is something wrong either with his head or his morals, or both, and probably both.

And he goes on further and comments along this same line as follows:

I have heard and read long, entertaining, and learned explanations of why those 53 Democrats in the Illinois Legislature voted for Mr. LORIMER, a Republican.

Mr. MYERS entered the Chamber.

Mr. JONES. I see the Senator from Montana is now present. I am referring to a statement he made in his address the other day in regard to 53 Democrats voting for a Republican, in which he said:

I meet those arguments with the simple declaration that whenever there is a serious contest in a legislature over the election of a United States Senator, and when under those circumstances a Democrat who is a member of that legislature votes for a Republican for United States Senator there is something the matter either with his head or his morals, or both.

I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether or not he would make the same statement with reference to a large number of Republicans voting for a Democrat?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. I am not now arguing that kind of a case. When we get to that kind of a case I may have something to say about it. But, nevertheless, I will waive that and answer the Senator's question now, and say yes; that in a closely contested election, where a few votes may turn it one way or another, and there is a chance for the Republicans to defeat a Democratic candidate for United States Senator, if the Republican members of the legislature are sincere and honest in their convictions, and vote for a Democratic candidate for United States Senator, when there would be a chance otherwise to defeat him, there is something the matter either with their heads or their morals, probably; generally both.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the Senator from Montana did not intend to reflect upon any Member of this body who has secured his election in this sort of a way and against whom no question has been raised and against whom, in my judgment, no question can be raised or ought to be raised; but it did seem to me that the statement by the Senator from Montana, that the simple fact that 53 Democrats voted for a Republican was proof almost conclusive that they were wrong in their heads and in their morals, was something which the Senator really did not intend to say, because one of the honorable Senators in this body, one of the honorable Senators on this investigating committee, was elected to this body after a contest, a serious contest, by the vote of 32

Republicans and 34 Democrats, and his majority on that ballot was only 2.

Yet, as to that Senator, no man will charge that because he, a Democrat, got those Republican votes they were corrupt or that he was guilty of corruption; and though some people were to charge it on this floor, I would not believe it. I am satisfied that the political conditions in the State of Tennessee when my honored colleague, the Senator from Tennessee, was elected reasonably explain the Republican vote being cast for him, and I will say that for one I am glad they cast it, and I am glad they sent him to this body.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES. With pleasure.

Mr. LEA. A statement referring to my election having been made, I desire that all the facts in the case be known.

It is true I received 32 Republican votes when I was elected, but the contest that day was between Democrats; and those Republicans who had voted for me had previously, by cooperation with one faction of the Democrats in Tennessee politics growing out of a condition occasioned by the murder of a former Senator, elected 10 members of the two highest courts in Tennessee, a governor, a railroad commissioner, three members of the election commission, and the speaker of the house, and had cast their votes for other Democrats who were candidates for the Senate before they voted for me; and on the ballot on which I was voted for the real contest, as far as the Republicans were concerned, was between two Democrats.

Mr. JONES. The Senator did not need to make that explanation so far as I am concerned. I simply wanted to meet the statement of the Senator from Montana, that the mere fact that 53 Democrats had voted for a Republican was evidence that they were wrong in their heads and in their morals, with the showing that Republicans had voted for a Democrat in proportionately the same number, and no suspicion, even, had arisen of corruption.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Washington has not given my full statement on that occasion. I went further and said that it was sufficient to challenge suspicion, and to my mind was a presumption that there was something the matter under such circumstances with the head or the morals of the legislators. I did not say it was a conclusive presumption or that it was proof.

I did not have in mind, however, the instance of the Senator from Tennessee, which the Senator from Washington has referred to. In that case there being no charge of anything being wrong with the morals of those Republican legislators, it is possible that from a political standpoint there was something the matter with their heads. I believe that Republicans generally render the greatest service of their lives to the country when there is nothing the matter with their heads under such circumstances.

Mr. JONES. Of course I understand the Senator from Montana did not have the case of Tennessee in mind when he made the declaration. If he had, I do not think he would have made it at all. It is peculiar, to say the least, that Democrats are believed corrupt when they vote for a Republican, but Republicans are not corrupt when they vote for a Democrat.

In order that I may do no injustice at all, I will read again the exact language the Senator used in his address the other day:

It is a strong presumption, to my mind, that there is something wrong either with his head or his morals or both, and probably both.

Mr. MYERS. Under such circumstances they have to show me that the election was right.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, so much for the political conditions in Illinois, which to my mind, as I have said, pointed inevitably to the election of Senator LORIMER by that legislature, and that too without the necessity of the expenditure of a single dollar corruptly. The political situation disclosed in this record, in my judgment, would of itself justify my vote in this case in favor of Senator LORIMER instead of against him as it was before.

Mr. President, I desire to notice for a short while the allegations of new evidence upon which this reinvestigation was ordered by the Senate. It was charged in the Senate that there was some evidence available which was not available when we had the other hearing and when the Senate rendered its verdict. It was alleged that one Clarence S. Funk had stated that Edward Hines had told him that a hundred thousand dollar fund had been raised for the election of Senator LORIMER, and that Mr. Funk was asked that his company contribute to that fund.

This was investigated by the Illinois Legislature. They passed a resolution asking the Senate to reinvestigate this matter. The Senate passed a resolution appointing a committee to do it, and we looked into it. We investigated it thoroughly and fully, and we reached the conclusion that not only had Mr. Hines not made this statement to Mr. Funk, but that even if he had made it to Mr. Funk, there is absolutely no proof in this record that any such fund was raised, or that any such fund was raised by Mr. Hines or contributed to by him, or that any such fund or any part of it was expended by Mr. Hines in assisting in the election of Mr. LORIMER. Now, I am not going into the testimony in detail, but I am going to notice it just in a general way.

Clarence S. Funk says that Mr. Hines made a certain statement. Edward Hines says he did not make it. Now, of course, anyone who believes Mr. Funk, regardless of Mr. Hines, regardless of the witnesses corroborating Mr. Hines, will conclude that the $100,000 fund was raised. But I submit that according to this record Mr. Hines is just as reputable a man in business, in private life, in personal character and standing in his community as Mr. Funk is; and in saying that I do not disparage Mr. Funk's character in any way, shape, or form. Mr. Funk says that he met Mr. Hines in the Union League Club in Chicago, and that Mr. Hines said to him: "You are just the man I am looking for. Several of us raised a hundred thousand dollar fund to elect Mr. LORIMER. I am going out now getting some of our friends to put up to take care of it. We had to act quickly;" and that he thought Mr. Funk or his company should put up about $10,000. That is the substance of what occurred, Mr. Funk says.

Mr. Hines denied this story absolutely, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to the discrepancies that appear in Mr. Funk's story as related by Mr. Kohlsaat and as related by Mr. Funk himself.

Mr. Kohlsaat is the man who brought these matters to the attention of the Illinois Legislature. He had written letters to Members of the Senate while we were considering this proposition. He wrote a letter to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in which he stated this:

Sometime last June—

By the way, the testimony shows here that this conversation occurred in May instead of June.

Some time last June I met a friend who is general manager of a Chicago corporation with a capital of over $25,000,000. He said, "I have been intending to call on you for some days to tell you of an incident that occurred right after LORIMER's election a year ago. I had a visit from Edward Hines, the lumberman, and he told me that LORIMER's friends had had the opportunity of electing him to the Senate by putting up $100,000; that they had only a few days before the adjournment of the legislature and could not take the time to go around and raise the money, so a half dozen of LORIMER's friends—

Now, Mr. Funk in his version of this story of Mr. Hines does not mention any number of men that Mr. Hines had suggested—

"So a half dozen of LORIMER's friends underwrote the $100,000 and gave it to the proper agent"—

Mr. Funk does not say in his narration of the conversation that Mr. Hines said that they had raised this money and given it to an agent—

"LORIMER was elected and we are now asking some of the corporations to pay in their share. I am taking care of the down-town district, and another man (mentioning his name) has charge of the stock yards"—

Mr. Funk in his relation of the conversation as stated by Mr. Hines does not say anything about Mr. Hines saying he had taken the down-town district and that another man had taken the stockyard district, mentioning his name—

"We figure that your share will be $10,000." My friend answered substantially as follows: "I can not give you any money, for two reasons: First, we are not in that kind of business; and, second, if you have gotten yourselves into a hole, why should you expect us to pull you out?"

Yet Mr. Funk says nothing about anything of that sort in his relation of the conversation had with Mr. Hines, although Kohlsaat got his story from Funk. To accept Funk's statements as true is to declare not only Mr. Hines a perjurer, but also Mr. Baker, Mr. Carney, and Mr. Tilden, because Mr. Funk says that Mr. Hines said, "You send this money to Ed Tilden."

Of course if Hines said that to Funk, Hines had had some prior conversation with Tilden, and had some understanding with him about receiving this money. Yet Mr. Tilden swears positively that nothing of the kind had occurred; that he never received any such money, knew nothing of any such fund, and had nothing whatever to do with it, and neither Mr. Hines nor anyone else had ever said anything to him about it.

It is said that Mr. Funk is a man of high character and of great business attainment. So far as the record shows, the same can be truthfully said of Mr. Hines. His character is unimpeached, and his business standing unexcelled. So it is with Baker, Carney, and Tilden. Against Baker and Carney no charges whatever are made in connection with the election of Senator LORIMER. They have no interest in the matter one way or the other, and their testimony is as impartial as testimony could be. The record shows that Carney and Baker were with Hines at the time the alleged conversation took place. They swear they were present and they all substantially corroborate Hines and contradict Funk. Upon what theory or in accordance with what rules of evidence can we say that Funk's uncorroborated word shall be held to outweigh that of Hines, Baker, Carney, and Tilden? You can do it only by wanting to believe Funk and by wanting to disbelieve Hines, Baker, Carney, and Tilden.

That Hines would have the good sense and the cunning to absolutely conceal his activity in the raising and distribution of such a fund, and then have no more caution than to openly and boldly state to a casual acquaintance in a public place that he had done that which would send him to the penitentiary for years, is incredible. It seems to me it is a most significant circumstance that while nobody can trace any of this money to Hines, while nobody can find where he drew out any money for this fund, while nobody can find that he had anything to do, through agency or otherwise, with matters at Springfield, while he was so cunning as to conceal all this, yet it is claimed that he was so incautious and so foolish as to openly and publicly make this statement to a casual acquaintance. It is too incredible for me to believe.

Hines may have thought he had done much to secure Senator LORIMER's election. He was no doubt impressed with what he considered the confidence placed in him by men of power and influence in the Republican Party, and he may have magnified his own efforts and boasted of them. But I am convinced that he never made the statement attributed to him.

It was suggested by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] that it is a suspicious circumstance that Mr. Hines went to his bank upon his arrival in Chicago on the morning of the election; and it is suggested by inference that he went there to get money to be used in connection with Mr. LORIMER's election.

If Mr. Hines had money at that bank and drew it out, he could draw it out only by check, and there would be a record made of it. The experts of the committee examined the records of the Continental Bank and found no evidence of such a transaction. They examined the books of Edward Hines and of the Edward Hines Lumber Co. and its subsidiary companies and of the banks in which they had deposits. They found no trace of any corrupt fund or corrupt payments.

This would be the only theory upon which Mr. Hines's visit to the bank would be suspicious. We are not told, however, that the experts of the committee examined the accounts of that bank and found no trace of any suspicious transaction. Yet this is a fact; and if Mr. Hines had gone to the bank to secure money for this purpose, that fact would have appeared. If he had drawn out a large sum then or near that time it would have given rise to suspicion, but he did not.

No one except Funk has been found to say that he was approached by Hines and asked to contribute to this fund. Yet Funk's statement of what he claims Hines said to him would indicate that Hines had been seeing others, or expected to see others, and ask them to contribute to this fund. If any other persons had been approached in a similar way they very likely would have said something about it. If Hines openly approached a casual acquaintance like Funk on a matter of this kind, he would have appproached others, and we would have heard more of it; but we are asked to believe that Hines, a friend of LORIMER, went to Funk, an enemy of LORIMER, and openly and brazenly told him that LORIMER's election was bought and asked him to contribute to the corruption fund.

There appears to have been no suggestion that Funk should say nothing about the matter, that he should keep it quiet, or that he should treat the suggestion in confidence. The story is so improbable and so incredible upon its face that it deserves no consideration whatever; and in view of the fact that Hines is corroborated by absolutely disinterested witnesses, as well as by the testimony of those who may be said to have an interest, and yet who are of just as high character as Funk, no credence at all is to be placed in Funk's story.

It is not necessary to notice Hines's version of this conversation. But I submit that his version of the conversation which he testifies took place between him and Funk is entirely reasonable, in no wise improbable, and a very natural one. It is clearly shown that there was a conversation at the Union League Club between Mr. Hines and Mr. Funk on, I think, the 27th day of May. Mr. Hines states that Mr. Funk congratulated him upon the election of Senator LORIMER. This was natural. There was nothing improper about that. He then made the suggestion to Mr. Hines that Mr. LORIMER had no doubt been put to considerable expense. That was a very natural suggestion. There was nothing unreasonable about that, and nothing improper about it. He then suggested that the Senator should not have to bear all of this expense, and that his people would be glad to contribute it.

While I do not believe in contributions by corporations to candidates for office, whether successful or not, there is nothing especially improper in a suggestion after the election that they will bear some of the expense, although I am satisfied that if this suggestion had been made to Mr. LORIMER—as it probably was made, through Mr. Hines—he would not have accepted it. No special complaint seems to be made of great interests openly contributing to the expenses of candidates for nomination to the highest office in the Republic. I think it a shame that it is done, and I hope the time will soon come when public opinion and statute law will not tolerate it.

This did not suggest an unusual course. It was a very natural suggestion. In view of the fact that Mr. Funk and his people had not been very friendly to Senator LORIMER, and in view of the fact that as a Member of the House Mr. LORIMER had opposed some matters in which they were interested, it was natural that Mr. Funk should desire to get on friendly terms with Mr. LORIMER, and he no doubt thought this was a good way to accomplish that result. Personally I have no doubt that this suggestion was made to Mr. Hines by Mr. Funk.

To a certain extent Senator LORIMER corroborates Mr. Hines. He testifies to a conversation, a few days after his election, in which Mr. Hines told him that Funk wanted to meet him. Mr. Hines testifies that Funk said he would like to meet the Senator. Mr. Hines said he told him he would do what he could toward having him meet the Senator, and he testifies to a conversation on the following Sunday, when he mentioned the matter to Senator LORIMER. Senator LORIMER at first did not care to meet Mr. Funk, because he considered him one of his strong enemies; but when Mr. Hines told him of his anxiety to meet him, he said he would do it. Mr. LORIMER says he does not remember whether or not Mr. Hines suggested to him that Mr. Funk might pay some of his expenses, but that if Mr. Hines did suggest anything of this kind he told him that his expenses did not amount to anything; that he neither smoked nor drank, and that all the expense he was put to was for his trips to Springfield and return, which he would have had to incur anyway on account of the controversy over the waterway proposition.

According to all the rules of evidence and according to human experience, Funk's story is unbelievable. There is no truth in it, and it should be given no consideration by this body. What his motives were in giving it out, I do not propose to discuss.

In an attempt to bolster up his story, Funk relates another conversation which he says occurred sometime after this first conversation. He testifies before the committee that after the 15th of February, after an editorial had appeared in one of the Chicago papers charging the raising of a $100,000 fund, Mr. Hines came to his office, greatly agitated, and tried to explain to him that their conversation of a few days before—note it had, in fact, been almost a year before—had been misconstrued, or that Funk had misunderstood it, or something of that sort. Mr. Funk passed it off, and Hines went away.

Before the Senate committee, and before the Helm committee, Mr. Funk said that this second conversation occurred after the appearance of the editorial of February 15, 1911. Mr. Hines, however, came before the committee and proved by his own evidence, by the evidence of his employees, and by the records that he has kept for 20 years that he was not in Chicago from the 15th of February until some time in March, thus showing conclusively that the alleged second conversation could not have occurred as Mr. Funk said it occurred. Then, at another hearing, in another place, when Mr. Funk realized the situation he was in, he changed his testimony and swore that the second conversation occurred in January. He never advised the Senate committee or suggested to it that any such mistake had been made. Yet I have here the record of the testimony taken before the Union League Club, of Chicago, wherein Mr. Funk now says that the second conversation occurred after the appearance of the editorial in January.

Senators, I wonder if any other testimony is being concealed in this case, in order that in case the Senate shall now vote to seat Mr. LORIMER it may be used as the basis of a demand for another investigation?

I call the attention of the Senate to this testimony, which was not suggested to the Senate committee by Mr. Funk, as showing that when the record before our committee had demonstrated the impossibility of the truth of Mr. Funk's story as to this second meeting, at another hearing he testified that it was in January.

Why did not Mr. Funk come before our committee and say that, unless it was for the reason that after Funk had given this further testimony, Mr. Hines also showed conclusively by the records of his office and by the employees of his office that Funk could not be correct in his amended statement, because Hines was not in Chicago within the dates stated by Mr. Funk for the second visit, as fixed by the January editorial.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. LEA. If the Senator will yield to me a minute, I think he unconsciously does Mr. Funk an injustice.

Mr. JONES. I do not want to do that.

Mr. LEA. My recollection of Mr. Funk's testimony is that on the first occasion he stated that he could not testify positively as to the date; that Judge Hynes, Mr. Hines's lawyer, then said that the date of the editorial in the Record-Herald referring to the $100,000 fund was February 15; whereupon Mr. Funk said, "If that editorial was on February 15, the conversation with Mr. Hines was after that."

In point of fact, Judge Hynes was in error. The editorial in the Record-Herald did not appear on February 15; it appeared in January. On page 599 of the record of the investigation Mr. Hynes asked this question:

Mr. HYNES. Now, with respect to the visit you say Hines paid you along about the time of the editorial in the Record-Herald, referring to $100,000, give us the time of that as near as you can recollect it.
Mr. FUNK. I can not fix the time definitely.
Mr. HYNES. Well, the date of the editorial was the 15th of February, 1911. In your testimony before the Helm committee you stated, "Mr. Hines came to my office in a day or two or a short time, it may have been more than a day or two, but a short time after the editorial appeared." Is that your best recollection then?
Mr. FUNK. Yes; that is my recollection then.
Mr. HYNES. Is that your best recollection now?
Mr. FUNK. I am inclined to think I am mistaken about that now. I think it was later than that now, later than a few days after.

Meaning a few days after the editorial referred to. So it was Judge Hynes and not Mr. Funk who fixed the date as February 15.

Mr. JONES. The editorial referring to the $100,000 fund was an editorial of February 15. That editorial was called to Mr. Funk's attention before the Helm committee at Springfield; and it was after that, he said, that this second conversation occurred. I think there was another editorial in January also referring in some way to this matter. So that may account for the difference. But I simply state the fact that at this other hearing Mr. Funk changed his testimony; and then Mr. Hines showed conclusively by his records that such a conversation could not have occurred between the dates then placed and named by Mr. Funk, just as conclusively as he showed it with reference to the editorial of February 15.

That is all I care to say with reference to the testimony of Mr. Funk. I do not say Mr. Funk intentionally misrepresented that conversation. There was some misunderstanding, some misconstruction, of it. Weighing the matter according to the rules of evidence, what do we find? Mr. Hines contradicts Mr. Funk. Mr. Funk has nobody to substantiate his story. Mr. Hines has the testimony of two or three disinterested witnesses who were present, and who verify his version of the conversation.

Therefore I say that from this record, which shows Mr. Funk and Mr. Hines to be men of equal reputation and equal business standing, the Senate can not say, in my judgment, in accordance with the rules of weighing evidence, that it is shown here that Mr. Hines did make this statement. But whether Mr. Hines made it or not, there is not one line of evidence in the record or anywhere else that shows that Mr. Hines contributed a single dollar to a fund for the election of Senator LORIMER, or that he helped to raise or expended a single dollar for that purpose, except as it may have been for telephone or telegraph messages from Washington City, and there is not a word of evidence that any such fund was raised by anyone, to be used in the election of Mr. LORIMER. Mr. Hines was not in Springfield during the session of the legislature, and had not been there for years, and was not there afterwards until the Helm investigation.

As showing the real recklessness with which Mr. Funk testifies, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this testimony given by Mr. Funk. When asked how he knew that Mr. Hines preferred LORIMER for Senator, he said: "Why, you would see his name in the papers every day in connection with activities at Springfield, and hear it as a matter of general talk in the streets." Then Mr. Hynes, the attorney, asked him:

You spoke, Mr. Funk, of Mr. Hines's activities at Springfield. What did you have reference to there?
Mr. FUNK. Why, it was a matter of common talk that he was very active down there.
Mr. HYNES. What did you understand he was doing down there?
Mr. FUNK. Pulling wires for the election of Senator LORIMER.
Mr. HYNES. What do you mean by that? What was he doing? How long was he down there in Springfield before the election?
Mr. FUNK. I do not know.
Mr. HYNES. How long before the election did you hear that?
Mr. FUNK. I heard it frequently.
Mr. HYNES. How long before?
Mr. FUNK. Just about the time the matter came to a head.
Mr. HYNES. How long had he been down there?
Mr. FUNK. I don't know.
Mr. HYNES. How long had you been hearing that?
Mr. FUNK. I do not know how long he had been there.
Mr. HYNES. Give me your recollection.
Mr. FUNK. I have no recollection as to when he was there.
Mr. HYNES. Have you any recollection as to anybody saying that he was in Springfield active about the election of LORIMER?
Mr. FUNK. I have a very distinct recollection that he was down there, and he was very busy there, and also in Washington. That was a matter of common talk.
Mr. HYNES. How long did you understand he was down in Springfield?
Mr. FUNK. I do not know, Senator, anything about the length of time.
Mr. HYNES. Do you remember anybody who told you that he was down at Springfield active there in pulling wires for Senator LORIMER?
Mr. FUNK. I think that was a matter of common talk.
Mr. HYNES. Can you tell me anybody that said it?
Mr. FUNK. I met a great many people that talked about it. I can not recall any particular man that made that particular statement.

Mr. Funk testifies to those things as facts, but the fact is that Mr. Hines was not in Springfield at all during the session of the legislature, had not been there for years, and was not there for a long time after Senator LORIMER's election. Yet Mr. Funk stated that he heard frequently about his activities at Springfield in behalf of Senator LORIMER. He surely did not hear of Hines's activities at Springfield, because he was not there. Does this not discredit his version of his conversation with Hines? Was he not as likely to be mistaken in this as he was of Hines's activities at Springfield?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I would like to ask the Senator from Washington if the issue of veracity between Mr. Funk and Mr. Hines was passed on by the Union League Club?

Mr. JONES. I suppose so; but that cuts no figure here.

Mr. GORE. Did they sustain the veracity of Mr. Funk or did they sustain the veracity of Mr. Hines?

Mr. JONES. They probably sustained Mr. Funk on the same ground upon which a great many people outside of that club have sustained Mr. Funk.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I can not yield for anything of that kind here.

Mr. GORE. Just one more question. Both those gentlemen were members of that club?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. GORE. And Mr. Hines was expelled from the club?

Mr. JONES. I do not know. If so, it has no weight with me in this case, and has no place here. Those who did it were not under oath and simply expressed their own individual opinions and prejudices.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I understand the effect of the Senator's argument now to be that Mr. Funk was not telling the truth, because he stated that Hines had been active at Springfield, when in fact Hines was not there, and that from that the Senator draws the inference that Funk is an untrustworthy or forgetful witness.

Mr. JONES. I made the statement that he was rather reckless in his testimony.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that Mr. Hines himself testified that he actively interested himself in the election of Senator LORIMER?

Mr. JONES. No; he did not——

Mr. REED. And that he went to the State of Illinois bearing a message from the President of the United States and from Mr. Aldrich, and that he had conversations with Mr. LORIMER in the State of Illinois concerning his candidacy and urging him to become a candidate?

Mr. JONES. But Senator LORIMER refused.

Mr. REED. And that he further testified that he communicated at Springfield, Ill., with Gov. Deneen with regard to this subject matter; and if that does not constitute activities at Springfield?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, of course if the Senator would construe that as "activities at Springfield," I do not question his construction of it; but I want to suggest to him that all that occurred practically on the day of or the day before the election.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Hines telephoned and telegraphed Senator LORIMER a day or two before the election, and he arrived in Chicago the morning before the election, and there he telephoned Gov. Deneen. Now, if that constituted activities at Springfield which would justify Mr. Funk in testifying in the way he did, of course the Senator is entitled to that construction of it. I can not so construe it, and I am sure Mr. Funk did not mean it that way.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me further, I would like to know how the Senator himself construes this testimony.

Mr. JONES. Just a moment. The Senator puts a great many suggestions into one question or statement. He suggested that Mr. Hines was very active in Illinois supporting Senator LORIMER's candidacy, and conferred with him about it, and so on. All that the record shows is that Mr. Hines talked with Senator LORIMER once in April, and suggested that he be a candidate for the Senate, and Senator LORIMER told him that he would not be, that he did not want to be, that he did not want to leave the House, and that that ended it with Mr. Hines. He did not take any further interest in Senator LORIMER's election until two or four days before, when LORIMER's name was mentioned, and he talked with Aldrich and PENROSE, and telephoned and wired LORIMER, as I have already explained. Instead of urging LORIMER, he suggested others for the place. So activity shown by Mr. Hines in behalf of Senator LORIMER at Springfield no more shown by him in Washington than one friend would naturally show for another.

Mr. REED. If it would not interrupt the Senator, and I do not desire to add anything that would be regarded as unpleasant, I would like——

Mr. JONES. The Senator could not do that.

Mr. REED. Not with my personal feeling toward the Senator; I could not do it intentionally. I hold him in the highest regard. But I would like, as the Senator and I differ so widely in regard to this matter, to read now from the record the testimony of Mr. Hines himself on this matter. I think the Senator has overlooked or forgotten a great many statements Mr. Hines made with regard to his activities.

Mr. JONES. I desire to say to the Senator that I have simply summed up my conclusions. I do not intend to go into the details in connection with the testimony of Mr. Hines. They have been gone into pretty fully in the report of the committee. They have been gone into by the Senator from Vermont and by other Senators here, and I have taken up much more time now than I expected, and I do not intend to go into details with respect to Mr. Hines's testimony. I do not intend to attempt to harmonize any apparent inconsistencies that there may be in it. I have summed up my conclusions from the whole testimony and have given them to the Senate. I am convinced that Mr. Hines did not make these statements as Mr. Funk says they were made. I am convinced that Mr. Hines did not do any more in behalf of Senator LORIMER than any other friend would do for a friend in a legitimate way, and probably not nearly so much. There is nothing to show that he contributed a single dollar or helped to raise a fund or to expend a dollar or distribute a fund in aid of Senator LORIMER's election. Those are my firm convictions and conclusions from all the evidence after allowing for all inconsistencies that may appear and any action on Mr. Hines's part that may be construed against him. The Senator can weigh the testimony just as well as I. I can not go into it in detail, and the Senator will hold his conclusions and I can hold mine.

Mr. REED. In view of that, I will not insist on further taking the Senator's time.

Mr. JONES. A witness, Cook, was also called to testify as to the alleged statements by Hines, in order to bolster up Funk's story. Cook's unfriendly feeling toward Hines was plainly shown during the testimony. He seemed to have an intense desire to say something that would reflect upon Hines and show an improper connection with Senator LORIMER's election. It appeared that he was talking about Hines on almost every occasion and at every opportunity. I have no doubt but that many things which he had read had been thought about by him so much and repeated by him so much that he came to believe that they had actually occurred within his own knowledge. I am convinced that he misconstrued statements, innocent in themselves, and then testified to them as construed by him rather than as they were uttered.

Mr. Cook testified as to a conversation with Mr. Hines in the Grand Pacific Hotel in Chicago. He was asked to state the exact language of this conversation as nearly as he could. (Vol. 1, p. 626.)

Mr. COOK. Mr. Hines replied, saying that he was having a hell of a time. He said: "For instance, there is old STEPHENSON. After I went to work and elected him, he goes down to Washington and starts working for free lumber." He says, "What do you think of him, and in the lumber business, too!" "Then," he says, "those southern Democrats," he says: "There is the worst bunch I ever tackled." [Laughter.] Then he says: "You get them all fixed up to-day and to-morrow they flop." [Laughter.] "Then I have to go and fix them all over again." [Laughter.]

Mr. HEALY. Was anything else said, Mr. Cook, on that occasion?

Mr. COOK. Why, Mr. Turrish then asked Mr. Hines how they were getting along in the senatorial deadlock in Illinois. Mr. Hines replied by saying: "I will tell you, confidentially, LORIMER will be the next Senator from this State." He says: "We had Boutell fixed for the Senatorship. He had promised to work to keep the $2 duty, the present duty, on lumber; but when the lumber schedule came out before the Ways and Means Committee, Boutell was working for free lumber." He said, "I immediately took the matter up with Senator Aldrich, and it was decided that I have a talk with LORIMER. I went and saw LORIMER. He will stand pat. He will listen to reason. He will do as he agrees to do." He says, "I have got it all fixed. LORIMER will be the next Senator from Illinois."

Now, Mr. Hines denies this conversation and this version of it by Mr. Cook; but even if he had admitted it, there is nothing especially in this conversation to indicate that Mr. Hines had been interesting himself in the election of a Senator in improper ways, but that he thought he had found a man who could be elected and would vote satisfactorily on the tariff. But we do not have to take the testimony of Mr. Hines alone for this conversation. We can exclude his testimony entirely and take the testimony of a disinterested witness. Mr. Turrish was present at this conversation also, and Mr. Turrish testified in regard to this matter as follows:

Mr. MARBLE. What did he say?

Mr. TURRISH. He did not seem to be very hopeful.

Mr. MARBLE. What did he say? Do you recall what he said?

Mr. TURRISH. The substance of his conversation was that human nature asserted itself in different places when it came to the tariff question.

Now, that is not a very unreasonable statement for a man to make. I do not think there is a Senator here but will indorse that statement as a very good suggestion from Mr. Hines.

That everybody wanted their individual stuff protected, but they wanted their neighbors' on the free list, or words to that effect; and that human nature asserted itself when it came to that. In the course of the conversation I said to Mr. Hines: "Mr. STEPHENSON, being a lumberman, is all right, isn't he?" He said, "No; STEPHENSON is an uncertain quantity."

Now, to that extent, or to a certain extent, that corroborates Mr. Cook, although it does not refer to Mr. STEPHENSON in that connection; and anybody who has ever seen Cook or heard him testify would understand why he stated it in that way.

That he had done business for him for 20 years or more, and that he really did not know where he stood on the lumber question; he was undecided.

Mr. MARBLE. Was there anything further said about Mr. STEPHENSON?

Mr. TURRISH. No; nothing. That was the substance of what was said.

Mr. MARBLE. All right; what next?

Mr. TURRISH. Then there was some reference made to a Member of Congress who had made a very good argument, who understood the situation pretty well, by the name of FORDNEY.

Now, Members of the Senate who know about the contest over the tariff in another branch of this Congress will see in that a very reasonable statement as it refers to Mr. FORDNEY.

Mr. MARBLE. Who made that reference to Mr. FORDNEY?

Mr. TURRISH. I do not remember whether I did—whether I spoke to Mr. Hines about FORDNEY's argument or what I had read in the papers about what he had been saying—or whether Mr. Hines mentioned it.

Mr. MARBLE. Very well. What next?

Mr. TURRISH. That is about all that was said.

Mr. MARBLE. Was there any reference to Congressman LORIMER or Senator LORIMER in that conversation?

Mr. TURRISH. Senator LORIMER's name was mentioned.

Mr. MARBLE. By whom?

Mr. TURRISH. It was mentioned by Mr. Hines; and I do not remember whether he said he was a candidate or whether he would be elected or what. My memory is hazy on what was said about it.

I suggest that if Mr. Hines had said that Mr. LORIMER would be elected, that he had it all fixed, Turrish would have remembered it.

Mr. MARBLE. Did he say a candidate for what?

Mr. TURRISH. For the Senate.

Mr. MARBLE. Is your memory clear that he was mentioned in connection with the Senate?

Mr. TURRISH. His name was mentioned, but I can not just place it in that way. Either that he was a candidate, or, I think, he said he would be a candidate.

Mr. MARBLE. You think he said that he would be a candidate?

Mr. TURRISH. Yes.

Mr. MARBLE. Are you clear that he was mentioned in connection with the Senate at all?

Mr. TURRISH. Yes, sir; I think so. I think that I spoke about the Illinois deadlock at that time, and I think that is how it came up.

That is, Turrish spoke about the Illinois deadlock himself. Then it would be very natural that Mr. Hines might mention those who were spoken of in connection with it.

Mr. MARBLE. Then Mr. Hines told you that?
Mr. TURRISH. Well, in the conversation, as I remember it, Mr. Hines said Mr. LORIMER would be a candidate, or was a candidate, or words to that effect.
Mr. MARBLE. Do you remember any reference to Senator STEPHENSON as "old STEPHENSON" in that conversation?
Mr. TURRISH. No, sir.
Mr. MARBLE. Do you remember any reference to the southern Democrats or their attitude toward the lumber schedule?
Mr. TURRISH. No, sir.
Mr. MARBLE. Would you say that there was no reference to the southern Democrats and their attitude toward the lumber schedule?
Mr. TURRISH. I did not hear any.
Mr. MARBLE. You did not hear any?
Mr. TURRISH. No.
Mr. MARBLE. You did not hear Senator STEPHENSON referred to as "old STEPHENSON"?
Mr. TURRISH. No, sir.
Mr. MARBLE. You are sure of that?
Mr. TURRISH. I am sure.
Mr. MARBLE. Did you hear any reference to Congressman Boutell, of Illinois?
Mr. TURRISH. It seems to me that Congressman Boutell's name was mentioned, but I can not recall in what particular. I think in the course of the conversation his name was mentioned, but I can not recall in what way.
Mr. MARBLE. Do you recall whether or not it was mentioned in connection with the Illinois senatorship?
Mr. TURRISH. I could not tell.
Mr. MARBLE. Do you remember Senator Aldrich's name being mentioned?
Mr. TURRISH. No, sir.
Mr. MARBLE. Would you say that it was not mentioned?
Mr. TURRISH. I did not hear it.
Mr. MARBLE. You will say that you did not hear it?
Mr. TURRISH. I did not hear it.

Mr. Cook then gave an account of a telephone talk that Mr. Hines had from his room in the hotel at Chicago with, as he says, Gov. Deneen. This alleged conversation is so contrary to human experience and human action that it is incredible and would need no contradiction. It is, however, shown to be false in every essential particular and in every suspicious circumstance, and shows to what length Cook would go against Mr. Hines. Mr. Cook says that after he had been in the room four or five minutes the phone rang and he answered it; that the operator asked, "Is Mr. Hines there?" to which he said "Yes." The operator then said, "Here is Springfield; here is Gov. Deneen," and that he called Mr. Hines to the phone. He then heard this conversation (p. 628, vol. 1):

Mr. COOK. He said, "Hello, hello, hello, is this you, Governor? Is this Gov. Deneen? How are you this morning, Governor? Now, I just left President Taft and Senator Aldrich in Washington last night. They tell me that under no consideration do they want Hopkins returned. Now, LORIMER must be elected. I will be down on the next train, prepared to furnish all the money that is required. Now, don't stop at anything. LORIMER must be elected."

Now, there is the conversation that Cook alleges was had by Mr. Hines in his room over the telephone with Gov. Deneen.

It is significant that when Cook testified before the Helm committee he said that the telephone operator said "Here is the governor," but he is very positive in his testimony before this committee that the operator said "Here is Gov. Deneen."

Mr. Hines shows very conclusively that this talk he had over the telephone from Mr. Cook's room at the hotel was with Senator LORIMER and not with Gov. Deneen.

Mr. Hines had had a talk with Gov. Deneen a short while before this when he arrived in Chicago.

Senator LORIMER had left a message there for him to call him up and not to come on to Springfield. Mr. Hines called up Senator LORIMER and told him of this message, and it was suggested that he talk with Gov. Deneen. He called up Gov. Deneen and told him the message, and the governor said, "All right," or something of that kind. LORIMER had told Hines, "When you talk with Gov. Deneen then call me up and let hear what he says."

Therefore it is clear that, when Mr. Hines telegraphed from Cook's room at the hotel, he was telephoning to Senator LORIMER and not to Gov. Deneen; that Mr. Cook's version of that story is simply made up out of probable suggestions that he saw in newspapers or by reason of the fact that he thought by connecting Gov. Deneen with this conversation it would injure Mr. Hines in some way. Gov. Deneen testified with reference to the interview that he had with Mr. Hines; and his testimony does not corroborate Mr. Cook in any particular whatever. The statement made by Cook that Mr. Hines said, "Meet me at Springfield with all the money that is necessary," is not only incredible, but it is denied by Mr. Hines, and it is denied by Gov. Deneen that anything whatever was said between him and Mr. Hines with reference to Hines coming down with the money that was necessary or with reference to money at all. Mr. LORIMER also testified with reference to his conversation with Mr. Hines, and he denied that anything was said in regard to money. I have no doubt but that Mr. Cook heard Mr. Hines mention the word "governor" in his talk, because Mr. Hines no doubt told Mr. LORIMER that he had talked with Gov. Deneen, and probably Cook heard him say "Gov. Deneen," and connected that with the telephone operator, and so on. This whole conversation alleged by Cook to have taken place in his room is not only incredible, but is it contrary to all human experience, and it is absolutely contradicted and refuted by the testimony of Mr. Hines, of Gov. Deneen, of Senator LORIMER, of Mr. Wiehe, and also of Mr. O'Brien, who was Mr. Cook's friend, who were in the room at the time and heard no conversation of the character testified to by Cook. I submit to the Senate that Cook's story is not entitled to any credit whatever.

In connection with this alleged new testimony I desire to notice some statements made in the speech of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], when he urged the appointment of a new committee to investigate the charges against Mr. LORIMER. He had some affidavits, and upon these affidavits he urged the appointment of this committee. It seems that the Helm committee, the committee of the Illinois Legislature, had employed a Mr. Coan as an investigator, and Mr. Coan made affidavits as to what certain persons had told him and would testify to if they were called before the committee.

Mr. President, I had prepared extracts from this testimony, which I intended to read into the RECORD, but I am not going to take the time to do it. I am simply going to say that Senators will probably remember the statements that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] submitted and the affidavits which were made by this man Coan as to statements made by Shelley B. Jones, by Mr. Culver, and by others. The committee called the persons referred to by Mr. Coan, and, without exception, every one of those persons denied absolutely and unqualifiedly the statements made by Coan, which the Senator from Wisconsin submitted to the Senate in behalf of the resolution to appoint this committee. Senators who may be interested in the matter, if they will refer to the testimony of those individuals, will find that they contradict Coan in every essential particular. So impressed was the committee with reference to the unreliability of Coan that not one member of the committee asked that he should be called before the committee. Coan gave the impression that many witnesses had refused to go before the Helm committee because they lived outside of the State of Illinois. When those witnesses were asked whether they were requested to come and testify they said, no; they were not asked to do so. Some of them were asked to sign affidavits, which, when they looked over them, they refused to make. Those affidavits of Coan purported to give conversations that Hines had with those people in regard to Senator LORIMER's election. They are absolutely disproven by the witnesses who appeared before the committee, and it was shown that there seemed to be a concerted attempt on the part of somebody to show in some way that Mr. Hines had made statements with reference to the raising of this hundred-thousand-dollar fund, and that he had raised it or contributed to it, and, as in every other case of this kind, the proof has absolutely failed.

Mr. President, after trying to weigh all the testimony fairly and impartially, I am firmly convinced that Edward Hines did not raise any fund to be used to secure Mr. LORIMER's election and that he did not spend a dollar improperly to bring it about. All that he did to assist Mr. LORIMER was confined to his talks with leading Republicans here in Washington and advising Senator LORIMER of their views and of his talk with Gov. Deneen. All this was done as a friend and is to be commended rather than condemned.

William M. Burgess, a witness before our committee, swears to a conversation he had on a train with Mr. Wiehe in which he alleges that Wiehe said there was a jack pot for the election of Senator LORIMER and that he had contributed $10,000 to it. Wiehe denies unqualifiedly making any such statement. Take his testimony against that of Burgess and consider the improbability of any man in his right mind openly in a smoking compartment of a Pullman car stating that he had contributed $10,000 to a fund to be used in the election of a Senator. It is incredible to me how a fair and unbiased mind can accept such a statement as true. Wiehe's positive denial is supported by the testimony of four or five other witnesses so conclusively that not only does the evidence preponderate against the Burgess story, but it absolutely overwhelms it.

Unless we disregard all the rules for weighing testimony and considering the credibility of witnesses the allegations upon which this reinvestigation was ordered are not substantiated. Competent testimony of their truth is utterly lacking, and if the Senate is to vacate its former judgment in favor of Senator LORIMER's right to a seat in this body it must do it on testimony submitted on the same points brought out and considered when the former judgment was rendered.

I have already considered this evidence and I have already given the reasons why I think that it is not only not as strong as it was before, but that it has been clearly and conclusively shown that the former evidence is so discredited as to make it appear conclusively that corruption was not necessary and was not used or practiced in the election of Senator LORIMER.

At any rate there has been an utter failure to secure any new material evidence proving corruption in the election of Senator LORIMER, and if he is excluded it must be done on evidence adduced or available when the Senate rendered its former judgment.

Senator LORIMER, through his attorney, at the close of the hearing interposed a plea of res adjudicata. It is urged that this plea should have been interposed sooner. In my judgment it was not necessary to interpose it before the committee at all. The proper time to raise this issue was when the committee had made its report and a resolution was introduced attacking Senator LORIMER's right to his seat. He put in this plea as soon as all the evidence was in. This investigation was ordered because of alleged new evidence, and it was not until the hearing was closed that the new evidence was complete. It is suggested that the committee should have raised this question sooner and not taken the testimony that it did take. It was not for the committee to pass upon this question. That is a proposition to be decided by the Senate itself. Senator LORIMER surely loses no rights because the committee did not present this question to the Senate sooner. The plea is made and the Senate must act upon it. It must act as a court, fairly and judicially. The Senate is by the Constitution made the sole "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." In this case no question of policy is involved. We are to pass not upon the advisability of the election of Senator LORIMER, not upon his fitness for the place, but upon the legality of his election. Was his election legal or illegal? That is the question, and it does not require any legal knowledge to tell us that it is question for judicial decision and not a matter of legislation. In acting upon it we act as judges and not as legislators. This is in accordance with reason, law, and precedent. Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, said, in the case of Henry W. Blair, on March 10, 1885:

> The Senate in sitting upon such a question sits as judges. The Constitution says so. We are not defining policies; we are not setting up expediencies; we are not carrying on party warfare; we are sitting as the solemn judges sworn to try and determine the election and qualifications of a gentleman who presents himself to be a member of this body.

Justice Folger, in People against Hall (80 N. Y., 117), said:

> When it is said, on such occasion, to either house of the legislature, "You are to be the judge of the election of the members of your body," there is a specific conferment of this particular power.
> The power thus given to the houses of the legislature is a judicial power, and each house acts in a judicial capacity when it exerts it.

In People against Mahaney (13 Mich., 481) Justice Cooley, than whom there is no higher authority, said:

> While the constitution has conferred the general judicial power of the State upon the courts and officers specified, there are certain powers of a judicial nature which, by the same instrument, are expressly conferred upon other bodies or officers; and among them is the power to judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of members of the legislature. The terms employed clearly show that each house, in deciding, acts in a judicial capacity.

When the right of Mr. James Harlan to a seat in this body as a Senator from the State of Iowa was under consideration, Senator Pugh of Ohio said:

> What does our decision amount to. The Constitution does not make our decision upon the question of elections a legislative act. The legislative powers of the Senate are to be exercised coordinately with the House of Representatives, but the power which we exercise in deciding upon the election of a Senator is our power. It is judicial in its character. The Constitution uses the very word that constitutes it a judicial act—"Each house shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members"—and our act in deciding upon an election is as completely a judicial act as is the action of the House of Peers in Great Britain when they hear a writ of error to an inferior court.

When this case was heretofore pending in the Senate, Senator CUMMINS said:

> If we are judges, as I believe we are * * * and speaking for myself alone, I intend to be governed by the evidence we have before us and the law as it has been established.

It is useless, however, to multiply authorities upon a proposition that is so plain and self-evident under the language of the Constitution itself—"The Senate is the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its Members"—that any man who reads can understand its import without any legal knowledge; and I am glad to say that during this discussion, at any rate thus far, I have heard no Senator take any different position, but all have taken the position that this is a judicial act and that we act as judges.

Sitting as a court and as judges, we should act without bias, passion, or prejudice, and in accordance with the well-known and well-settled principles of judicial procedure. Such principles have been evolved in the progress of the ages from the experiences of men to insure justice, preserve liberty, and perpetuate good government. To disregard them is reactionary; to follow them is progression. To violate them is tyranny; to adhere to them is liberty. To ignore them is to undermine the safeguards of justice, liberty, law, and government; to respect them is to repel anarchy, preserve liberty, and perpetuate the Republic.

Chancellor Kent, referred to the provision making each House the sole judge of the elections of its Members, says:

> And, as each House acts in these cases in a judicial character—

And I call attention to this not for the purpose of showing that we act as judges, but that we should follow judicial principles and precedents—> its decisions, like the decisions of any other court of justice, ought to be regulated by known principles of law, and strictly adhered to for the sake of uniformity and certainty.

Justice Cooley also said:

> In determining questions concerning contested seats the House will exercise judicial power, but generally in accordance with a course of practice which has sprung from precedents in similar cases.

It is urged that if the Senate is the only body that can act on this question it can do as it pleases. The Senate has exclusive jurisdiction of this question and it has the power to act to-day one way and to-morrow the other, but has it the right to do so? It is the universal holding of the courts, unless there is an express statutory provision to the contrary, that a judgment becomes final and can not be reopened by the court after the term at which it was rendered unless steps are taken for that purpose before the close of the term.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to that proposition, that it is a universal holding of the courts that, while they may have the power to do it, they have not the right to open or vacate a judgment after the term at which it was rendered unless steps were taken during that term to reopen it.

In Bronson v. Schulten (104 U. S., 410) Justice Miller said:

> In this country all courts have terms and vacations. The time of the commencement of every term, if there be half a dozen a year, is fixed by statute, and the end of it by the final adjournment of the court for that term. This is the case with regard to all the courts of the United States, and if there be exceptions in the State courts they are unimportant. It is a general rule of the law that all the judgments, decrees, or other orders of the courts, however conclusive in their character, are under the control of the court which pronounces them during the term at which they are rendered or entered of record, and may then be set aside, vacated, modified, or annulled by that court.
> But it is a rule equally well established that after the term has ended all final judgments and decrees of the court pass beyond its control unless steps be taken during that term, by motion or otherwise, to set aside, modify, or correct them, and if errors exist they can only be corrected by such proceeding by a writ of error or appeal as may be allowed in a court which, by law, can review the decision.

Now listen:

> So strongly has this principle been upheld by this court—

That is, the United States Supreme Court—

> So strongly has this principle been upheld by this court that, while realizing that there is no court which can review its decisions, it has invariably refused all applications for rehearing made after the adjournment of the court for the term at which the judgment was rendered. And this is placed upon the ground that the case has passed beyond the control of the court.

The Supreme Court of the United States has the power to vacate a judgment after the term at which it is rendered, but it says it has not the right to do so; and that it has uniformly refused so to do.

Shall the Senate sitting as a court, shall we acting as judges, disregard this well-settled rule of judicial action and procedure, sanctioned not only by the highest courts of the various States of the Union, but by the United States Supreme Court itself?

This case went to final judgment after a full hearing and argument. The session closed. No steps were taken to reopen the case, although there were those in the Senate who knew of the alleged facts that might be brought to the attention of the Senate and upon which this reinvestigation was finally ordered. Not only did the session close, but the Sixty-first Congress closed. The Sixty-second Congress is now asked to set aside a judgment solemnly given by the Sixty-first Congress. The membership of the Senate has been greatly changed. One-third of its Members have been elected since that judgment was rendered. We have the power to set aside the judgment already rendered. Will we exercise that power? This involves more than the seat of Senator LORIMER. It means a violation of orderly procedure, a reversal of Senate precedents, and a disregard of the judicial decisions of the highest courts of the country. It furnishes a precedent for party action which may threaten the very life of the Republic. If done, it will be done in the name of progress, but it will be progress back to the days when might made right and justice rested in the strong arm. Such action on our part will set an example that will lead to disrespect for law and undermine the Constitution itself. Acting as a court, sitting as judges, and following universally established judicial procedure, what is our duty upon a plea of res adjudicata?

On March 1, 1911, the following resolution came to a vote in the Senate:

Resolved, That WILLIAM LORIMER was not duly and legally elected to a seat in the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

On the call of the roll this resolution was determined in the negative by a vote of yeas 40, nays 46, and the judgment of the Senate in the Sixty-first Congress was that Senator LORIMER was legally elected to the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of the State of Illinois. This was a final judgment after a full investigation by a court of exclusive jurisdiction. The Sixty-second Congress is now asked to vacate that judgment. According to the law of the courts we have lost the right to take such action, and to do so is to fly in the face of the decisions of all of the courts of Christendom. The doctrine of res adjudicata has been recognized by the Senate itself, and to refuse to act upon it in this case would be to go contrary to the precedents of the Senate.

In the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright were declared entitled to their seats as Senators from the State of Indiana. At the second session of the Thirty-fifth Congress a memorial was presented, representing that it was the wish and desire of the State that Lane and McCarty be admitted to the Senate as the legally chosen Senators from the State of Indiana. This was referred to a committee, which submitted a report reviewing the history of the case and of the resolution adopted at the first session, and which said:

The resolution was under consideration in the Senate and fully debated at several subsequent times, and was finally, after the rejection of several proposed amendments, passed by the Senate without amendment or alteration. In the opinion of the committee this resolution (no motion having been made to reconsider it)—

I desire to say right here that of course everybody concedes that there was no motion made to reconsider the decision rendered with reference to WILLIAM LORIMER in the Sixty-first Congress.

In the opinion of the committee this resolution (no motion having been made to reconsider it) finally disposed of all questions presented to the Senate involving the respective rights of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch and the Hon. Jesse D. Bright to their seats in the Senate as Senators from the State of Indiana for the terms stated in the resolution. It appears by the memorial that the Legislature of Indiana, at its recent session in December last, assumed the power of revising the final decision thus made by the Senate of the United States under its unquestioned and undoubted constitutional authority to "be the judge of the qualifications of its own Members." Under this assumption it also appears by the journals of the senate and house of representatives of the State of Indiana, the Legislature of Indiana, treating the seats of the Senators from that State as vacant, proceeded, subsequently, by a concurrent vote of the senate and house of representatives of the State, to elect the Hon. Henry S. Lane as a Senator of the United States for the State of Indiana, to serve as such until the 4th of March, 1863, and the Hon. William Monroe McCarty as a Senator for the same State, to serve as such until the 4th of March, A. D. 1861. Under this action of the Legislature of Indiana those gentlemen now claim their seats in the Senate of the United States.

It may be conceded that the election would have been valid and the claimants entitled to their seats had the Legislature of Indiana possessed the authority to revise the decision of the Senate of the United States that Messrs. Fitch and Bright had been duly elected Senators from Indiana, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863.

In the opinion of the committee, however, no such authority existed in the Legislature of Indiana. There was no vacancy in the representation of that State in the Senate; and the decision of the Senate, made on the 12th of June 1858, established finally and (in the absence of a motion to reconsider) irreversibly the right of the Hon. Graham N. Fitch as a Senator of the State of Indiana until the 4th of March, 1861, and the right of the Hon. Jesse D. Bright as a Senator from the same State until the 4th of March, A. D. 1863.

The decision was made by an authority having exclusive jurisdiction of the subject, was judicial in its nature, and, being made on a contest in which all the facts and questions of law involving the validity of the election of Messrs. Fitch and Bright, and their respective rights to their seats, were as fully known and presented to the Senate as they are now in the memorial of the Legislature of Indiana, the judgment of the Senate then rendered is final and precludes further inquiry into the subject to which it relates.

A brief was submitted by McCarty and Lane urging that the doctrine of res adjudicata did not apply. After much discussion the following resolution was adopted by a vote of 30 to 15:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the State of Indiana, and that the resolution of the Senate adopted June 12, 1858, affirming the right of Graham N. Fitch and Jesse D. Bright as Senators elected from the State of Indiana, the former until the 4th day of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th day of March, 1863, was a final decision of all the premises then in controversy, as conclusive, as well upon the Legislature of Indiana and all persons claiming under its authority, as upon the Senators named in the resolution.

In the first session of the Fifty-fourth Congress the question of the right of HENRY A. DU PONT to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Delaware was raised, and it was finally decided by a vote of 31 yeas to 30 nays that he was not entitled to his seat. In the second session of the Fifty-fourth Congress a memorial was presented from Mr. DU PONT, alleging that he was justly entitled to his seat and asking that the question of the validity of his election should again be investigated and acted upon. This was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee submitted its report, and held that the doctrine of res adjudicata applied to that case.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], in his address the other day, referred to this case and suggested that it was not in point. He suggested that a new Senator had been elected from Delaware, and that the rights of a third party had intervened, and therefore that case was not in point as compared with this case.

The new Senator from Delaware had not been elected when the second memorial was presented to the Senate and referred to the committee, and the committee in its report does not refer to the claims of any other person to a right to a seat in this body. It does not consider any third person in connection with this matter. Its decision is based squarely upon the doctrine of res adjudicata and upon any intervening rights. The committee said:

New Senators have entered the Chamber since the resolution just cited was adopted. Nothing else has changed. The case then stated and acted upon is the case now stated.

In my view the present case is exactly like the du Pont case. I do not consider the alleged new evidence as amounting to anything; and conceding even that the facts as brought out in the former hearing and brought out in this hearing have the same strength and weight—which I do not concede—then the two cases are the same, so far as the doctrine of res adjudicata is concerned. This case, in my view of it, is upon exactly the same basis as the du Pont case:

The simple question is: Whether the Senate, notwithstanding its decision of May 15, 1896, will now admit Mr. DU PONT to a seat?

The majority of your committee now, as then, are of the opinion that this decision of the Senate was wrong.

Note that, that the majority of the committee were of the opinion that the decision in the du Pont case originally was wrong, and the decision in that case was rendered by a vote of 31 to 30—only 1 majority.

But the Senate is made by the Constitution the judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of its Members, and its judgment is just as binding in law, in all constitutional vigor and potency when it is rendered by one majority as when it is unanimous.

It is clear that the word "judge" in the Constitution was used advisedly. The Senate in the case provided for is to declare a result depending upon the application of law to existing facts, and is not to be affected in its action by the desire of its Members or by their opinions as to public policies or public interest. Its action determines great constitutional rights—the title of an individual citizen to a high office and the title of a sovereign State to be represented in the Senate by the person of its choice. We can not doubt that this declaration of the Senate is a judgment in the sense in which that word is used by judicial tribunals. We can conceive of no case which can arise in human affairs where it is more important that a judgment of any court should be respected and should stand unaffected by caprice or anything likely to excite passion or to tempt virtue. When the Senate decided the question it was sitting as a high constitutional court. In its action we think it ought to respect the principles, in giving effect to its own decision, which have been established in other judicial tribunals in like cases and which the experience of mankind has found safe and salutary.

In conclusion, the committee said:

But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their mind as to the law or fact which is involved.

It seems to us very important to the preservation of constitutional government, very important to the dignity and authority of the Senate, very important to the peace of the country, that we should abide by this principle. There are few greater temptations which affect the conduct of men than the temptation to seize upon political power without regard to the obligation of law. To act upon the doctrine upon which this petition rests would expose the Senate to the temptation to reverse its own judgments and to vacate or to award seats in this Chamber according as the changing majorities should make possible. If such practice should be admitted it would, in our opinion, go far to weaken the respect due to this body and the respect due to constitutional authority.

In my judgment, this case is on all fours with the du Pont case. The facts in this case are no stronger against the right of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in the Senate on this investigation than they were on the former investigation. There is no new testimony. Therefore, the same proposition exactly is put up to the Senate now that was before the Senate in the du Pont case.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose there had been newly discovered evidence?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the Senator that I will touch upon that matter just a little later on.

It is said that the plea of res adjudicata is a technical one, and that the people of the country would not be satisfied to have this case decided upon this theory. It is urged that the people of the country would not understand what is meant by it. It is urged that the people will be puzzled to know why the Senate confirmed the title of Mr. LORIMER to a seat in this body when the answer is given that it was res adjudicata, and it is suggested that they will not be satisfied with such an answer or with such action by the Senate. I have more confidence in the judgment and intelligence of the people of the country than that. They know that when a man has been tried once upon a charge and acquitted that he can not be tried again, and that such a rule is in the interest of justice and not to shield crime. They know that when a matter has been litigated and final judgment rendered in the court of last resort that such a case can not be reopened and that such a rule is founded upon justice, and that such a rule is absolutely necessary to protect the weak from the strong, and they understand that the application of this doctrine rests not so much upon the interest of Mr. LORIMER himself, but that it rests upon the welfare of the country itself.

In the report of the committee on the du Pont case this language is used, and it is well for us to consider it here:

> But there is no case known in other judicial tribunals in which a final judgment in the same case can be rescinded or reversed merely because the composition of the court has changed or because the members of the court who originally decided it have changed their mind as to the law or fact which is involved.
> It seems to us very important to the preservation of constitutional government, very important to the dignity and authority of the Senate, very important to the peace of the country, that we should abide by this principle. There are few greater temptations which effect the conduct of men than the temptation to seize upon political power without regard to the obligation of law. To act upon the doctrine upon which this petition rests would expose the Senate to the temptation to reverse its own judgments and to vacate or to award seats in this Chamber according as the changing majorities should make possible. If such practice should be admitted it would, in our opinion, go far to weaken the respect due to this body and the respect due to constitutional authority.

Senator Hoar, whose honesty, integrity, patriotism, and devotion to the interests of the people will not be questioned, said in connection with the du Pont case:

> Although parliamentary proceedings differ in form from those of courts, the great rule on which the safety of all human property and transactions depend, established in courts of justice, ought in substance to govern us here.
> There has been an application on the part of Mr. DU PONT—whom I respect personally, whom I eagerly desire should have a seat in this body, and who I think ought to have had one on the merits of his case—to reopen that case. No newly discovered evidence is suggested; no fraud or mistake is suggested. The reopening of the case would be merely a reconsideration of a question of constitutional law which this great constitutional court has decided once. That is all he asks, and that is all he would obtain if his prayer for a reopening of the case were granted.
> That petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and after a very able and interesting argument in favor of Mr. DU PONT by Mr. Garland, late Attorney General—and it is not necessary to say that any argument that gentleman makes will be able and interesting—the committee unanimously decided this morning that there had been an adjudication by the Senate and that nothing further remained to be done. It was unanimously decided with the exception of one member, who was not prepared to determine what was his duty at the particular time.
> Mr. President, I propose to act upon that doctrine. I think it is very important for constitutional government, very important to the dignity and authority of the Senate, very important for the peace of the country that we should stand by these principles.
> It is a very unpleasant thing to me that Mr. DU PONT is not to take his seat, and that some one else is to take it. But it would be a very bad thing for every citizen of this country unless the Senate of the United States could act and could be known to act upon great questions where right and righteousness are involved in pursuance of a law other and higher than its own desire.

The question as to the effect of a judgment of the Senate is not a party one and has never been a party one. Democrats and Republicans alike have agreed as to its finality.

Senator Pugh, in discussing a judgment of the Senate, said:

> What was the object of all that, if it decided nothing, if the same question can be mooted again and at any future time? I have not said that that decision is absolutely infallible, but I have said that it is an end of that case as to all matters then alleged. If any new causes of disqualification can be shown as to either of the present Senators, that is open; but the judgment is conclusive of all the premises then before the tribunal.

Senator Green said:

> Where a question is decided in the affirmative or negative neither side can bring it up again. It is a matter adjudicated; it is a matter settled; there is no power to supervise.

Senator Bayard, of Delaware, said:

> It is perfectly immaterial whether the judgment is right or wrong, the rule of finality is founded on the great principle that it is the interest of the Republic that there shall be an end to litigation. There is no other ground upon which it can be sustained. There must be an end to all strife at some time, and courts of justice have adopted it and adhered to it invariably, that a final judgment can not be reheard, but with certain exceptions, one of which the honorable Senator from Vermont has pointed out. You may impeach it on the ground of fraud committed upon the ccurt by the original proceedings—

There can be no contention made here that there has been any fraud committed upon the Senate, unless it be that fraud has been committed in behalf of the Senate, not in behalf of Senator LORIMER, but against Senator LORIMER.

> But you can not undertake to reargue it after the term of the court has expired in which the judgment was pronounced, on the ground that the court committed an error in judgment. No such case can be found, and it is on that great principle that there must be an end at some time to decisions in the nature of judicial proceedings. Sir, if I read the Constitution of the United States rightly, the power to judge of the election of its own members, their qualifications, and their returns, is given for the protection of the body, not for the personal rights of the parties. No matter in what mode the question arises in which the body has formally decided that the party is entitled to his seat, the judgment is conclusive unless a motion for reconsideration is made within the rules and orders of the Senate, and it can not afterwards be reversed.

Senator Edmunds, one of the greatest lawyers that ever occupied a seat in this body, said:

> This question was fairly debated when the gentlemen on the other side were in a majority in this Chamber. Without a party division, gentlemen on both sides, voting according to the light they had and not dividing upon party lines, settled this identical question. The Senate in sitting upon such a question sits as judges. The Constitution says so. We are not defining policies; we are not setting up expediencies; we are not carrying on party warfare; we are sitting as the solemn judges sworn to try and determine the election and qualification of a gentleman who presents himself to be a Member of this body. We have come to a decision, just as the Supreme Court of the United States sitting 200 feet from us comes to a decision in a great variety of cases where the judges differ—five one way, four another, or whatever it may be, a difference of opinion. The decision of the court is announced. What would become of that court if the next time a similar question came up the whole thing was opened again and the contest was gone over repeatedly from year to year and time to time in order to see which should get in the ascendency upon all questions? Nothing would be settled, and the court would be destroyed, and justice, too, for that matter.
> How is it different here? When we have come to a decision, even in a case of doubt, having come to it fairly, not in a time of party heat, or by a party vote, when we, after full deliberation, have come to a decision which carries out confessedly the objects of the Constitution to keep the representation of a State full, should we not stick to it; or are we, every time a similar question comes up about elections, to reverse our decisions, retry them, hold them of no force, and thus keep this body continually in a turmoil over questions of representations in it that come from the States? However doubtful it might have been—it did not seem to me so, to be sure, but however doubtful it might appear to the minds of gentlemen who voted in the minority—it appears to me that, once decided and decided in favor of representation, it would be better to follow that as an established precedent which carries out the objects the Constitution has in view.

Of course, this language was uttered with reference to a case that might be considered a technical one, and decided purely upon questions of law. Yet it coincides with the decisions of the courts, that when a question is settled by the court of final jurisdiction that decision stands.

Every element essential to the doctrine of res adjudicata is present in this case. The Senator from Montana declares that the former judgment of the Senate has been vacated by the action directing a further or new investigation. This is not correct. Senator LORIMER is still a Member of this body. The verdict of the Senate that he was legally elected has not been reversed. The appointment of this committee was not the vacation of that judgment. If it had been Senator LORIMER would not be a Member of this body now and further action by the Senate would be unnecessary. All that was done by the Senate was to appoint a committee without vacating its former judgment to make a further investigation and report to the Senate. The committee has acted, its report is submitted, and now the Senate is considering the question whether or not it will vacate its former judgment and declare Senator LORIMER not entitled to a seat in this body. This is the proper time to interpose the plea of res adjudicata. It is not a technical plea, as I have already said, but it is a substantial right that every party to litigation possesses, not alone in his own interest but in the interest of the Government itself. There should be an end to litigation, and this rule has been in the interest of justice invoked more strongly against the sovereign than against the individual. As a general rule, the State has no right of appeal from a judgment or verdict against it, while the defendant has almost uniformly a right of appeal. In this case the Senate of the United States stands in the place of the State as complainant. The judgment has been against it and in favor of the individual. There is no appeal to either party, because the Senate is the sole and supreme judge in the case. It can now overrule the plea of res adjudicata only by asserting its supreme power over the question at issue. It can exercise the power of an absolute despotism if a majority of its Members see fit to do it, but in doing it it will violate and trample under foot every principle of legal procedure that the courts respect and that have been found necessary to preserve life, liberty, property, and happiness.

All the elements of res adjudicata are present in this case. A competent tribunal, invested with complete jurisdiction to try the issue, has rendered a final judgment. The parties to the former judgment are the same parties now interested in this controversy. The issues and causes of the action now are precisely the same as they were when the judgment, which is sought to be vacated, was rendered. Under all judicial rules under these circumstances the former judgment is an absolute bar not only as to what was actually litigated but to all matters that might have been litigated under the issues in the case, and the issue in the case was the right of Senator LORIMER to a seat in this body. That involved the determination of every proposition that could be presented on one side or the other of it.

Suppose the judgment which the Senate rendered had been against Senator LORIMER. Is there anyone who would contend that the Sixty-second Congress would give him a rehearing upon any ground that he might allege? I do not think so. If we exclude him now, would we hear him next session or next Congress if he should ask for a rehearing on newly discovered evidence? I venture to say we would not, under any circumstances. Shall we apply one rule to him and another to the Senate? We should not and we can not, except by the arbitrary exercise of the power we possess. Under the doctrine of res adjudicata it is uniformly held by the courts that where the issues are the same the bar of former judgment exists to the points actually decided, and also to all the points and questions which might have been litigated under the issues in the former proceeding. This rule has gone unchallenged for more than half a century, and has the approval of an unbroken line of cases in the highest courts in the land. In the case of Cromwell v. County of Sac (94 U. S., p. 352), the United States Supreme Court says:

> In considering the operation of this judgment it should be borne in mind, as stated by counsel, that there is a difference between the effect of a judgment as a bar or estoppel against the prosecution of a second action upon the same claim or demand and its effect as an estoppel in another action between the same parties upon a different claim or cause of action. In the former case the judgment, if rendered upon the merits, constitutes an absolute bar to a subsequent action. It is a finality as to the claim or demand in controversy, concluding parties and those in privity with them not only as to every matter which was offered and received to sustain or defeat the claim or demand, but as to any other admissible matter which might have been offered for that purpose. Thus, for example, a judgment rendered upon a promissory note is conclusive as to the validity of the instrument and the amount due upon it, although it be subsequently alleged that perfect defenses actually existed of which no proof was offered, such as forgery, want of consideration, or payment. If such defenses were not presented in the action and established by competent evidence, the subsequent allegation of their existence is of no legal consequence. The judgment is as conclusive, so far as future proceedings at law are concerned, as though the defenses never existed. The language, therefore, which is so often used, that a judgment estops not only as to every ground of recovery or defense actually presented in the action, but also as to every ground which might have been presented, is strictly accurate when applied to the demand or claim in controversy. Such demand or claim, having passed into judgment, can not again be brought into litigation between the parties in proceedings at law upon any ground whatever.

The courts go so far as to hold almost uniformly that newly discovered evidence furnishes no ground for avoiding the bar of a former judgment on the same issues and between the same parties or their privies. There are some cases in which verdicts will be set aside and new trials granted for newly discovered evidence, but in such cases there are certain well-defined limitations upon granting such new trial. The granting of a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence is cautiously exercised by the courts, and the strictest rules are applied in considering an application on such a ground. The evidence newly discovered must be "of such a character and strength that it is reasonably certain that it would have produced an opposite result if produced at the trial," and must be incontrovertible and conclusive.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I think I will cover the point that the Senator has in mind in a moment. If I do not, interrupt me.

> The evidence must not be merely cumulative or corroborative or merely intended to impeach some of the witnesses in the former trial.

The alleged new evidence upon which the new investigation was ordered is not only not incontrovertible and not conclusive, but it does not to any degree impeach the judgment of the Senate or furnish a basis for impeaching that verdict. Whatever new evidence has been produced that is admissible and relevant is merely cumulative or corroborative, and, in fact, impairs the testimony against Mr. LORIMER and further sustains and confirms the justice of the judgment already rendered by the Senate.

It is another almost universal rule that the alleged newly discovered evidence must have been actually discovered after the time of the former trial, and the party seeking the new trial must excuse his failure to produce the new evidence by showing that he failed to discover it notwithstanding the exercise of due diligence. If the party knows of new evidence at the time of the former trial, such knowledge is a complete bar to the granting of a new trial on this ground.

In this case the alleged new evidence was known to those who had actual charge of what might be called the prosecution which resulted in the verdict of the Senate, and the circumstances of it were actually known to some of the Senators who participated in the rendition of that judgment. Even if such evidence were relevant and conclusive, it is a species of tyranny to vacate our judgment by reason of this evidence. If such a rule is to be followed, no man's seat here is safe. Trial after trial may be had at the instance of the Senate until by changing membership and factional or party tyranny a minority may become a majority and a verdict of exclusion rendered in violation of precedents, law, right, or justice.

Mr. BORAH rose.

Mr. JONES. I think I will get to the point which the Senator has in mind in a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. What I wanted to say was that the doctrine of res adjudicata never can apply so long as a right to move for a new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence exists. So long as the judgment is not final, so long as the right to move for a new trial still exists, so long as the statute provides for a rehearing the principle of res adjudicata does not adhere in the case at all.

Mr. JONES. Certainly. I have stated that. But what I contend now is that the time has passed, under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States and all the courts of last resort in the country. The Supreme Court of the United States says that it will not reopen a case after the term unless proceedings are taken before the term expires looking toward the reopening; and I take it that in this case the decision was rendered in the Sixty-first Congress, and that if it was intended to reopen it a motion to reconsider, or something of that sort, should have been taken in that session; but that now we are in a new Congress, and, while we have the power, it is, under all legal principles, beyond our right to do it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, in connection with that I want to call attention to a single sentence from the report of Senator Hoar and others in the du Pont case, because, if I understand the doctrine of res adjudicata, this sentence refutes the argument which they have previously presented. It says:

> We do not doubt that the Senate, like other courts, can review its own judgments where new evidence has been discovered.

And so forth.

That is not true with reference to the princple of res adjudicata in courts at all. The doctrine of res adjudicata applies when the judgment becomes final. So long as you have the power to hear newly discovered evidence the principle of res adjudicata does not obtain.

If it be true that you can review it here by reason of newly discovered evidence at any time, then it is never a final judgment. If it be true that it is never a final judgment, the doctrine of res adjudicata does not apply.

Mr. JONES. But I contend that it has passed beyond our right to review it, and that the judgment rendered by the Sixty-first Congress was a final judgment; and as no steps were taken before the expiration of that Congress, it became absolutely conclusive upon the Senate. I thought that I had presented some pretty strong authorities upon that proposition. I do not disagree with the contention of the Senator. My contention is that the right to review this judgment had expired by the expiration of the Sixty-first Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I agree largely with what the Senator from Washington has said, but I can not agree that the term of the Senate ever expires. The Senate is a continuing body. If it were a case in the House of Representatives, then surely the Sixty-third Congress would have no power to review the judgment of the Sixty-second Congress. But this body does not terminate in that way.

The Senator from Washington has made one suggestion which appeals to me very strongly, and that is that the Senate must be able to grant a new trial either way or it can not grant a new trial at all. Suppose the judgment of the Senate had been adverse and the seat of the Senator from Illinois had been vacated, and the governor, in the absence of a legislative session, had appointed his successor; could he, if he had procured new evidence, have come to the Senate and obtained a new trial, and could the Senate have reversed its judgment and put his successor out of the body?

Mr. JONES. I do not think the——

Mr. BAILEY. That is one of the difficulties which undoubtedly must address itself to every Senator when we come to have a reopening, although that I concede ought to have controlled us, if it controlled us at all, when we granted the motion for a rehearing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, of course if there ever comes a time in the Senate when its action shall have become final, so that the Senate has no power to review it, then, whether we call it res adjudicata or simply apply it by the doctrine of analogy, the argument which the Senator is making would be conclusive upon my mind. But I do not understand how it can be said that the judgment of this Senate is ever final with reference to anything which pertains to legislation, or incidental to our power as a legislative body.

We can review it next year or five years from now just as well as we can to-day or within a year.

Mr. BAILEY. No; we can not. We can repeal what we have done, but that is not a review of it. I think the Senator would find it necessary to make that distinction. Of course, what the Senate does is not forever done and may be undone; but the Senate must repeal any order or resolution or vote; it can not reconsider it at any subsequent session.

Mr. BORAH. When I use the word "repeal," of course I mean to do that which amounts to a review of our previous action. We may recall it or set it aside, one way or the other. But it all results in what we would say in court amounts to a review of the action, or it amounts to a repeal or cancellation of the order, or whatever you may call it.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senate takes no judicial action, except when it comes to judge of the return, election, and qualification of its own Members, and when it sits as a court of impeachment. In all other cases it is purely legislative, and I take it that the rules which apply to courts will generally apply to us in our judicial capacity; and I think that while the Senate would have the power to grant a new trial upon a motion accompanied with an allegation that new and material evidence had been discovered, it ought to be careful even there; and yet I can not escape the difficulty mentioned by the Senator from Washington, and the power to grant a new trial must exist, if it exists at all, in the granting body upon the application of either side.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senate should render a decision here to the effect that a man was not entitled to a seat and should discover that there was fraud in the presentation of it and that he was, as a matter of fact, entitled to the seat, why has it not the power to cancel that action and set it aside?

Mr. BAILEY. For the very sufficient reason that two bodies can not occupy the same place at the same time, and if the Senate vacated that seat, and that seat was filled by the legislative authority of the State or in the recess of the legislature by the governor's appointment, the Senate certainly would have no power to turn the appointee or the man elected from its door. It would be an incurable mistake.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt that the Senate would have that exact power. So far as the subsequently elected Senator is concerned, if his predecessor was legally elected, which the reversal of the Senate's former action would establish, then the last man was never elected in contemplation if there was no vacancy. In the case of Gholson against Claiborne the House seated two Members.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; it did not seat them. It declared no election.

Mr. BORAH. I beg pardon; it did seat them.

Mr. BAILEY. It did not.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator is mistaken. That was the case of Prentiss and Word against Claiborne and Gholson, and it was decided that there was no election by the casting vote of James K. Polk, who was then the Speaker of the House.

Mr. BORAH. If I am not mistaken—and I have the facts here, and I do not think that I am mistaken—Gholson and Claiborne appeared in the House of Representatives for seats in the House upon this state of facts. The President had called an extra session of Congress. The governor of Mississippi had issued a call for an election, and had confined the call to the term covered by the special session.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. Gholson and Claiborne appeared, and they were seated for the special session. Afterwards the other parties who had been elected in the general election appeared, and the House reversed its former decision against the specific plea of res adjudicata, and unseated Gholson and Claiborne, and it also unseated the other two men and declared that there was no election. After these men had participated for one Congress, the House reversed its decision against the specific plea of res adjudicata and unseated them and also seated the other men.

Mr. BAILEY. It did not exactly do that. Of course there is no such proceeding known to our Constitution and laws as an election for a special session. A man is elected to Congress for a full term or for an unexpired term, but there is no such proceeding known as an election for a special session. Claiborne and Gholson, under the call of the governor of Mississippi, were elected to that special session. At the regular election Prentiss and Word were elected, and they appeared at the first regular session of the Congress to take the oath. The question arose on that state of facts, and finally the House decided against Claiborne and Gholson, and also decided against Prentiss and Word. That is largely political, and the decision, as I recall—I have not examined it in 25 years, probably, but the decision as I recall was made by the casting vote of the Speaker of the House, who was James K. Polk, and who, by the way, though roundly denounced for that decision, was afterwards, very shortly afterwards, elected President of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. When Gholson and Claiborne were challenged, after having been in the House for several months, they made this claim—Gholson or Claiborne, one of them—for both:

> I consider this whole case settled and concluded by virtue of the judgment of the House, a judgment founded upon a full knowledge of the law and the facts, a judgment that prevented us from entering upon a canvass that subsequently took place and restrained the majority of our friends from the exercise on this occasion of their elective franchise; a judgment which the House had the express constitutional power to pronounce and which once pronounced can not be reviewed or reversed without injustice to the parties and disparagement to its own dignity.

The question was specifically and clearly raised in that hearing, because their right to the seat had been challenged when they first appeared.

Mr. BAILEY. I think if it was so——

Mr. BORAH. The House heard it and determined that they had a right to a seat. When they appeared the second time they said, "You have determined this once; this same question was adjudicated before; it is final." But the House reversed its decision and unseated them and also unseated the other party.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, if there was any serious controversy as to their right to sit in the special session it had escaped my memory. I do not recall it. I have no doubt the Senator is right about it, because he seems to have recently reviewed the controversy; but the House practically decided that question both ways, and consequently I would not regard the decision in that case as controlling, because it decided that neither Claiborne and Gholson nor Prentiss and Word were entitled to sit for the balance of the term. Obviously one or the other decision is wrong. It is one of those unfortunate political decisions which have too often discredited the proceedings of the other House. I mean historically; I do not mean that that is done now. I am glad to say it is very much less frequent just now than formerly. I am afraid that they have transferred to the Senate of the United States the habit of deciding these questions upon other considerations than the law and the evidence.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Texas that I did not intend to convey the impression that the Senate ends with the Sixty-first Congress. My contention is that it is just exactly like the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court is a continuing body, but it has its regular terms, and it has held that while there is no power to review its decision it will not vacate a judgment after the term expires in which that judgment was rendered unless some steps were taken during that term to vacate it. So I contend that the Senate itself, a continuing body, it is true, has its regular terms, even more clearly defined than the terms of the Supreme Court. At the end of the Sixty-first Congress all bills died. If we had a bill then pending, we would have to reintroduce it in the Sixty-second Congress. In that sense the term ended in which that judgment was rendered, and in analogy with the Supreme Court decision, unless some steps were taken to reopen that judgment before the Sixty-first Congress expired, I contend that we have no right to attempt to reopen it in this Congress. We have the power to do it; we can decide for Senator LORIMER to-day and reopen the case to-morrow and decide against him to-morrow. If we decided it in his favor in this Congress, in the Sixty-third Congress, before his term expires, we could reopen the case, vacate the judgment, and say that he is not entitled to a seat; but my contention is that we ought not to do that; that, under the decisions of the Supreme Court and following the rules of the Supreme Court, we have no right to do it. This seems to me to be too clear even for argument.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Washington means to say nothing more than that, as a matter of policy, it is unwise to reopen such cases except upon an extraordinary showing, and that ordinarily the policy of permitting that which has been settled to remain settled, and only in exceptional and extraordinary circumstances should we violate that rule, I would agree with him perfectly; but I utterly reject the doctrine that the principle of res adjudicata applies in this body at all, except where we are created by the Constitution of the United States to be a court. The right to pass upon the title to a seat in this body is merely incidental to our legislative power; the legislative power is paramount to that; and the incidental power takes on the quality of the paramount power and follows the quality of our legislative business.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Washington will permit me, the Senator from Idaho does not mean to say that our power to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of our own Members is a legislative power.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not mean to say that it is legislative. I say it is a quasi judicial power, but incidental to our existence as a legislative body. Therefore our legislative capacity fixes the quality of this incidental power, and we are no more bound by it than we are bound by legislative action. That is my position.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, if the Senator were to take that view, he would find himself confronted by the incontrovertible proposition that the Senate itself by undertaking to repeal a law passed last year could not do it; it could not undertake to review it; it could not move, Mr. President, that the proceedings upon bill so-and-so be reopened or that a new hearing be granted. You would have to introduce your bill to repeal that law; it would have to go to a committee; and then, if it passed this body, it would have to go to the other body, and it would have to receive the approval of the President before it could become effective. After we lose the right to make a motion for the reconsideration of a matter, there is no proceeding known to this or to any other legislative assembly to undo what has been done except by a repeal.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but of course the other House would never have anything to do with the question of proceeding with reference to a title to a seat here. That question is always open to this body to consider, and the body is not bound by its previous action any more than it is bound by its previous action with reference to allowing a claim here.

Mr. BAILEY. But what I was responding to was the Senator's suggestion that this, by any sort of analogy, could be likened to our legislative power. I think this is as distinct from our legislative power as it is from our right to vote upon articles of impeachment. I think, probably, it is more separate and apart from it than our specific right to adopt our own rules. As to electing our officers, I think if we elected an officer, we would have a right at any time to supersede him by the election of another officer. That is not a judicial proceeding; it does not bear any analogy to a judicial proceeding; but I think in a case of this kind we must follow the rules of the court as closely as possible, and I think we could not reopen this matter, except upon the allegation of new and material evidence.

I voted to reopen this case upon that allegation, solemnly made here by resolution adopted by the Senate of the State of Illinois and transmitted to us under the seal of that great State. If they had not alleged new and material evidence, I should not have voted to reopen the case, and I so stated to the Senate at the time. If, however, I had been impressed with the view that, upon the adjournment of the Senate, that was the end of the term, I could not have voted even then to have reopened the case, because as a judge of a court, except in a case where there was a special statute that provided for it in certain cases, I never would at the beginning of the next term of my court hear any disappointed or unsuccessful suitor to move for a new trial. If I had taken the view that the adjournment of the Senate was the end of the term, much as I would have regretted to have differed with everybody in the Senate—for everybody was in favor of the motion just as I was—I still would have voted against it; but I felt that upon the allegation of newly discovered and material evidence the Senate was entitled to reopen that case for the purpose of doing justice to itself, to the State of Illinois, and to the country. That was what moved me to interpose the suggestion I made to the Senator from Washington a moment ago, that the Senate could hardly be considered to have adjourned its term in this sense.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator from Washington yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield to the Senator from Idaho, who, I believe, wishes to reply to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I only want to say a word in answer to the statement of the Senator from Texas. Of course when the Senator from Texas voted to reopen this case he did it precisely the same as a judge would do who made an order for a new trial in a case. That being true, if he had the power to vote for the reopening of the case, it would have the same effect as when the judge granted the new trial. Thereafter the doctrine of res adjudicata passes from the consideration of the tribunal entirely, because the moment the new trial is granted that principle is destroyed. It only applies when the judgment is final and when there is no longer any power to grant a rehearing on the ground of newly discovered evidence. Therefore I do not think the Senator from Texas and myself disagree at all, for when he voted for that he simply exercised the power which a Senator has, and which the Senate as a whole has, to reopen such a case whenever, in the judgment of the Senate——

Mr. BAILEY. And grant a new trial.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; and grant a new trial. Whether we should grant a new trial or not is a matter which appeals to our judgment and our conscience at the time the presentation is made; but that we have the power to do it in 1 week or in 10 weeks or in 10 years thereafter I have not a particle of doubt.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no; not 10 years. The term of a Senator is only 6 years, and after that time you would lose your jurisdiction.

Mr. BORAH. Unless we lengthen the term of a Senator, like we are proposing to lengthen the term of the President.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope the Senator will get up that proposed amendment to the Constitution immediately after we dispose of this matter.

Mr. BORAH. I will be glad to see it come up; but I am going to vote against it when it does come up.

Mr. BAILEY. I hate to see the Senator wrong upon that question.

Mr. BORAH. I am erring these days very rapidly. Mr. President, I want to read here a single paragraph from the minority report of Senator Collamer and Senator Trumbull in the Fitch, Bright, Lane, and McCarty case, which has been referred to, because it takes the view that I maintain:

> The power of the Senate to judge of the election and qualification of its own Members is unlimited and abiding—
> Whether it be for 6 years or 10 years—
> It is not exhausted in any particular case by once adjudicating the same, as the power of reexamination and the correction of error or mistake incident to all judicial tribunals and proceedings remains with the Senate in this respect, as well to do justice to itself as to the States represented or to the persons claiming or holding seats. Such an abiding power must exist to purge the body from intruders; otherwise anyone might retain his seat who had once wrongly procured a decision of the Senate in his favor by fraud or falsehood, or even by papers forged or fabricated.

That position was sustained by Mr. Collamer, by Mr. Trumbull, by Mr. Seward, by Mr. Fessenden, and a number of the most distinguished Members of the Senate at that time. When the second case was presented—I have forgotten now who the claimants were—the doctrine of res adjudicata was repudiated by such men as Allison and Anthony and Blaine——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Blaine was not a lawyer.

Mr. BORAH (continuing). And Conkling and Senator Hoar, who was then a member of the Elections Committee, although afterwards he signed the du Pont report. It was repudiated by that class of men who were then in the Senate; and I think that I am not without company and not without authority when I say that the right of the Senate to pass upon this matter is an abiding one, and is not exhausted by once exercising that power.

Senator Collamer opposed the doctrine of res adjudicata, saying:

> I can not regard it as true that a decision made by either House of Congress in relation to a Member's right to a seat is conclusive. The power of the Senate to judge of the elections and qualifications of its Members is not exhausted by once resolving upon the subject. It is an abiding and continuing power. * * * Now, Mr. President, the question is, Has the Senate the right and power and is it their duty, when respectfully applied to, to reexamine their decisions in relation to seats of Senators? I think they have the power. I think they should perform it.

Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, said:

"But," says the Senator from Ohio, "this is a judicial decision, and the Senate acts in a judicial capacity." He then proceeded to argue at length in answer to this, and contended that the doctrine of res adjudicata did not apply and that no Senator should "shield himself under the plea of res adjudicata."

I desire also to refer to the case of Corbin against Butler, South Carolina, in the Forty-fifth Congress.

On February 13, 1877, David T. Corbin presented his credentials for the term of six years commencing March 4, 1877. March 2, 1877, M. C. Butler presented his credentials for the same term commencing at the same date. The credentials of both parties were sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. On November 26, by a vote of the Senate, the committee was discharged from the consideration of the Butler credentials. Upon November 30, upon motion of Senator Thurman, and by a vote of 29 to 28, Butler was sworn in. No motion was made to reconsider, no reservation looking to any further contest. On the 26th of March, 1878, Corbin presented his petition, asking for further inquiry. There was no issue of fact practically in the matter. It was all a question of law as to which one was elected by the legislature of the State. A majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections reported in favor of seating Senator Corbin. The minority filed its views, raising specifically the question of res adjudicata, saying:

The petition now before us is a mere, sheer, naked proposition that the Senate at a subsequent session shall revote on the identical question, facts, and issues on which the Senate voted and decided at a former session.

So this question of res adjudicata was specifically before the Senate, discussed, and considered. The matter was finally decided in favor of Butler and as against Corbin by a vote of 25 to 36. So it may be said that this vote of the Senate sustained the plea of res adjudicata.

Among those who voted against the plea of res adjudicata were Senators Allison, Anthony, Blaine, Chandler, Conkling, Edmunds, Hoar, Ingalls, Morrill, Oglesby, and Windom. These are some of the more conspicuous names. It is particularly important to remember that Senator Hoar was a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections and that he voted against the plea of res adjudicata.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator from Washington long enough——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. To continue a little further, reading from that interesting report by the committee in the case to which the Senator from Idaho has referred. He will find that the committee went on further to say:

The decision was made by an authority having exclusive jurisdiction of the subject; was judicial in its nature; and, being made on a contest in which all the facts and questions of law involving the validity of the election of Messrs. Fitch and Bright, and their respective rights to their seats, were as fully known and presented to the Senate as they are now in the memorial of the Legislature of Indiana, the judgment of the Senate then rendered is final and precludes further inquiry into the subject to which it relates.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, from what is the Senator reading?

Mr. FLETCHER. I am reading from that report.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is not reading from the report from which I read.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am reading from the report of June 12, 1858, rendered in the Thirty-fifth Congress.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is reading from the majority report, and I was reading from the minority report.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was reading from the report of the committee.

Mr. BORAH. Well, I said I was reading from the report of Senator Collamer and Senator Trumbull, and I stated who supported them in that minority view. I did not, of course, state that it was a majority report.

Mr. FLETCHER. The suggestion, Mr. President, that this is a legislative or a quasi legislative proceeding, I think is also erroneous on the part of the Senator. The Constitution of the United States vests legislative power in the Congress as an entity, which includes both Houses. This proceeding has nothing to do with the other House; it is confined alone to the Senate; it is a judicial proceeding, as mentioned in the report from which I have read, and as decided in the case of the New York Indians against the United States, in One hundred and seventieth United States Reports, at page 23. In that case the Supreme Court of the United States said of a resolution adopted by the Senate alone:

It can not be considered as a legislative act, since the power to legislate is vested in the President, Senate, and the House of Representatives.

It not being a legislative act, it is purely a judicial act. I would say further, in connection with the decision once rendered by the Senate in this case, that if that decision had been adverse to the Senator from Illinois and he had been ousted, he could not have appeared here again and insisted upon a reexamination. It would have been absolutely final and conclusive as to him. The very essence and underlying principle of the doctrine of res adjudicata and the doctrine of estoppel is the principle and essence of mutuality. That decision, which is final as to him, must be final as to everybody else. If that decision is final as to him, it is final as to the Senate, because otherwise it could not be mutual.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I want to trespass just a moment to read an excerpt from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States wherein it says:

In some cases it is difficult to draw a line that shall show with precision the limitation of powers under our form of government. The executive in acting upon claims for service rendered may be said to exercise, if not in form in substance, judicial power. And so a court, in the use of the function essential to its existence, by the adoption of rules or otherwise, may be said to legislate. A legislature, too, in providing for the payment of claims exercises a power in its nature judicial, but this is coupled with the paramount and remedial power.

So the court holds that, while these bodies may exercise, either as a whole or separately, that which is quasi judicial in its nature, it does not take on the qualities of a judgment as rendered by a court, and that the body may go back and review it. I quote another paragraph from a late decision:

The nature of the final act determines the nature of the previous inquiry. As the judge is bound to declare the law he must know or discover the facts that establish the law. So when the final act is legislative the decision which induces it can not be judicial in the practical sense, although the questions considered might be the same that would arise in the trial of a case. If a State constitution should provide for a hearing before any law should be passed, and should declare that it should be a judicial proceeding in rem and the decision binding upon all the world, it hardly is to be supposed that the simple device could make the constitutionality of the law res adjudicata, if it subsequently should be drawn in question before a court of the United States. And all that we have said would be equally true if an appeal had been taken to the supreme court of appeals and it had confirmed the rate. Its action in doing so would not have been judicial, although the questions debated by it might have been the same that might come before it as a court, and would have been discussed and passed upon by it in the same way that it would deal with them if they arose afterwards in a case properly so called.

The mere fact that a legislative body exercises at times a final judgment, as in passing upon claims or in passing upon the title to a seat, the mere fact that these incidental powers necessary and indispensable to its existence as a legislative body are in their nature judicial does not give them the character of a judicial procedure such as we know it when it is had in a court of competent jurisdiction. The very object and the purpose of a court are to terminate a case, to have an end to it, to set people at peace, and the very object and the very nature of a legisaltive body are to have open at all times the question of reviewing its procedure whenever it feels proper to do so.

Mr. JONES. I can not agree with the Senator from Idaho that the Senate is not acting as a court in this matter. The sole issue is, "Was there such corruption in the election of Senator LORIMER as to vitiate his election?" The decision of that question ought to be made entirely on the evidence, and we can not sit other than as judges, and no consideration other than the evidence adduced should weigh in rendering our decision.

When it comes to practical results I imagine the Senator from Idaho and I will not be far apart, as I shall show later on. Of course he, taking the position that this is not really a court or a judicial matter, will not agree with me on my argument based on that proposition. But I have very decided opinions on this question, and I have tried to present them plainly this afternoon. I believe they are fully sustained by authority of the decisions of the courts and by the precedents in the Senate itself.

I have already pointed out that it is the general rule of the courts that no court has a right to vacate its judgment after the expiration of the term at which it was rendered, and that such a rule is adhered to by the Supreme Court of the United States, though there is no power in the Government to overrule this court if it should see fit to take a different course.

In other words, the power of the Supreme Court over its decisions is absolute, just the same as the power of the Senate over its decisions is absolute. The Senate may decide this case to-morrow in favor of LORIMER, and the governor of the State may send a Senator here, and yet the Senate has it in its power—the next Congress, even—to bring up the question and say the man appointed by the governor is not entitled to his seat and that Senator LORIMER is entitled to it. But I venture to say the Senate would never exercise any such power. It would not have the right to exercise it, although it had the power to do so.

I have already quoted from Bronson v. Schulten (104 U. S., 410), showing the rule followed by the United States Supreme Court in reference to opening a case after the term closed. As I said a moment ago, I use the word "term" in connection with the Senate in the same sense as we use the term "the expiration of the term" as applied to a court. The Supreme Court is a continuing body, just as the Senate is a continuing body, but it has its regular term, like the Senate of the United States has its term.

The Senate of the United States should show proper respect to its own judgment. If it does not, how can it expect others to do so? If it vacates a judgment in one case simply because it has the power to do so, why may it not act that way in other cases? What is to prevent a partisan majority from unseating any Member of the opposite party? Anyone can see the dire condition that such a rule might bring about. The reasons which called for the enforcement of the doctrine of res adjudicata by the courts apply even more strongly to the Senate. In the case of the Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States (168 U. S., 49), the court said:

> This general rule is demanded by the very object for which civil courts have been established, which is to secure the peace and repose of society by the settlement of matters capable of a judicial determination. Its enforcement is essential to the maintenance of social order, for the aid of judicial tribunals would not be invoked for the vindication of the rights of person and property if, as between parties and their privies, conclusiveness did not attend the judgments of such tribunals in respect of all matters properly put in issue and actually determined by them.

The enforcement of this rule by the United States Senate is essential to the very stability and perpetuity of our form of government. Under the foregoing rule and principles this Senate would not question the right of Mr. LORIMER to his seat even though new evidence had been produced to impeach him, his right having been determined by the Sixty-first Congress.

Now, I will answer the question the Senator from Idaho presented some time ago, and in answering him I think I will place myself on about the same basis that he takes in this matter, so far as its decision is concerned. In my view of this case it is not necessary to express an opinion as to what the Senate should do in case new evidence was produced showing corruption in the election of Senator LORIMER, because no such evidence has been produced; but I will say for myself that if new and substantial evidence had been discovered, showing conclusively that he had secured his election by corruption, I would not feel bound to follow these principles to the limit, but I would feel that the Senate would be justified in the maintenance of its own integrity and honor in vacating its judgment and denying to Mr. LORIMER a seat in this body.

In making that statement I realize that I am going contrary to what I believe to be the rule laid down by the courts, but if I were convinced beyond a reasonable doubt—I think I would have to be convinced that far upon a rehearing—by the evidence produced that the election was secured by corruption, I think I would vote to exclude the Member in order that the integrity of the Senate might be preserved and in accordance with my belief in fair and honest elections.

Mr. BORAH. How would the Senator, sitting as a judge, get the newly discovered evidence before him if he holds to the doctrine of res adjudicata in reference to a judgment?

Mr. JONES. I think I can explain that by stating that my position is a little different from that of the Senator. I do not understand and I do not believe that the Senate has yet vacated its former judgment. I do not believe that the passage of the resolution appointing the committee was a vacation of that judgment. I did not vote for it with that idea. I voted for it simply for the purpose of reinvestigating the facts, so that they might be properly presented to the Senate, and the Senate then could determine whether it would vacate its judgment. That judgment still stands as the judgment of the Senate, and will so stand until we finally act on the resolution now pending.

Mr. BORAH. What would be the position of a judge sitting upon a bench in reference to a matter which was claimed to have been closed by a final judgment, who should say, "Notwithstanding this matter was closed, notwithstanding the fact that I have no power to review it, I will hear the evidence to see if you have any newly discovered evidence, and if I find that you have I will ignore this doctrine of res adjudicata"?

Mr. JONES. Under the rule which I have read from the courts—I recognize the force of the Senator's suggestion—I am willing to admit the difference between this body and a regularly constituted court, and will lay down the proposition to that extent, differing from the inflexible rule in the court. I recognize the fact that if I am to adhere in accordance with the rule laid down absolutely, then I will not make this exception. But I am willing to make it, and I think I have a right to make it. I do not believe that we have granted a new trial in this case as a court grants a new trial. We simply appointed a committee to go out and investigate and report the facts to the Senate, and then the Senate is to decide whether or not the judgment is to be vacated.

Of course, a new trial in the Senate differs from one in a court. When a court orders a new trial it vacates its judgment. The Senate does not do it. The Senate, after it vacates its judgment, is concluded. It does not go any further. We make the investigation beforehand and present the facts to the Senate, upon which the Senate determines whether or not it will vacate the judgment, and then, it seems to me, is the proper time for the rule of res adjudicata to be applied.

As I said, I am willing to apply it absolutely, except in cases where on a new investigation evidence is produced which shows almost conclusively that the election was corrupt. Then, when the Senate comes to take final action, I would vote in favor of the purity of the election.

This matter is just like almost any other legal proposition. While we are all presumed to know the law, almost all of us look at it in a different way, and none differ so much as to what the law actually is as the lawyers.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not want to detain the Senator, but I simply call attention to this thought: The mere fact that in passing upon this case and similar cases the Senate exercises a judicial power, or a quasi-judicial power, does not mean that in exercising that judicial power, or quasi-judicial power, the Senate is bound to follow the rules that courts have adopted for the exercise of the judicial powers vested in them. The Senate can exercise this judicial power, or quasi-judicial power, in any way it sees fit. So that in no sense, except by a rather far-fetched analogy, are these rules that the courts have adopted binding upon the Senate. The Senate has fixed no rule for procedure, except that in the very few cases that have been cited it has declared its attitude, and in those cases there have been minority reports.

So, I fail to see the force of quoting in extenso from the rules of courts when, as the Senate, we simply possess a judicial power that we can exercise in any way we see fit.

Mr. JONES. I have been very unfortunate, Mr. President, if I have not made clear my position in that regard. I have said, time and again, that the Senate has absolute power to do exactly as it pleases with reference to this matter. It is bound by no rule in this respect. It is not even bound by the Constitution. The Constitution leaves its powers absolute and despotic.

As I have said before, we could decide in favor of Senator LORIMER to-day, and we could decide against him to-morrow, and at the next session we could again decide in his favor, and at the following session we could decide against him, and 10 years from now we could pass a resolution declaring that Senator LORIMER was entitled to his seat at a time when we said he was not. But I venture to say we would not do that.

We have absolute power over this matter, and it is simply a question of how we should exercise it. It is simply a question whether we will act in accordance with well-settled rules and principles, or whether we will act arbitrarily according to the whim or opinion of the majority. I have been contending that we should exercise the power in line with the precedents in the Senate itself and in accord with similar rules adopted by the courts, and especially by the Supreme Court of the United States, which is not bound by the action of any other tribunal, whose decisions can not be reviewed by any other tribunal, and which has held that when it has rendered a judgment and the term has expired and no steps are taken to reopen it, it will not do so; that while it has the power, it has not the right to do it. That is all. That is simply my position.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. I will yield, though I would like to get along.

Mr. REED. Is not that the very distinction between the courts and the Senate? Of course, the courts have repeatedly refused to inquire into a judgment after the term of court has expired, unless some motion is filed to carry the case over; and invariably the refusal of the court has been upon the single ground that under the law they have no jurisdiction or power after the term has expired.

The Senator has conceded that this body does have the power that is under discussion. When he makes that admission, he admits that the rule adopted by the courts has no potency here. The courts refuse to interfere from lack of power, whereas the Senator concedes that we do possess the power. I think when he concedes that he concedes the entire argument.

To conclude what I started to say, there are a number of States that have changed the law and have provided for review upon petition filed a year after the term has expired. In one State that I have in mind I think the limit is three years. In the States where the law has been so changed that the court does possess the power it is frequently exercised.

So we come back to this: The courts refuse to interfere because of lack of power under the law, and only for that reason. We possessing the power under the law have full right to exercise it if conscience and right demand such exercise.

It seems to me the Senator concedes the whole question when he concedes that we do possess the power.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I did not concede that the courts refused to exercise this power because they did not have the power to do it. I contend that the Supreme Court of the United States has the power, but that of its own volition it refuses to exercise it, for the reasons given.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator further yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES. I do not believe it is necessary to pursue that phase of the matter, but I yield.

Mr. REED. While the Supreme Court might brutally do a thing, the Supreme Court is bound by the Constitution and the law. The law is so written that if it did exercise the power it would violate the law. Therefore, it does not possess the power, except as it may exercise arbitrary force. When we are speaking of a power we are speaking of a legal power and a legal right. The Supreme Court did not possess it; hence it refused to exercise any other power than a legal power. But here we do have the legal power. That is the distinction.

Mr. JONES. The Supreme Court of the United States has the legal power, Mr. President. There is no constitutional or statutory provision prohibiting the Supreme Court of the United States from opening a judgment after the expiration of the term. But while it has the power to do it, it has refused to do it, not because of legal or constitutional restrictions, but simply because it does not think it is the proper rule to follow.

However, that is not this case. No new evidence has been discovered impeaching Senator LORIMER's title, or showing clearly or at all that his election was secured by corruption. On the contrary, I am absolutely convinced that he was honestly elected and that his right to a seat in this body should not be questioned. For this Senate to vacate the judgment rendered at the preceding Congress is to violate the unbroken precedents of the Senate itself and to invoke the rule of might instead of the rule of right.

I believe it my duty to decide this case as a judge and not as a partisan or a factionalist. I have endeavored to weigh the evidence in its entirety and to reach a verdict in accordance with the law and judicial procedure that has been evolved in the progress of civilization for the purpose of insuring justice to the individual and protection to the State. In saying this I do not intend to suggest even that any of my colleagues are acting differently. I do know, however, that many people in this country would have us act differently. There are great and powerful newspapers who would have me voting against Senator LORIMER regardless of my conviction of his innocence, and they advocate this under the guise of progress and good government. Many seem to think the question has become a public or national one, and a vote on this matter is taken as an evidence of progress or reaction, as an evidence of devotion to the interests of the people or as an evidence of enmity to honest elections, as an evidence of hatred of bribery, or as an evidence of its approval.

There are those in the country who will say that those who vote for Senator LORIMER approve bribery and corrupt election. There are those in the country who will say that a vote cast against Senator LORIMER is a vote cast against corruption and bribery. I know Members of the Senate do not look at the matter in that way. I know Members of the Senate do not look upon those who vote for Senator LORIMER as approving corruption and as approving bribery. I think every Senator ought to make it plain to the people of the country that this case must be decided upon its merits, and that those who vote for or against Senator LORIMER are each just as patriotic and just as devoted to the principle of purity in elections as any others.

There is a spirit of intolerance abroad in the land that is to be deplored. This is not a political question and it ought not to be made one. It ought not to be decided in any factional spirit. It ought not to be decided on impressions or beliefs, but upon conviction based upon the law and the evidence.

Is it possible that when a man is charged with dishonesty and corruption he is to be convicted and condemned because he does not agree with the popular idea upon some political question? Has it come to this, that the people prefer representatives who will subordinate their honest convictions to popular clamor not only upon legislative matters but upon judicial issues as well? Is there any fair man who, if charged with a crime, would like to have the jury pass on his case according to public opinion instead of according to the evidence? Is there a fair, honest man who, serving on a jury and convinced that the man he is trying is innocent, would disregard the law and the evidence and bring in a verdict of guilty because the popular impression is that he is guilty? And yet there are thousands who have not read the testimony, or much less heard it, who can see nothing but corruption in a vote for Mr. LORIMER by those who have seen the witnesses on the stand, heard their testimony, and are convinced of his innocence.

Some say the people have read the evidence. I deny it. The people have read biased, garbled, partisan extracts of the evidence, but there is no paper in the land that has printed all of the evidence or any considerable part of it. Those who have printed the most have printed that part of the evidence which supports their views. Papers favorable to Senator LORIMER have printed that part of the evidence favorable to him. Papers unfriendly to him have printed parts of the evidence that are unfavorable. The papers taking a special interest in the matter are those unfriendly to Senator LORIMER. This is natural. Our enemies are always more active against us than our friends are for us, and when we consider that most of the great daily papers of Chicago are against Senator LORIMER and have in season and out of season presented this case in a biased and unfriendly way, while practically all of the papers outside of Chicago have said but little one way or the other, we can fully understand why the people have honestly obtained the impression that there is no doubt but that his election was secured corruptly. Added to this, the so-called progressive papers have espoused the reactionary spirit of presuming a man guilty until he proves his innocence, and have even gone so far as to disregard and ignore all the principles of justice that have come to us through the ages and propose to decide this question by the rule of might rather than by the rule of right.

Some Democrats believe Senator LORIMER innocent; some believe him guilty. Some Republicans believe him innocent; some Republicans believe him guilty. All progressives know he is guilty. Is it possible that it is progression to assume a man guilty because he is charged by some one with an improper act? That is not my idea of progress. Is it progress to hold a man dishonest and corrupt who does not agree with us? I do not believe in that sort of progress. Is it progress to refuse a man a seat in this body because he does not believe in one political faction or follow certain political dogmas? That may be progress for awhile, but the American people will not adhere to it long. Our people are, on the whole, fair and just. They will not long admire or approve the judge who makes his decision to suit their view and will rather than his honest convictions; and, fully appreciating the public impression regarding this case, I shall cast my vote trusting in the justice and fairness of the people to approve adherence to honest convictions of duty, even though they may not agree with one's judgment. Men are threatened with political oblivion if they do not act in a certain way, and it is peculiar that self-styled progressive newspapers and individuals who are opposed to domination and tyranny in politics seem to exert their utmost to compel men to vote in accordance with their views. This is a confession of the weakness of their cause and would be ridiculous if it were not so serious.

The distinguished Senator from Indiana said that it is suggested that the people are not interested in this question. I have never heard such a suggestion made. The people are interested in this question. They are interested, however, in having it decided justly and honestly. If Senator LORIMER was elected corruptly, they are interested in the verdict accordingly, but, Mr. President, if he did not secure his election by corruption they are even more interested in having us so declare. The people are interested in this question not as a matter of legislation, but they are interested in having the Senate acting within its rights and acting as a court in doing justice to Senator LORIMER according to its honest convictions of the evidence which it has taken and with which it ought to be more familiar than they. The people expect us to do our duty regardless of public clamor and prejudice.

The Senator from Montana said:

I do not care what public opinion is.

Of course, he did not mean it exactly that way. We do care for public opinion. I care for public opinion. I like to please my people by my course here. It is far easier to act in accordance with the opinion of the people than against it, but, like the Senator from Montana, I purpose casting my vote pursuant to my convictions of duty under the law and the evidence as I see it in this case. Some may condemn me for it and applaud him for his vote, and yet he and I vote on exactly the same sense of duty and responsibility.

He says that public opinion "has nothing to do with the trial of this case. Public opinion is not a part of the record in this action."

That is my position exactly.

The enemies of Senator LORIMER, however, the newspapers that have been filling their columns with opinions, editorials, and statements as to what Senators should do here and what the effect will be upon them if they do not vote in a certain way, do not act on this theory. They seem to think that it is their place to create a public sentiment that will dash against the doors of this Senate and overcome the convictions and judgments of its Members and compel them against their will to disregard the evidence, pay no attention to the justice and merits of this case, but to deprive Senator LORIMER of the seat which the solemn verdict of the Senate has confirmed to him.

I do not want to believe that there is a Senator here who will do it; and it would seem important to declare, so that the public may read, that this Senate proposes, no matter what its verdict may be, to cast its verdict not in pursuance of public clamor and public demand, but in pursuance of what it believes to be the law and the evidence and the merits of the case. This has gone so far that strong men, fair-minded men, who desire to do what is right, have given up, as it were, in disgust, and said, "Let us end this matter, put LORIMER out, and close the case." A great newspaper in my State has practically taken this position. A very good friend of mine, running a newspaper in my home town, has said "LORIMER should go on general principles." Has justice fled to brutish beasts? Have we lost all sense of fair play? Have we, as a Nation and as a people, embraced the principles of lynch law? It looks like it. We believe in fair play. We have heard much of the square deal, and the people believe in it. Has Senator LORIMER had a square deal? Is he having a square deal now? When the people of this country come to consider the methods pursued in this case and the tremendous influences that have been brought to compel and coerce the Senate against him, they will revolt at what has been done.

When these charges were made testimony was taken, and the trial was begun in the Senate. While we were sitting as a court and acting as judges the President of the United States attempted to influence some of the judges against Mr. LORIMER and enlisted the powerful influence of an ex-President of the United States against him. I have a great admiration for President Taft. I believe in his ability, his statesmanship, his honesty, his integrity, and his courage. When the people understand him, when they realize what he has accomplished in the line of real progress and for the good of the people, they will appreciate how greatly he has been maligned and misrepresented; but this yielding on his part to popular clamor in this case is one blot on his record that never will be effaced. Letters from men representing powerful newspapers and powerful influences were written to the Members of the Senate in confidence, stating alleged facts of which the writers had no knowledge but which had been given to them in confidence and the truth of which they vouched for. If this is to be tolerated, is there any Member of this Senate who is safe from such insidious attack?

An ex-President of the United States, both loved and trusted by the people as no President in the history of the Republic, was sought out by a bitter enemy of Senator LORIMER, and was told by him of statements made by another enemy of LORIMER, but as a friend of the ex-President Mr. Kohlsaat assured him that statements of which he had no knowledge were true, and on this assurance and while a committee of the Senate was making its investigation the ex-President denounced Mr. LORIMER with the apparent purpose of inflaming public opinion against him. Even though the first Senate committee was in session these alleged facts were not called to its attention. The Senate was allowed to pass judgment. That judgment was in favor of LORIMER, and then and not till then these secret statements were made public and this new investigation had, and these statements upon which the ex-President acted are shown to be untrue and unfounded.

Will the American people stand for a deal like this? Is that the square deal of which we are so boastful? Then, after the Senate had deliberately voted in favor of Senator LORIMER, this whole power was enlisted against him. Allegations of new evidence were made. The evidence which had been brought to the attention of some of the Senators before the former judgment was rendered and which fairness to the Senate and fairness to Senator LORIMER required should have been presented before the verdict was rendered and a new Senate, a Senate one-third of whose membership had been elected since that verdict, was asked to reinvestigate this question. A further investigation was ordered. While it has been pending threats have been made that Senators would be defeated because of their votes. A former President of the United States, as a candidate for nomination to the Presidency, made this question an issue in his campaign, and, with no opportunity for defense, Mr. LORIMER has been held up to scorn and obloquy before partisan audiences, and we in this Chamber are told that unless we deprive him of his seat we will lose our own. Is there a man with real American blood in his veins who with a calm judgment and in the presence of his own conscience will say that this is a square deal?

Mr. President, I have heard the testimony in this case; I have seen the witnesses testify; I have tried to measure and weigh all of the testimony. I am convinced that the testimony does not show that there were any corrupt practices exercised in the election of Senator LORIMER. I am satisfied that his election was the natural outcome and the inevitable outcome of the political situation in Illinois. I am satisfied that the new evidence upon which this Senate was asked to reopen this case has absolutely failed to materialize. I am satisfied that Senator LORIMER holds his seat in this Senate by just as perfect a title as any Member here. My conscience and my judgment coincide with that view. Believing that, I can not vote otherwise. I would not vote otherwise if every man, woman, and child in my State asked me to do it. I want to please them, but I must please my conscience first. If I go to political oblivion in the future by reason of my vote on this case, I will go at peace with my own conscience and with the satisfaction of having done what is just and fair and right as I see it. I would rather retire from this honorable body with the approval of my own conscience and judgment than to retain a place here indefinitely by disregarding my convictions as to my duty. No, Mr. President; I will not seek place and power and honor at the sacrifice of an approving conscience.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate has been in session now for over seven hours.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to have permission to put into the RECORD, in connection with some remarks I made awhile ago, some excerpts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on this subject which we were discussing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, consent will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

INDIANA ELECTION QUESTION.

Mr. SEWARD.

It is answered to this proposition which I have submitted; that the Senate has already decided the question as to the title of these seats; that the decision is a judicial one; final, absolute, irreversible; and so one which can not admit of reconsideration. This seems to me an extraordinary proposition. I can not conceive upon what ground it can be claimed that any decision which has ever been made by this body is incapable of reconsideration. I can conceive of a mistaken theory of the constitution of the Senate which leads to this extraordinary conclusion. I imagine that Senators coming from a different forum, coming from the bar, coming from courts of justice, and familiar with their proceedings and practices, suppose that when the Senate decides upon a question of elections or of privilege like this it pronounces a judgment and similar to the judgment of a court; and then they invoke the principle that the deliberate judgment of a court from which there is no appeal and which has no power of reconsideration is final. I take issue with the whole of this theory, from beginning to end. It is true the Constitution does say that each House of Congress shall be the judge of the qualifications of its own Members; but it uses the word judge in the sense of considering and determining a legislative question, not in a sense which converts this legislative body into a tribunal or court of justice. It is of the very essence of the constitution of the Senate that it is not in any case judicial except when it sits as a court for the trial of impeachments, and then it is called no longer a Senate, but is called a court, and expressly constituted a court by the organic law. In all other cases it is a legislative body.

The order which has been adopted with regard to this Indiana question is but a resolution, a legislative act, a gathering of the sense of a majority of the Senate, conclusive and final until reconsidered or repealed or abolished or legislated away by another resolution or by another law. Suppose a seat should be granted here, on due consideration of credentials, which should afterwards be ascertained to be forged. Must the guilty incumbent nevertheless retain a place among us and unite in deciding on the interests and policy of this great Nation? Must he do so, even excluding a legal and true representative of the State misrepresented?

This is the very essence of a legislative body in this country, that it is bound by no precedents, that it is governed by no paramount law except the Constitution of the State or of the United States. Where the Constitution of the United States does not restrain its action, it is at liberty to act upon its discretion, upon its sense of justice, to-day, and to reverse to-morrow what it did to-day, and to reverse 50 years hence what it did 50 years ago. All legislative bodies—the Parliament of England and parliaments everywhere—have always been governed by this principle. Even in those semijudicial transactions, those acts which assume something of a judicial character, affecting personal and individual rights and estates, acts of confiscation and of attainder, in the British Parliament they are perpetually reconsidered; sometimes the next day, even before the sentence of deprivation is executed; sometimes the next year, sometimes 10 years, sometimes 50 years, after they have been executed, and they are reversed at pleasure.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, the constitution of a court is entirely different from the constitution of a legislative body. It is of the very nature of a court of justice that it is directed by laws written and prescribed by a superior power, and to which it must conform its judgment. It must, moreover, proceed upon the evidence or testimony received. It can and must exclude all knowledge of the subject matter of the merits of any case which it examines, except what is submitted to it by parties litigating before it; it must conform to laws and precedents which have been established by itself or by higher tribunals or legislatures. Now, how different is this from the form in which questions are heard, tried, and determined here? We take no testimony; that is to say, we need to take none. We act upon information communicated to us, no matter by whom received, no matter in what way, even on information existing in our own breasts, which we may, if we choose, suppress. We act not necessarily in obedience or conformity to any precedents, but upon our own sense of right, necessity, and expediency with regard to the public welfare. Insomuch as we have no guidance except the Constitution, which is silent in regard to the great mass of matters which come before us, as we have no formal testimony submitted to us, it follows that we may err; that we do often err; and it is because we can and may and must err so often that we are made responsible to the people to answer for the manner in which we discharge our great duty, at the expiration of limited terms of service, that the people may judge whether we decided in all cases rightly, whether we decided wisely, whether we decided justly. But insomuch as we may err so often and must err so often, we also have always a right to review and correct our errors; legislative errors are not corrected by hired tribunals, but only by themselves. We can only correct our errors by reconsidering our judgments ourselves. If we neglect or refuse to do so, the people will dismiss us and call into our places those who can, and, if need be, will, revise all our doings and correct all our errors.

I protest, therefore, sir, in the outset against the doctrine which, by fanciful analogy, transfers from the law books of the courts to this Senate Chamber the principle of res adjudicata. I deny that any decision which the Senate can make, any law which it can pass, is final and is not always and forever a subject of reconsideration.

INDIANA ELECTION QUESTION.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will allow me, I desire merely to ask him a question of law on the point which he is arguing. Suppose the charter of a city gives to the board of common council, or the board of aldermen, as they all do, to decide upon the elections of their own members. Suppose either body, the aldermen or the common council, decides on a certain day that a certain person whose seat is contested is legally elected. On a subsequent day the board reverses that decision by a vote and decides that he is not legally elected. He files his petition for a mandamus in the court having jurisdiction to compel the council to admit him to a seat. Would the court, in view of those two decisions, feel bound to issue the mandamus without compelling him to show, in addition, that he was actually elected? Would they say that the first decision was binding, that they could not reverse it, and that they would not ask who was elected?

Mr. SEWARD.

Why, sir, we have sat here hour after hour, and learned gentlemen of the law discuss the question of the effect of a resolution of the Senate by analogies derived from the practice and proceedings of courts of the common law. We have had analogies between the proceedings of the Senate and the process of mandamus in the State courts, together with parallels between our own resolutions and judgments, final and interlocutory, in the tribunals of other countries. We have had the decision of the Senate, made in the form of resolutions, pronounced by worthy lawyers to be in effect identical with judgments in rem, borrowed from the civil law. Because a judgment of mandamus, or some other final judgment, entered upon a record, instead of an interlocutory order, is, without some provision made for its review, held final in the courts, it is alleged, most illogically, that the resolutions of this body are final and irreversible.

Sir, when you have declared that the Senate has ever made a decision which was final and irrevocable, then you have ascertained one decision of this Senate that was infallible; and the body that has power to make one infallible judgment has the power to make more. So each Senate may anticipate and usurp the functions of its successor. The principle, then, for which our assent is demanded is that the resolutions and orders of this Senate upon the subject of elections are infallible. Gentlemen tell us we must acquiesce out of respect to the Senate; that we must submit, though we think they are wrong; we must not question them.

I am claiming only the vindication of the principle for which I contend, namely, that its decisions are always open to review, and that the Senate never pronounces a final judgment upon anything.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senate has now been in session for over seven hours, and I understand that there is no Senator who desires to proceed this afternoon. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m., Wednesday, July 10) the Senate took a recess until Thursday, July 11, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 10, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. John Compton Ball, of the Metropolitan Baptist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, in the opening moments of this day's proceedings, we stand in reverence before Thee, thanking Thee for past mercies and pleading that Thou wilt continue the same unto us. Let Thy benediction, we pray Thee, rest upon our land and every citizen thereof, and especially do we pray that Thy blessing rest upon this House of Representatives as its Members plan for the present and future betterment of the people.

We pray, O God, that the power of Thy spirit may be with us as a country and that we may ever stand before the nations of the earth as the exponent of the things that are right and pure and good. In the name of Christ our Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COTTON STATISTICS.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Census be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish cotton statistics, with Senate amendments, to the end that I may move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments thereto and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Of course the House understands that this is Calendar Wednesday, but it seems to the Chair that little conference matters like this might be gotten out of the way. The Chair is not ruling upon it, but is making a suggestion.

Mr. MANN. What is the purpose of this, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I am asking that the Committee on the Census be discharged from the further consideration of this bill in order that I may move to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference. I will say that this is quite an urgent matter, in view of the fact that the special agents who go out to gather this information are due to start out on the 1st of August, and it is very necessary that the laws on that subject be codified, which this bill does, that they may know just under what rules they are to collect these statistics.

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman that where a bill with Senate amendments is referred to a committee in this way, if he wishes to discharge the committee by unanimous consent, it is only fair to the minority that we have notice of that in advance, so that we may examine the amendments.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I will state that this matter was brought before the Committee on the Census, and it was the unanimous view of the committee, both majority and minority, that this course be taken, and the committee recommended it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman to let it go over for the present, so that we may look into it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, disagree to all of the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the naval appropriation bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. PADGETT, Mr. GREGG of Texas, and Mr. FOSS.

COTTON STATISTICS.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Speaker, I now renew my request for unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on the Census from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish cotton statistics, with Senate amendments thereto, and to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The SPEAKER announced the following conferees on the part of the House: Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. SMALL, and Mr. CRUMPACKER.

MRS. C. N. GRAVES—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. TURNBULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill (S. 1302) for the relief of Mrs. C. N. Graves, widow of R. F. Graves, jr., from the Committee on Claims to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the bill?

Mr. TURNBULL. It is a private claim. The bill has passed the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Claims in the House, whereas it should have been referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday and the call rests with the Committee on Labor. The bill under consideration is H. R. 22913, to create a department of labor.

This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 22913, a bill to create a department of labor, with Mr. RUSSELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 22913) to create a department of labor.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this bill proposes to establish a department of labor and to change the present Department of Commerce and Labor to a department of commerce. It provides a secretary of labor, who shall be a member of the President's Cabinet; three assistant secretaries, a Solicitor of the Department of Justice for the department of labor, a chief clerk, a disbursing clerk, and such other clerks, inspectors, and special agents as may be provided for by Congress. It transfers the Commissioner General of Immigration, the commissioners of immigration, the Bureau of Immigration, the Immigration Service at large, the Bureau of Labor, and the Commissioner of Labor from the Department of Commerce and Labor to the department of labor. It changes the title of the Bureau of Labor to the bureau of labor statistics, and the Commissioner of Labor to the commissioner of labor statistics, and transfers the duties of the Commissioner of Labor to the commissioner of labor statistics, including those imposed by the Erdman Act. It authorizes the collection and publication of statistics relative to the conditions of labor and the products and distribution of the products of the same, and authorizes the secretary of labor to call upon other departments of the Government for such statistical data as they may have wished would be valuable for that purpose. It authorizes the secretary of labor to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes, thereby giving the influence of the Government toward industrial peace. It directs the secretary of labor to investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities of his office with the activities of the present bureaus, commissions, and departments, in order to harmonize and unify such activities, with a view to further legislation to further define the duties and powers of the department of labor.

Mr. Chairman, for many years there has been a great demand for the establishment of a department of labor in which the great labor interests of the country might be represented in the President's Cabinet. There are in the neighborhood of 30,000,000 of workmen employed in the United States, and notwithstanding that fact, notwithstanding the fact that the great bulk of our people are wageworkers or farmers, there has been no representative of labor in the President's Cabinet up until this time. One of the beneficial features, one of the most important features, there is in this bill is the feature in the section which gives to the secretary of labor the power to act as mediator or to appoint commissions of conciliation in trade disputes. Those who have had experience in trade disputes know that in their early stages when the tension is not great, when both sides to the controversy are in a receptive frame of mind, that some one who has the confidence of both parties, acting as a mediator, would be in a position to bring the contending parties together and thereby avoid industrial disputes to a great extent. It is not to be expected, it can not be hoped, that giving this power to the secretary of labor would entirely avoid industrial disputes, but it would tend to reduce them to the minimum.

When a trade dispute is inaugurated or begun is the time to act as a conciliator or as a mediator. When it goes on until the workmen have reached the point that they consider that the employer is a bloodthirsty oppressor of labor, and the employer has reached the point when he considers that the workmen are anarchists and lawbreakers, then there is little hope or little chance to avoid a settlement of the difficulty until some one of the parties to the contest has been exhausted; but if we reach the controversy before it has reached that stage, then you are in a position to bring the contending parties together and allow them to work out the solution of their own problem. It is not intended to give to the department of labor or the secretary of labor powers of arbitration or in any manner convey to him powers that would be of an arbitrary nature. Personally, I do not believe that compulsory arbitration is possible. With compulsory arbitration, if it were possible, two things might occur, one of which would be that the workmen might be compelled to accept conditions and to work under conditions that they feel to be onerous, that they feel to be unjust, that they do not want to work under yet are compelled to work whether they want to or not, and a condition of that kind is slavery. On the other hand, if it is compulsory arbitration then the employer of labor might be compelled to employ men and continue operations at a loss until his entire property had been swept away. Both conditions are wrong. And in addition to that compulsory arbitration is unfair to the wageworkers. There has been a great deal said throughout the country with regard to compulsory arbitration, and that it ought to be placed in our laws in order to protect the general public. But with compulsory arbitration there is a clean-cut dividing line between profit and loss that protects the employer of labor against any unfair or unjust decision on the part of arbitrators in rendering their decisions.

There is a direct and clean dividing line to guide them in rendering their decision that would protect the employer against any injustice or unfair decision, but with the employee, on the other hand, it is different. There is no distinct dividing line there. The standard of living is a flexible proposition that may be enhanced or lowered and the workman still live. He has no distinct dividing line to protect him, and hence compulsory arbitration entered into under those circumstances would be unfair and unjust to the workingmen, and the only condition under which arbitration can be entered into that would be fair and just to the wageworker is when arbitration has been determined upon and the necessary safeguards have been agreed upon in advance to protect the wageworker in the results of the arbitration.

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. HOBSON. Does this bill contemplate the determination by the bureau of the conditions of arbitration?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. HOBSON. Or do not the contending parties have to agree themselves mutually to the arbitration?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I am simply stating that this bill does not go so far as to provide for arbitration. It goes to the extent of providing for mediation. It provides for conciliation; it provides for the officer of the Government having that standing which comes with being an officer of the Government and having the influence of the Government behind him, acting as a mediator between the contending parties, acting at the very inception of it before feeling has become strong between the contending parties.

Mr. HOBSON. I was just bringing it up because I did not understand the gentleman to mean that arbitration could not be properly guaranteed for both parties in advance.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The only way in which arbitration can be entered into between employer and employee, in which the rights of both parties can be properly protected, is by both parties getting together and agreeing upon the basis upon which arbitration shall be entered into.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield just a moment?

Mr. HOBSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. I would like to ask if the gentleman has made somewhat of a complete study of the Canadian system, which seems to be very much on the line of the provisions of this bill—a mere system of persuasion or mediation?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This bill does not go so far as the Canadian system goes.

Mr. HARDY. The Canadian system, as I understand it, has one provision that no lockout or strike shall be declared until an effort has been made through the medium of the board of conciliation provided by their law.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This law does not provide for keeping workmen at work, either of their own volition or otherwise, pending negotiations. The Canadian law provides that the workmen can not be locked out in a body and the workmen can not strike in a body until after the commissioner has made an investigation.

Mr. HARDY. This law does not so provide?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This law does not so provide.

Mr. HARDY. And is not that the main difference between this and the Canadian system?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is the principal difference between the Canadian law, which does not work satisfactorily to the wageworkers, I may say to the gentleman, and the provision in this law providing for mediation and conciliation.

Mr. HARDY. Is the gentleman prepared to give the House the information as to how many disputes have been under consideration by the Canadian commission and how many have been adjusted satisfactorily to both parties?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; I am not in a position to give the gentleman that information.

Mr. HARDY. I just wanted to say that my reading on that subject has led me to the conclusion that that measure in Canada probably has worked with remarkable success, though not perfectly, however, and it may be that the omission of that provision in this bill is a wise one, but it seems to me it is well worth considering.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In my judgment, no law should be enacted in the United States that would prohibit the workingmen from ceasing to work either individually or collectively whenever, in their judgment, the conditions were not satisfactory to work under.

Mr. HARDY. I wanted to make this suggestion, that it seems to me it was a little like peace propositions adopted on the resolution of Bryan prohibiting nations from going to war until after an effort at adjustment and arrangement as to peace; that labor and capital both might be benefited by a temporary delay before resort to last measures. That is the only compulsory feature of the Canadian law, and that might be a wise provision in this bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In my judgment, it would not be a wise measure. I do not believe we should introduce into our laws the idea that any workman, no matter who he is, should be required to labor against his will except for punishment for crime.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does this bill come with a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This bill comes with a unanimous report from the Committee on Labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On the question of arbitration, which seems to be referred to only in section 9, it is provided—

That the secretary of labor shall have power to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes.

And so forth.

The authority given by this paragraph to the secretary of labor goes no further than the employment of commissioners of mediation?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is all. The only power that he has is to act himself as a mediator or to appoint commissioners of conciliation. That is as far as his power goes in an effort to bring the contending parties together and to let them, when brought together in the proper frame of mind, work out the solution of their own problems.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If a department like this is to be created I should like to see it made effective, and I should like to see it do some good to those whom it is intended to benefit. I would like to know, therefore, whether in the event the secretary of labor, acting as mediator, determining a question, or arriving at a judgment in some dispute as between employer and employee, would have any power whatever to enforce his judgment?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Absolutely none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then what would be the advantage in having this legislation?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The great advantage lies in the fact that you would have a great official of the Government who can go to both parties engaged in the dispute and endeavor to bring them together, just as the Erdman Act operates in interstate commerce at the present time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose the mediators appointed by the secretary should, after hearing both parties or making such investigation as they deemed necessary, report that the employers were wrong, and the employers should then refuse to abide by their judgment?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This bill does not provide for any report on the part of the secretary while acting as a mediator, or any report on the part of the commissioners of conciliation. Their sole duties are to endeavor to bring the contending parties together and to allow them, when brought together, to work out the solution of the problem before them.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And then leave the whole question to public opinion?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; then leave the whole question to public opinion and to the judgment of the contending parties.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then, in the event of the workingmen or employers asking for arbitration or mediation, contending that the judgment is not fair to them, and declaring that they will not abide by it, we get no further under this bill than we were before.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This bill provides for the rendering of no judgment whatever in a particular dispute. It provides for a person in authority endeavoring to bring the two parties together, so that they may solve the problem themselves in their own way, using the force of public opinion, as a matter of course, in the effort to adjust the difficulty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose there should be a contractual relation between the employer and the employee? That is to say, an employing bricklayer should have an agreement with the bricklayers employed by him, and there should be a difference of opinion as to the meaning and terms of an agreement or a contract and a dispute should arise over that difference of opinion. Would there be any power vested in the department of labor that would permit the secretary to enforce the terms of the agreement so ascertained?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is nothing in this bill that would permit the department of labor to intervene in a case of that kind, except in a friendly way. Unless the contract itself provided the means of adjustment, the two contending parties would either have to adjust the difference themselves or take it into the courts for adjustment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. To the courts?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is the only recourse they have now, and this does not change that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the gentleman admits, so far as the creation of this department is concerned, that in matters of dispute between employer and employee the department would simply accentuate the differences?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Not at all. It would simply do as the Commissioner of Labor does now, and as the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission does now, under the Erdman Act. It would simply give to the secretary of labor the power not only in disputes relative to interstate commerce but in other disputes, to go in and act as a mediator, as a friend of both parties, in an effort to bring the two parties together so that they could solve the problem themselves.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is done now, so far as it is possible to do it, through the Commissioner of Labor?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That applies only in interstate commerce, and does not apply in anything else.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But in the event of a railroad dispute the Commissioner of Labor would step in, if conditions warranted it, and would offer his services as mediator?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true in that instance, and that instance only; but under the Erdman Act he has no power to compel either side to accept arbitration or to compel either side to accept his views in connection with the controversy. This does not propose to give to the secretary of this department any power other than to use his friendly offices in an effort to adjust disputes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am as anxious as the gentleman is, of course, to alleviate the condition of labor and to improve that condition wherever possible; but in view of the fact that the Bureau of Labor now does the work that is provided for in this bill, upon the admission of the gentleman, I am wondering whether the bill goes any further except in the creation of a department and in providing places for those to be employed in the department, and whether it does anything that is not now done by the Bureau of Labor.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The bureau has only limited authority. Its authority is limited to cases arising in transportation and interstate commerce. This does not limit the secretary of the department of labor to any one particular line of commerce or industry, but gives him the authority to exercise his good offices in any case where a trade dispute arises in an effort to bring the contending parties together.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has made a study of this question. He is aware that there was no department of commerce or of labor, with a seat at the Cabinet table of the Nation, prior to the creation of the present Department of Commerce and Labor in 1903.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true. There never has been a department of labor the head of which had a seat in the Cabinet. There was a Department of Labor, but the head of that department was a Commissioner of Labor, who did not have a seat in the President's Cabinet. When the present Department of Commerce and Labor was created the Department of Labor was made a Bureau of Labor and made a part of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In one of the subdivisions of the earlier part of the bill, where it is proposed to separate the work of the assistant secretaries, provision is made for the agricultural industry. Does not the gentleman think he would run afoul of the Department of Agriculture in that respect?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No. There are in this country in the neighborhood of 5,000,000 agricultural laborers, not farmers in the sense of being owners or lessors of their farms, but laborers who work for wages; and the purpose of this bill is in connection with the 5,000,000 agricultural laborers who work for wages.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will admit that those agricultural laborers have received an incidental benefit, as the farmer himself has received a direct benefit, for many years from the creation and operation of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no question in my mind that every citizen in the United States, no matter what position in life he occupies, has received benefit as a result of the creation and conduct of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman also knows that the Department of Commerce and Labor was created after the Department of Agriculture, and that the purpose of the establishment of the Department of Commerce and Labor was to foster, promote, and encourage the industries and the commerce of the United States; that is to say, the interest of the employer and the interest of the employed not engaged in agricultural industries.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; and the principal purpose of it was to promote commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Upon which industry depends.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No. The reverse is the case; commerce depends upon industry.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Each depends upon the other.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This proposes to establish a department of labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman would not utterly withdraw capital from industry, would he?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I would not withdraw capital from industry. In fact, I would assist industry as far as I possibly could assist it without injuring other interests.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And the gentleman would not withdraw the employer from the employed, but would have them work together, would he not?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think that a lifetime of work in the line of endeavoring to bring employer and employee together for the purpose of making wage contracts satisfactory to both parties, without resorting to the strike—a lifetime of work along that line is a sufficient answer to the gentleman's question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understand the gentleman's intense interest on that subject, and I have followed it as closely as I could. The Department of Commerce and Labor, however, was created in response to a demand that had existed for nearly 100 years for the recognition of commerce. Those who were in favor of the creation of a department of labor entered into the discussion, which resulted in the creation of the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There had been a demand for a department of labor and there had been a demand for a department of commerce prior to the enactment of the law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, and there was great disappointment in the minds of the wageworkers of this country when, instead of having a department of labor, with a representative of labor in the President's Cabinet, there was this compromise measure providing for a Department of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Now, then, I want to ask the gentleman another question. The Department of Commerce and Labor as created in 1903 having been a compromise between those who sought a department of commerce separate from a department of labor and those who sought a department of labor as a separate department, is the gentleman dissatisfied with the Department of Commerce and Labor as it exists to-day so far as results in promoting the industrial and commercial interests of this country are concerned?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the purpose and intent and manner in which the Department of Commerce and Labor is constructed make it impossible for that department as constructed to give the same attention and the same care and bring the same experience to the consideration of labor matters that would be the case if the department of labor was constructed as proposed in this bill, and consequently we ask for the establishment of a department of labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the time has come, in the opinion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] and his committee for a separation of commerce and labor into two parts; that is to say, that commerce shall be looked after by a department of commerce and labor shall have a separate place at the Cabinet table.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is my opinion and the opinion of the committee whose bill I am presenting at this time.

Mr. KENDALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. KENDALL. I do not want to encroach on the gentleman's time, but I desire to suggest in response to what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that at the time the proposition was pending in the Congress for the establishment of a Department of Commerce and Labor, it was suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who wrote the report on the bill establishing that department, that one of the reasons which has been urged why the labor department should not be included in the new department is that there ought to be created a secretary of the labor department with a seat in the Cabinet.

Mr. MANN said:

> Whether this is likely to be done in view of the conservative action in creating new Cabinet officers in the past, it is not for your committee to judge at this time. But it will be as easy to create a secretary of labor if the Department of Labor is, for the present, included in the new department as it would be if the Labor Department is left out by itself. In fact, it seems much more likely that the Labor Department will grow in the scope of its work, and hence be more likely to warrant the creation of a new Cabinet officer to represent labor interests if the proposed action is taken than would be the case if the Labor Department is left as it now is.

So it was contemplated at that time that the contingency would arise in the development of the labor of the country when and where a separate department ought to be established.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That seems to be the judgment of the committee that reported the bill at that time, and of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who wrote the report. My judgment is that the time has now come when there should be a separate department of labor, and when there should be a representative of the great labor interests of the country in the President's Cabinet.

Mr. KINDRED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KINDRED. I have followed the gentleman's remarks with interest. Do I understand from what he has said that it is quite clear there is no provision in this bill which compels arbitration in labor disputes through statutory agencies and agencies of the courts?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is nothing in this bill that provides for arbitration in any form in labor disputes, except in so far as the Secretary of the department, or the conciliators selected by him, may be able to bring parties to an agreement to submit their dispute to arbitration.

Mr. KINDRED. Which is entirely voluntary.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Which is entirely voluntary.

Mr. KINDRED. May I ask the gentleman one more question? To what extent will this bill increase the expense to the Government for carrying out the purposes similar to those which are now being carried out by other departments of the Government?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The increased expenditure I have not figured up.

Mr. SULZER. It will be very little more.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It provides for a Secretary at $12,000 a year.

Mr. SULZER. And three assistant secretaries and a solicitor.

Mr. KINDRED. The idea is that a great deal more will be accomplished in this direction at a very little more expense.

Mr. SULZER. That is true.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. I notice this bill if enacted would provide machinery for conciliation in labor disputes looking to industrial peace. I would like to know whether this would be supplemental to the Erdman Act in case of railroad disputes, or would it supplant that act?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The Erdman Act would still remain in existence, and the powers that are conferred on the Commissioner of Labor relative to the Erdman Act are still retained by the Commissioner of Labor. All of the powers and duties that are now held by the Commissioner of Labor are transferred to the commissioner of labor statistics, which is made a part of the department of labor.

Mr. ESCH. But the Commissioner of Labor under the Erdman Act is only one of the conciliators, the other being the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes; and this bill does not affect that part of it whatever. This bill does not change the Erdman Act. It does not remove any of the powers that are conferred by the Erdman Act. On the contrary, it still retains in the hands of the commissioner of labor statistics the power now held by the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. ESCH. And would it be possible under this act to have a proceeding under the secretary of labor in a labor dispute occurring on interstate carriers that would be outside of the Erdman Act?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That would be possible.

Mr. ESCH. Might not that lead to some conflict?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think not.

Mr. ESCH. The Erdman Act, as the gentleman well knows, worked very successfully.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is true. It has worked very satisfactorily so far, and undoubtedly will continue to work satisfactorily as long as it is in the hands of men who understand how to administer it. It is a great deal a matter of administration, and the success of the provisions of this bill will in a great measure depend upon the administration. There is no question of that in my mind, but it does not seem to me that there is any conflict whatsoever between the provisions of this act and the provisions of the Erdman Act, and the committee, for the purpose of preserving the Erdman Act intact, so that there will be no interference with it whatever, was careful to retain in the hands of the commissioner of labor statistics the power that now rests in the hands of the Commissioner of Labor.

Mr. ESCH. That would be true if the Commissioner of Labor was the sole conciliator under the Erdman Act, but he is not. He is only one of two. Does the bill preserve the power given, for instance, to the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission, admitting that the same power is reserved to the Commissioner of Labor?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. We do not disturb the power in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We do not disturb that power in any shape or form; but what we do is to transfer that part of the power which rests in the hands of the Commissioner of Labor to the hands of the commissioner of labor statistics. We change the name of the Bureau of Labor to the bureau of labor statistics and change the title of the chief of that bureau to the commissioner of labor statistics. We transfer the powers now held by the Commissioner of Labor to the commissioner of labor statistics, and do not in any manner change the powers conferred by the Erdman Act.

Mr. ESCH. Will it not be necessary to amend the Erdman Act by changing the title of the Commissioner of Labor?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No; this does that.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I am in complete accord with the gentleman's ideas and give my hearty support to this measure, but I am anxious to find out just how far this authority extends in connection with conciliation, whether there is the essence of compulsory arbitration. To make a concrete case, suppose that neither the employer nor the employee requested mediation on behalf of the proposed secretary of labor? Would there be any authority under this act for him to intervene in the interest of the public?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There would be authority for him just the same as if either one or both had asked for his interference. The power, however, itself is limited. Even though neither party may ask for his interference, it is his duty and right under this bill to act as a mediator, or, in other words, to go to the contending parties and endeavor to bring them together. Having used all his influence and powers in that direction then his power ends. He has no power to compel either side to accept any decision arrived at by him or to compel them to enter into arbitration to settle these disputes.

I may say to the gentleman that if this bill contained any element of compulsory arbitration or anything which, in my judgment, led to compulsory arbitration I would be opposed to it myself. I am opposed to compulsory arbitration.

Mr. COOPER. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER. Have not we had in actual practice an illustration of what would be the course of procedure if this bill be enacted into law? I refer to what took place during the great anthracite coal strike and the ensuing trouble when delegations from various parts of the country came to this city and insisted that there was not coal enough in many parts of the Nation to supply the people's needs, and that the Government must take action or the people would resort to force. Thereupon President Roosevelt intervened and appointed a board without any power whatever to render a judgment, but simply authorized by him to hear both sides and make what the board might think would be equitable suggestions, and to do what it could to bring about an amicable adjustment of the difficulty.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That was an instance in which the influence of the President of the United States was used for the purpose of getting both parties to the controversy to agree to submit their contentions to a commission, and they further agreed to abide by the decisions of that commission.

Mr. COOPER. It was voluntary on their part, not compulsory at all.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It was voluntary on their part. There are from time to time examples in the work under the Erdman Act that practically operates in the same way. It is the means by which the influence of public sentiment may be centered through the secretary of labor for the purpose of bringing the contending parties together.

Mr. TRIBBLE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TRIBBLE. The Department of Commerce and Labor has such authority and power. What is the reason you can not enlarge upon the power of the department of labor and avoid the establishment of another department and save the expense of the department which you propose?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The principal reason is this: That the Department of Commerce and Labor as constituted at the present time would undoubtedly attract the attention of the head of that department to the subject of commerce to the exclusion of the question of labor, and that the head of the department, having his attention focused upon commerce, when he comes to the counsels of the President there is where his sympathies would be and there is where his information would lie, whereas if you have a department of labor, the head of which has his attention centered exclusively upon great labor problems, then when he goes into the President's Cabinet he goes in with the influences surrounding him, with the information in his possession relative to that, and it makes a great difference in his counsels with the President.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Well, if you provide by law what the department should do and hold it down to the rules that should govern that department, I do not see why that would not be sufficient.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no way in which you can enact by law any method that will guide a man's sentiments except to surround him with a work that will guide his sentiments.

Mr. TRIBBLE. You can put that work on the Commerce and Labor Department.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman familiar with the so-called Lee bill?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have read the bill, but I have not given it close study.

Mr. MANN. The Lee bill is reported and is on the Calendar of the House. It proposes to revise the Erdman law and proposes to authorize the appointment of a commissioner of mediation and conciliation and a board of mediation and conciliation. If this bill is passed, would there be any necessity to pass that bill, or if that bill should pass would there be any necessity to pass this bill?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In my judgment, if this bill is passed, the scope of conciliation and mediation would be as wide as the country itself, and consequently any other measure dealing solely with conciliation and mediation would not be necessary.

Mr. MANN. Now, may I ask the gentleman further? The Erdman Act refers to labor disputes upon railroads—transportation companies—and authorizes the Commissioner of Labor, members of the Interstate Commerce Commission or Commerce Court to be authorized to act as mediators. That applies only to railroad labor, to railroad disputes.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The Lee bill proposes to revise that and proposes to make it applicable to railroad labor and labor engaged in coal mining, where the coal enters into interstate commerce.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, this bill, as I understand it, proposes to make no limitation of labor disputes in which interstate commerce is not involved——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no dividing line in this bill.

Mr. MANN. In other words, under this bill if there is a strike or a threatened strike between the owners of a local street car company and street car employees wholly within the limits not only of the State, but municipality, the Secretary of Labor is authorized to interfere.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. He is authorized to act as mediator or appoint commissioners of conciliation if, in his judgment, it is wise or necessary.

Mr. MANN. I know the gentleman has not a very high opinion of those gentlemen in the House who ask what constitutional authority there is for these things.

A MEMBER. Yes; he has.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman said yesterday he did not have, and said it very plainly. I would be glad to ask the gentleman's opinion how far the General Government should go in connection with the manufacturing industries into those industries which are purely local and which involve in no way whatever interstate and foreign commerce?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If this bill gave to the Secretary of Labor the power to interfere in any manner so as to compel the acceptance of his opinions or his views by any employer or employee engaged purely in local work, I would not be in favor of it, because of the fact that under those circumstances the power would belong purely to the States. But this does not give to the Secretary any power to say to any man engaged in any kind of work, either interstate or otherwise, that "you must accept these things; you must accept this condition; you must arbitrate; you must settle your dispute." In fact, it only gives him the power to act in a friendly way to bring the parties together. And I know nothing in the Constitution that would prevent any officer of the Government using his friendly offices toward bringing contending parties together in that manner.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I think he and I will agree that the subject of compulsory arbitration is impracticable. Does the gentleman remember the Townsend bill——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. MANN (continuing). Which I think the gentleman was not in favor of?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I opposed the attempt to bring it up for consideration.

Mr. MANN. It did not go as far as this case.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It went a little further in some respects.

Mr. MANN. No. The Townsend bill attempted to confine itself to disputes which might involve interstate commerce and only authorized the collection of information in making recommendations.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. This would authorize the Secretary to appoint a board of conciliation in a labor dispute of any kind anywhere. Of course, neither one can put their recommendation——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. This does not provide for making any recommendations of any kind whatever.

Mr. MANN. It does not provide you shall make a recommendation, but, of course, it contemplates making recommendations and permits making recommendations. What else is it for unless it is to make recommendations? How can you get men together unless you recommend something to them? Now, does not the gentleman believe——

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is a great deal of difference, if the gentleman will permit, in making recommendations to the parties to the dispute and making recommendations to the public at large relative to how the dispute should be settled. They are entirely different propositions.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman believe it is inevitable that if this provision goes into the law authorizing the Secretary to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes, that he must then enlarge or extend the law so that those commissioners shall have authority to take evidence?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what they will do. If they have not any authority to take evidence, swear witnesses, and take testimony, what else can they do?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is an immense field for them to work in, the one I mentioned when I began my remarks on this subject, and that is the field of getting the two parties to a dispute together before they have reached that point where they are at each other's throat; before they have reached the point, as I said before, where the employer looks upon the employee as an anarchist and a lawbreaker, and the employee looks upon the employer as a bloodthirsty tyrant and oppressor of labor.

If you can get them together before they reach that point, then you can accomplish some good. If you can not get them together before they reach that point, the contention will go on until one or the other of the parties will be exhausted.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption? It is right at that point, it seems to me, that the wisdom of the provision preventing a strike or a lockout for a reasonable time and until after this effort to get together had failed might well be worthy of consideration.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I may say to the gentleman I am unalterably opposed to any act of that kind that will restrain workingmen from ceasing their employment whenever in their judgment it is advisable to do so.

Mr. HARDY. Just one moment. It was to that part of the gentleman's former remarks that I wished to make one suggestion. I do not believe we ought to undertake by law to interfere and force the individual to remain at work.

But let us suppose there is an organization that proposes to call a strike and force the individuals to quit work, or, on the other hand, an employers' organization that would want to make a lockout, to close everything; not that the individual laborer should be compelled to work for 1 day, 2 days, or 10 days, but the Canadian system provides that, as an organization, there should be no strike called until after the effort at mediation has been made, not interfering with the individual liberty of the single citizen; but something should be done that would be an effective effort to compose differences, and the question with me is whether your bill will have the effect you intend—that is, to conciliate—if the parties begin by ordering a lockout or a strike and get into the very condition of irritation that you speak of before the effort at conciliation is made.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Whether it is right to call a strike, for the rank and file to order a strike, or not is a matter for the workingmen themselves to determine. As to their right to do so I would be opposed to the passage of any measure that would interfere with their rights.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has about six minutes remaining.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this bill introduced by me provides for the creation of a department of labor, with a secretary of labor, who shall be a member of the President's Cabinet; three assistant secretaries; a solicitor of the Department of Justice for the department of labor; a chief clerk; a disbursing clerk; and such other clerks, inspectors, and special agents as may be provided for by Congress. It transfers the Commissioner General of Immigration, the commissioners of immigration, the Bureau of Immigration, the Immigration Service at large, the Bureau of Labor, and the Commissioner of Labor from the Department of Commerce to the new department of labor. It changes the title of the Bureau of Labor to the bureau of labor statistics and the Commissioner of Labor to the commissioner of labor statistics, and transfers the duties of the Commissioner of Labor to the commissioner of labor statistics, including those imposed by the Erdman Act.

It further authorizes the collection and publication of statistics relative to the condition of labor and the products and distribution of the products of the same, and directs the secretary of labor to call upon other departments of the Government for such statistical data as they may have which would be valuable for that purpose. It authorizes the secretary of labor to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes, thereby lending the influence of the Government toward commercial concord and industrial peace. It directs the secretary of labor to investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities of his office with the activities of the present bureaus, commissioners, and departments in order to harmonize and unify such activities, with a view to additional legislation to further define the duties and powers of the department of labor.

It is a matter of much congratulation to all concerned that this bill is now before the House of Representatives for its consideration. For a long time I have been advocating this measure. It has been pending in Congress for the past 10 years, but never before were the advocates of the bill able to get a favorable report from the committee.

However, the Democrats in this Congress have done their duty to the people, and this bill now comes before the House with a favorable report from the Committee on Labor.

The measure, in my opinion, rises above party lines and superior to partisan considerations to the high plane of pure patriotism. This bill is constructive legislation essentially demanded by the country. Labor is entitled to justice, to consideration, and to recognition. It has recognition in the legislative and the judicial branches of the Government, and it is entitled, in my opinion, to recognition in the executive branch of the Government. I know of no measure before Congress to-day that will be more beneficial to the people and more far-reaching in its practical results, as the years come and go, than this bill of mine to create a department of labor.

This bill to create a department of labor is a meritorious measure, and it should meet with the favorable consideration of the membership of this House regardless of party affiliations or partisan considerations. It is the first attempt ever made to systematically classify labor in an intelligent way, and its enactment into law will evidence a disposition on the part of the Government to see to it that labor gets full recognition, the dignity of having a voice in the councils of state, and the opportunity to have its claims dispassionately discussed. Give labor this boon and the labor question will be reduced to the minimum.

The expense of the maintenance of the department of labor will be practically but little more than that of the maintenance of the various bureaus at the present time. These bureaus will all be in the department of labor. I do not think anyone will take exception to the bill on the ground that it is going to increase the expenses of the Government. A little additional expense in a matter of so much public moment as this will be of small consequence to the taxpayers of this country.

I believe that if this bill were on the statute books to-day it would be a long step toward better social, economic, and commercial conditions; a progressive advance along the avenues of industrial peace; that it will go far to allay jealousy, establish harmony, promote the general welfare, make the employer and the employee better friends; prevent strikes, lockouts, blacklists, boycotts, and business paralysis; and every year save millions and millions of dollars of losses which necessarily result therefrom.

If you will look at the statistics you will be startled to realize the tremendous loss to the people of the country entailed by every strike, be the same big or little. Capital as well as labor favors this new department. During the entire time that the bill has been pending before Congress, a period of 10 years, I have never known of a single agency that opposed this bill or sent an objection to Congress against its enactment.

I speak advisedly when I say that capital as well as labor favors this bill, because they both realize that it will go far to solve what is called "the labor problem" and bring about industrial peace; and any agency that will do that is a boon that should be welcomed by every intelligent citizen and every patriotic legislator.

For years this legislation has been advocated by the wage earners of the country. The bill meets with their approbation, and has the approval of the best thought in the land. It has been indorsed by the ablest thinkers in America; by some of the wisest political economists; by professors in our universities; and by the leading newspapers of the country. The time is therefore ripe, it seems to me, for the creation of this department of labor, with a secretary having a seat in the Cabinet, with all the rights and all the powers conferred by this bill.

Many of you remember that when the measure was before Congress to create the Department of Commerce, this bill, substantially as it is before the House now, was offered as a substitute, and was only lost by a very few votes, as the records of that day will show. There was a demand at that time for the creation of a department of labor in preference to the creation of a department of commerce. That demand has grown more insistent every year since. Looking back over the intervening time, I stand here and say that, in my judgment, the creation of the Department of Commerce was wise legislation, but we would have been wiser in that day if we had also created, as a companion department to the Department of Commerce, this department of labor.

The department of labor was not then created. I am not here to find fault with what was then done, but from that day to this I have been voicing through this bill the demand of the industrial workers of America to give them the same recognition in the executive branch of the Government that we then gave to commerce. They are entitled to it, they ought to have it, and no man who realizes that all that we are, and all that we hope to be, is the result of the creative force of labor, in my judgment will object to the enactment of this bill now; and I indulge the hope, and I speak for 20,000,000 honest toilers in America, when I say that this bill will be a law before this session of Congress adjourns.

I am not in sympathy with those who say it may put a little patronage in the hands of the President. I care nothing about that now, nor have I for the past 10 years. That phase of the question dwindles into insignificance when we consider the beneficent results of putting upon the statute books of our country a great constructive act which will do substantial justice to the people who create all the wealth and go far to inaugurate a long reign of industrial peace.

It seems to me the time is now propitious for the creation of this department of labor. It will bring labor and capital closer together, and one is dependent on the other. They should be friends, not enemies, and walk hand in hand along the paths of mutual prosperity.

If this bill becomes a law, it will go far to prevent serious labor troubles in the future. It will do much to solve existing labor problems, and every friend of industrial peace should aid in its enactment. The employers of labor, as well as the employees themselves, whether they belong to trade-unions or not, are all, so far as I have been able to ascertain—and I am well advised—in accord with the principles of this progressive legislation and heartily approve of this constructive bill.

I am a friend of the toilers, and I shall continue to fight for their just rights and for the enactment of this bill until it becomes a law. It is just and right, and sooner or later it must be the law of this country.

I am not provincial. I stand for the rights of man. I believe in justice to all. I am opposed to special privilege. If I am anything, I am an individualist, and I believe in keeping open the door of opportunity for every individual in all this broad land. That is my democracy, and it is true democracy; and I use the word "democracy" not in its political but in its generic sense. Let us be just to all is a fundamental principle of genuine democracy.

There is nothing narrow minded about me. I am no demagogue. I believe in fair play to all. I am opposed to anything that will estrange employer and employee, or cause a breach between capital and labor, and I am a friend of both. I want to give all an equal chance. I want to do all I can while I live to make the world better and happier and more prosperous.

I believe in the dignity of the toiler, the greatness of labor, and I want to do everything I can in Congress and out of Congress to protect its inherent rights and promote its general welfare for the lasting benefit of all the people. I want labor to have as much standing as capital in the Halls of Congress and at the seat of government. We have a department to represent finance; we have a department to represent war; we have a department to represent diplomacy; we have a department to represent our internal affairs; we have a department to represent commerce; we have a department to represent justice—all supported by the wage earners—and in the name of common sense why should we not have a department to represent industrial peace as exemplified by labor, the most important in its last analysis of them all?

The creation of this department of labor will be a long step in the right direction in the commendable movement for industrial peace; and through its agency, in my judgment, the perplexing problems of labor and capital can be quickly solved in a way that will do substantial justice to all concerned.

In my opinion, all labor wants is a fair show, an equal chance, and a square deal—in Congress and out of Congress. Labor is indefatigable and unselfish, sympathetic and consistent. It does not ask for more than its just rights. We hear much about equality before the law. That is all labor wants. It seeks no special privileges and wants none.

Labor makes no war on vested rights. It does not rail at honestly acquired wealth. It is not antagonistic to legitimate capital. It would close no door to opportunity. It would darken no star of hope. It would not palsy initiation. It would strike no blow to paralyze ambition. Its motto is onward with hope; forward without fear. It stands for the rights of man; for the greatness of the individual; for equality before the law; for concord and peace; for equal rights to all and special privileges to none. Capital and labor must be friends, not enemies. They should act in harmony, not antipathy. Their interests should be mutual, not antagonistic. In our complex civilization each is essential to the other, and they should walk hand in hand. To prosper they must be at peace, not at war. Each is necessary to the other. Both have their rights and both have their limitations. The inherent rights of labor, to say the least, are as sacred as the vested rights of capital.

Labor makes capital, creates all wealth, and should have equal opportunities and as much consideration, but the trouble seems to be that labor does not receive a fair share of what it produces. It is the duty of the just and sagacious legislator, in the interest of our civilization, to see to it that there is less centralization of wealth and a more equitable distribution of the fruits of toil.

Labor should be represented in every branch of the Government. Labor is not of to-day, or of yesterday, or of to-morrow. It is eternal. Dynasties come and go, governments rise and fall, centuries succeed centuries, but labor creates and goes on forever. Labor is the law of life.

No man, in my opinion, can pay too high a tribute to "labor." It is the creative force of the world, the genius of the brawn of man; the spirit of all progress, and the milestones marking the forward movement of every age. Civilization owes everything to labor—to the constructive toiler of the world. Labor owes very little to civilization. Mother Earth is labor's best friend. From her forests and her fields, from her rocks and her rivers, the toiler has wrought all and brought forth the wonders of mankind.

Tear down your temples and labor will rebuild them; close every avenue of trade and labor will reopen them; destroy your towns and labor will replace them greater and grander than they were; but destroy labor, and famine will stalk the land, and pestilence will decimate the human race. If every laborer in the world should cease work for six months, it would cause the greatest catastrophe that ever befell humanity—a tragedy to the human race impossible to depict and too frightful to contemplate.

I stand now where I always have stood, and where I always will stand—for the rights of the toilers, for justice to the workingmen of our country, whose labor creates all wealth—and I will continue in the future, as I have in the past, to do all in my power to advance their prosperity and to promote their material welfare.

Capital must recognize the rights of labor. Capital should be just. Labor has as much right to organize as capital. The right of a man to labor is inalienable, and the right of a man to quit work is just as undeniable. Neither capital nor labor has the right to take the law in its own hands. If capital does wrong that is no reason why labor should do wrong. Two wrongs never did and never will make a right. In a government such as ours, the reign of law will not give way to the reign of force.

The best advice that the most ardent sympathizer can give labor, organized or otherwise, in its struggle for its just rights, for better conditions, for greater progress, and for a more equitable distibution of its fruits, is obey the law. Labor's only hope is here. The law is the shield of the toiler—the sheet anchor of the wage earner. This is a land of liberty, but it is now, ever was, and always will be, liberty under law.

My friends, that is substantially all now that I want to say. I am familiar with the provisions of this bill. There is nothing in this bill to which legitimate exception can be taken. This bill has been carefuly considered by those who are in charge of the legislation. It has been carefully considered by officials of the Government. It is unanimously reported, and, so far as I know, there is not a single objection to it. I hope it will pass the House as unanimously as it comes to the House from the committee, and in order that this bill may pass the House to-day before we adjourn I now ask unanimous consent that all debate on this bill close at 3 o'clock p. m.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. MANN. Notwithstanding the generosity of the gentleman from New York, who has just finished a long speech, I think I shall have to object.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman from Illinois now agree to fix a time to take a vote?

Mr. MANN. Debate may not run as long as 3 o'clock.

Mr. SULZER. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I will take the matter up later with the gentleman from Illinois. I will now be glad to answer the questions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman withdrawn his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman from Illinois objected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] has paid an eloquent tribute to labor. I think that will be admitted on both sides of the House, but the gentleman has not addressed himself very carefully to the details of the bill. That is what I want to ask him about. Some of us had not seen the bill before to-day, and it is only fair that we should have a better understanding with regard to it before we come to a vote. Labor, as the gentleman said, is the creator of all wealth. There can be no dispute about that. Labor has been knocking at the door of Congress for more than a hundred years for recognition at the Cabinet table. There is no dispute about that. Labor did not get that full recognition which it asked for when the Department of Commerce and Labor was created. There can be no dispute about that. But I think the gentleman will agree with me that if the time has come, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] indicates in his speech it has, when we should separate commerce from labor and create a separate department of labor, we should do it right. I think the gentleman from New York will agree to that.

Mr. SULZER. This bill does that, I will say to my friend.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I want to ask the gentleman about the bill. Assuming that we want to do what is right in creating this department of labor, let me ask the gentleman if the purpose of the act is anywhere stated in the bill?

Mr. SULZER. It is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Where?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will read the bill, he will find its purposes stated in every section of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman will find that in the bill creating the Department of Agriculture it is provided that the purpose of the department is to promote agriculture. I think in the bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor the gentleman will find that the purpose of the act is set out to be to foster, promote, and develop commerce and industry.

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman will read this bill, he will find that it substantially follows all other acts for the creation of departments, and its purpose, as set forth in almost every provision of the bill, is to recognize the rights of labor and promote industrial peace.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; the bill differs essentially from all other bills creating departments in this: One of the first paragraphs provides not only for the creation of a secretary at $12,000 per annum, but for the creation of three assistant secretaries at $5,000 each per annum, whose duties are not defined, except to "supervise" certain information. That is an unusual condition that does not prevail in any other organic law creating a department of which I have knowledge.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman, I think, is in error about that. At all events, he is too technical. If he will compare this bill with the other acts, he will find that this bill substantially follows the other acts creating the departments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Section 1 of this act simply provides for the creation of an executive department, which shall have a secretary at $12,000 a year. The duties of that secretary are not set forth. Is he to sit there merely as an ornament, as a compliment to labor?

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is inclined to be supercritical.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all.

Mr. SULZER. And his reasoning is very far-fetched. He could say the same about the acts now upon the statute books creating every other department of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; the duties of those secretaries are defined.

Mr. SULZER. And so they are, as well as they can be, in this bill. Let us not split hairs.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know of any organic act which provides, as section 2 of this act does, for the creation of a first assistant secretary and a second assistant and a third assistant secretary?

Mr. SULZER. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What act?

Mr. SULZER. I think you will find that in the acts creating several departments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, I think there is no provision for the creation of three assistant secretaries. My point is this: If we are to do this thing right in the interest of the common laborer of the land, the man for whom we ought to legislate, the real creator of the wealth of the country, would it not be better to show good faith in this bill, and rather than create expensive offices for those who may be leaders of thought rather than leaders of action, had we not better tell the workingman himself that we are creating this department for his advantage and benefit and that the purpose of it is to foster, promote, and develop and encourage the interests of labor? Do we say that?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, in reply let me say to the gentleman that if he is sincere, and I doubt not that he is——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am absolutely sincere in my desire to promote the interests of labor.

Mr. SULZER. Very well. Then he should be willing to take the judgment, so far as this measure is concerned, of the labor leaders of America; and every one of them is in favor of this bill just as it comes from the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not true that there is no directive labor clause in this bill, save one which is in section 9, providing for conciliation and mediation, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] has explained goes no further than to tell this gentleman who sits as secretary over this department that he may bring people together in a friendly way and leave it there, no power, no authority, just to sit there and tell them to get together and do the best they can and leave them to themselves.

Mr. SULZER. My friend, it seems to me, fails to realize that the powers of these various bureaus which will go into this department of labor are all set forth in the various laws creating them. It is not necessary to restate them in this bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call to the attention of the gentleman the fact that the purpose is not defined in this bill, and as one who desires to see something substantial accomplished I think it should be set forth, and in good faith.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, the bill is not subject to that criticism. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district with many labor-union organizations in it. I am for this legislation. I am for it emphatically, and I am for it because I believe it is essential to the welfare of all the working people in Connecticut. I presume this legislation comes under the range of legislation referred to in the letter written by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the new Democratic candidate for the Presidency, in which he states as follows:

As floor leader of the party in the House of Representatives, I wish to say to you that our action between now and the time of adjournment may affect the campaign, and I hope you will not hesitate to advise me freely as to any matters transpiring in Washington which you may consider essential for the good of the cause. With kindest regards,

I am, very truly, yours,

OSCAR UNDERWOOD.

Mr. Chairman, I had supposed that the Senate and House of Representatives were legislating for the people of the United States and not in the interest of any political campaign. I am for this bill for the general good of the United States, and I was exceedingly glad this morning to read in the paper where I saw Mr. Gompers and Mr. Morrison and a number of other gentlemen were at Seagirt consulting with the candidate for the Presidency on the Democratic ticket, and I sincerely hope that they asked him to explain some remarks made by him on this great subject in 1909 in a baccalaureate sermon delivered at Princeton University, contained in the Trenton True American, June 14, 1909. It was delivered on Sunday, the day preceding. The text was from the seventeenth chapter of Luke, tenth verse, which, he says, reads as follows:

We are unprofitable servants. We have not done that which was our duty to do.

Dr. Wilson treated that subject in this way:

You know what the usual standard of the employee is in our day. It is to give as little as he may for his wages. Labor is standardized by the trades-union, and this is the standard to which it is made to conform. No one is suffered to do more than the average workman can do. In some trades and handicrafts no one is suffered to do more than the least skillful of his fellows can do within the hours allotted to a day's labor, and no one may work out of hours at all or volunteer anything beyond the minimum.

And, gentlemen on the other side, this is your candidate for the Presidency.

I need not point out how economically disastrous such a regulation of labor is—

Let me inject: Last night I rose in my place and asked unanimous consent to publish a tariff address of Dr. Wilson, delivered before a tariff commission holding a public hearing for that purpose, held in Atlanta, Ga., in which he aimed to give the official authorities of the United States his views on the tariff. To be sure, that was 30 years old; but he has not changed them since, for he said only a few days ago, or a few weeks ago, in New York that the whole Republican position and platform was "ignorant and preposterous." He appeared in Atlanta as a free trader, and, in my judgment, he is a free trader to-day, and yet a Democrat refused to allow me to publish the remarks of his own candidate for the Presidency on the tariff question. I am giving you now not an opinion 30 years old, but I am giving you a baccalaureate sermon delivered in Princeton three years ago, and it is directly pertinent to this bill.

I need not point out how economically disastrous such a regulation of labor is.

I commend that to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] and to my friend from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN].

It is so unprofitable to the employer that in some trades it will presently not be worth his while to attempt anything at all. He had better stop altogether than operate at an inevitable and invariable loss. The labor of America is rapidly becoming unprofitable under its present regulation by those who have determined to reduce it to a minimum.

Now, I do not believe that, gentlemen. I do not believe my friend from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] or my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] are "unprofitable servants" in this country. I know that the men who live in my district, and who are honest, straightforward workingmen, members of labor unions, are as reputable, as high-toned, as responsible, as industrious, and as faithful as any citizen [applause on the Republican side] in it, whether they be lawyers, doctors, presidents of universities, or men working as "unprofitable servants," as he designates, simply because they belong to a trade-union.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do you believe that Mr. Gompers believes that?

Mr. HILL. No; I do not. And I think it was high time for him as a Democrat to go to Seagirt yesterday and try to reach a working compromise with the candidate of his party.

Let me close this up.

Our economic supremacy may be lost because the country grows more and more full of unprofitable servants.

I am for this bill. I am for doing everything and anything in the way of lifting up, if it needs it, and ennobling labor.

Why, gentlemen, you men from the South do not understand the situation of labor. You are living in the traditions of slavery. Go into the town in which I live, and you will find a working town of working people. We all work. Go to the church which I attend. But for the working people there would be no church there. It is they who contribute, it is they who pay the bills. They are the people that we associate with, one with another, never raising the distinction as to whether a man works or not. You do not live in that kind of a society. But you start your platform with the fundamental doctrine that it is wrong to do anything to encourage such conditions. Let me give it to you. I want you to understand the first plank of your platform in this campaign. It reads as follows:

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff taxes except for the purposes of revenue.

Where did you get it from? I hold in my hand a little campaign textbook that I prepared for last year. I will tell you where you got it from—that is, where you got it from the last time.

Mr. FOCHT. That was originally in the Confederate Constitution, was it not?

Mr. HILL. That was the last time. The Constitution of the Confederate States of America, 1861, Article I, just as it is Article I of your platform, section 6, says:

The Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises for revenues necessary to pay the debts, provide for the common defense, and carry on the government of the Confederate States, but no bounties shall be granted from the Treasury nor shall any duties or taxes on importations from foreign nations be laid to promote or foster any branch of industry, and all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the Confederate States.

Now, does your candidate agree to that? No. You have got it in your platform. He did years and years ago, but in reading one of his books this morning I found another expression of opinion, and it is not 30 years old either. It is a new book, splendidly written, as all his works are. Here is what he says about the fundamental theory of the tariff, on page 175 of Woodrow Wilson's "Constitutional Government in the United States: A series of lectures delivered to the students of Columbia University in 1908." He will have to compromise his views. He has intellectual versatility unequaled by any man of whom I know. I should perhaps call it intellectual elasticity. I like to see a man with mental elasticity that will enable him to change his views within two or three years two or three times.

But here is what he says about this first plank of the Democratic platform, on page 175:

The opponents of the tariff of 1824 objected to the tariff system which Congress was so rapidly building up that it went much beyond the simple and quite legitimate object of providing the Federal Government with revenue.

So that if you gentlemen on the other side want to find arguments in behalf of the first plank of your platform go back to John C. Calhoun. If you want to find arguments in opposition to them, go back to Andrew Jackson, because he refused to allow his legislation and his taxation system to be nullified. You have got this whole thing in extenso away back from the beginning of the Government. This first plank lies at the very fundamentals of State rights—that the Government has no right to lay a tax for the encouragement of industry. It can only lay it for the purpose of raising revenue.

Now, here is what Mr. Wilson says——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. When?

Mr. HILL. Four years ago. He says:

The opponents of the tariff of 1824 objected to the tariff system which Congress was rapidly building up—that it went much beyond the legitimate and constitutional object of providing the Federal Government with revenue in such a way as to stimulate without too much disturbing the natural development of the industries of the country and was unmistakably intended—

Of course it was—to guide and determine the whole trend of the Nation's economic evolution—

That is what your platform says we have no right to do in this country—preferring the industries of one section of the country to those of another in its bestowal of protection and encouragement, and so depriving the States as self-governing communities of all free economic choice in the development of their resources.

In other words, the South said then, "We raise cotton. Because we raise cotton, you in Pennsylvania shall not be protected in your industries. Each State must settle that question for itself and the Government has no right to encourage any industry." And the Democratic Party to-day has harked back a hundred and twenty-five years in the first plank of its platform to the doctrine of John C. Calhoun and his predecessors. I read further:

Congress persisted—

Says Mr. Wilson—

in its course. Nullification failed, as even so much as an effectual protest against the power of a Government of which Gen. Jackson was at the head, never so sure he was right as when he was opposed, and a critical matter of lasting importance was decided—was decided.

Let me read you the platform again. I will read some more of Dr. Wilson in a minute. I just want to read that platform so that you can see the pertinence of the doctor's suggestion.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Not now. Pretty soon I will. I know that these are not the sentiments of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER]. I know these are not the sentiments of a large portion of the Democratic Party. But you will find also in Mr. Wilson's writings a statement to this effect, that "It is not possible to compound a successful constitutional government out of antagonisms." Now, I know you do not agree. I know that there were 47 of you that stood for a duty on wool, and that a majority of you stood against it, and that you did back down, and that you did compound legislation at least on antagonisms. You can not do it successfully. You have got to stand out for principle and not for compromise in fundamental governmental action. Let me read you from your own platform again. Mr. Wilson says it was decided—"a matter of lasting importance was decided"—and you have harked back to the old doctrine:

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power to impose or collect tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue.

Andrew Jackson discarded the question of right, as he thought, and exercised the power, and "it was decided," as Gov. Wilson said, at this critical time. The Federal Government was conceded the power. You say that it has no power. He says:

The Federal Government was conceded the power to determine the economic opportunities of the States. It was suffered to become a general providence, to which each part of the country must look for its chance to make lucrative use of its material resources.

Mr. Chairman, I will go into that matter more fully at some other time. I will now make a part of my remarks the short address delivered by Prof. Woodrow Wilson before the Tariff Board in 1882, showing his views then on the question of the tariff and the distinct announcement of his position as a free trader, opposed to all tariffs except merely for the purpose of raising revenue.

I take it there will be no objection, Mr. Chairman, to my printing as a part of my remarks the short address of Prof. Woodrow Wilson, which I will not trouble the House to read now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. HILL. I will do it now. It is very short, only three pages long.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by incorporating the address to which he refers. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. Woodrow Wilson, of Atlanta, said:

"It is not my purpose to represent or advocate any particular interest, but only to say a few words upon the general issues before you on the subject of protection or free trade. This question of the tariff is one which has been under consideration in Congress for ninety-odd years. Early in the century protection was introduced for the purpose of fostering new manufacture in this country. That system was continued down to the time of the war; but since the war it has been upheld professedly for the purpose of raising revenue, and to enable the Government to recover from the indebtedness caused by the war. Free trade, therefore, has been a slumbering question, but it will soon become one of the leading questions in all political discussions, because, now that peace has come, the people of the South will insist upon having the fruits of peace, and not being kept down under the burdens of war.

"As you have already been told, there is a great deal of ignorance and indifference in regard to these questions in the South. The people here have been content to let things remain as they were. Probably this has resulted from the fact that the tariff is an indirect way of placing taxes upon the people, and they do not feel the immediate effects of it. But when the farmers and others begin to investigate these matters, they soon discover that they are, after all, paying these duties for the benefit of a few manufacturing classes. When a farmer discovers that he can buy a jackknife of English manufacture for $1.30, while he has to pay $2 for a knife of American manufacture of the same quality, in order that the American manufacturer of cutlery may compete on equal terms with the British, then he feels that he has a personal interest in these subjects.

"In thinking of this matter of indirect taxation, I am reminded of one of the few playful passages which illumine the utterances of Mr. Gladstone. In introducing his 'budget' in 1861, he referred to direct and indirect taxation, and called them two sisters, the daughters of necessity and invention, one indeed more open and direct than the other, her sister more shy and insinuating; but he said that, as chancellor of the exchequer, he felt bound to pay his addresses to both. We have these two charming sisters in America, but they can not be said to be the daughters of necessity and invention; they are rather the daughters of invention and monopoly. The necessities of our Government are the necessities of the revenue; and it is well known that our Government is not embarrassed from any necessities of revenue; on the contrary, it has an immense surplus. It is undoubtedly a part of true wisdom that the taxes laid by the General Government should be indirect taxes. The province of direct taxation should be left to the States, and in order that the two systems may not clash and overburden the people, it is a part of wise policy that the National Government shall make the most of its taxation indirect.

"No man with his senses about him would recommend perfect freedom of trade in the sense that there should be no duties whatever laid on imports. The only thing that free traders contend for is, that there shall be only so much duty laid as will be necessary to defray the expenses of the Government, reduce the public debt, and leave a small surplus for accumulation. But that surplus should be so small that it will not lead to jobbery and corruption of the worst sort.

"We often hear the question asked by the advocates of protection whether it is a wise and consistent public policy for us to be dependent for supplies upon foreign governments. That was asked in reference to cotton ties. It was said that the cotton tie was manufactured almost wholly in England, and the question was put to the witness, 'Is it a part of wise policy that we should be dependent on England for our cotton ties?' In other words, we fear dependence on foreign manufacturers. Now, gentlemen, what does that mean? There is no danger in time of peace in being dependent on foreign manufacturers, because, if they raise their prices, the inevitable result will be that Americans will go into the manufacture and undersell them, and their prices must come down again. Therefore we are in no danger in time of peace. So that the argument of the protectionist must be a war argument. Of course, if a war should occur between this country and Great Britain, it would be greatly to the disadvantage of our southern cotton balers to be dependent entirely on the English manufacturer for their cotton ties. So that the protectionist advocates a system which prepares for war, while it has not any consideration for the requirements of the country in time of peace. I ask, is it worth while during 50 years of peace to provide by taxation for one year of war? Is it wise and just to tax the people for a contingency so that millions may be accumulated in the Treasury from the tax on these cotton ties in order that war at some distant period, which no man sees, may be provided for? War will cost a great deal when it comes; let it not be costing us in the meantime.

"Another stronghold of the protectionists is the question of wages. They say, 'How can we compete with the foreigners when the remuneration of labor is so much lower in foreign countries than in our own country?' Well, we can compete with them just as we do in regard to agricultural products. Of course every gentleman knows that our principal agricultural products have no duty imposed upon them. English wheat and other produce may come into our markets free of duty, and there is a freedom of trade in that regard, so far as the farmer is concerned.

"By Commissioner GARLAND:

"Q. Do I understand you to say that there is no duty on wheat?—A. So I understand by looking at the last returns.

"Commissioner GARLAND. Such is not my understanding.

"Commissioner OLIVER. Wheat pays 20 cents a bushel, and the farmers have been asking us to keep that duty on, because they say otherwise it would be imported from Manitoba.

"The WITNESS. Then I was misinformed. But it is a well-known fact that there is a greater disparity in the wages paid for agricultural labor in this country and in England than there is between wages paid in other industries, and although the duties on these agricultural products are lower, our competition with foreigners in this regard is more successful. In other words, we make up for the high price of our wages by the fertility of our land. There is no land in the world that can compare in fertility with the land of the West, and the consequence is, we have an immense advantage in that regard. We have advantages also in other industries, such as in mining and in cotton productions. These are compensations which are provided, and which no human laws can take away.

"There are positive grounds, however, upon which protection can be objected to. It is understood that the protective-tariff policy was adopted in this country in the beginning on the idea advocated by John Stuart Mill and one or two other eminent writers on the subject in England, who said that a new country might with advantage protect its infant industries, provided the tariff which was laid for that purpose was merely a temporary expedient for building up those industries. It was upon that idea that America first established this protective system. What has been the result? These infant industries at first were protected by very small duties, but, instead of growing into manhood and strength, they have gone into weaker decrepitude. They have needed more and more protection as years have gone on, until the climax has been reached at the present time. That ought to overthrow the whole doctrine in itself. But the danger in imposing protective duties is that when the policy is once embarked upon it can not be easily receded from. Protection is nothing more than a bounty, and when we offer bounties to manufacturers they will enter into industries and build up interests, and when at a later day we seek to overthrow this protective tariff we must hurt somebody, and of course there is objection. They will say, 'Thousands of men will be thrown out of employment, and hundreds of people will lose their capital.' This seems very plausible; but I maintain that manufacturers are made better manufacturers whenever they are thrown upon their own resources and left to the natural competition of trade rather than when they are told, 'You shall be held in the lap of the Government, and you need not stand upon your feet.' Such theories discourage skill, because it puts all industries upon an artificial basis. The basis that they rest upon is not that of the skill of the manufacturer; it is because the bounty of the Government is put on his trade which enables him to get more for an inferior article than a foreigner could get for a better article.

"Protection also hinders commerce immensely. The English people do not send as many goods to this country as they would if the duties were not so much, and in that way there is a restriction of commerce, and we are building up manufactories here at the expense of commerce. We are holding ourselves aloof from foreign countries in effect, and saying, 'We are sufficient to ourselves; we wish to trade, not with England, but with each other.' I maintain that it is not only a pernicious system, but a corrupt system.

"By Commissioner GARLAND:

"Q. Are you advocating the repeal of all tariff laws?—A. Of all protective-tariff laws; of establishing a tariff for revenue merely. It seems to me very absurd to maintain that we shall have free trade between different portions of this country, and at the same time shut ourselves out from free communication with other producing countries of the world. If it is necessary to impose restrictive duties on goods brought from abroad, it would seem to me, as a matter of logic, necessary to impose similar restrictions on goods taken from one State of this Union to another. That follows as a necessary consequence; there is no escape from it."

Mr. HARDY. Does not the gentleman realize a very distinct difference between the power of the Government to pass a certain law and the right or the policy of passing it?

Mr. HILL. Oh, I do; and I have just read where your candidate says that the "power" was absolutely conceded at that time and definitely settled.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Has anybody ever denied the power of the Government to pass protective tariffs?

Mr. HILL. Why, yes; the first sentence of your platform adopted at Baltimore denies it right now.

Mr. HARDY. Denies the right of it; but have we not all conceded the effective force of those laws when passed?

Mr. HILL. The gentleman ought to read the platform of his own party. I will read it for him now.

Mr. HARDY. Has any Democrat ever attempted to enjoin the enforcement of any of the tariff laws passed by Congress?

Mr. HILL. Yes, they did; and Andrew Jackson told them that by the Almighty he would hang them on the highest gallows in the country if they did not back down.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman refers to the nullification proceedings in South Carolina.

Mr. HILL. Yes; that is precisely the thing about which I have been reading to you the language of Dr. Wilson.

Mr. HARDY. But the gentleman realizes that that was decided on the ground that the right to resist the enforcement of a Federal law did not exist in the States.

Mr. HILL. I recognize that, but the gentleman says nobody denies the power of the Government to enforce tariff taxes. Now, let me read to the gentleman, while we are here close together, so that he will never forget it again during this campaign:

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party——

The gentleman belongs to the Democratic Party, does he not?

Mr. HARDY. I always have.

Mr. HILL. I will read to the gentleman the first plank in his platform.

We declare it to be a fundamental principle of the Democratic Party that the Federal Government under the Constitution has no right or power——

Mr. HARDY. Now, will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. HILL. Why, certainly.

Mr. HARDY. Under the Constitution they had no right or power, but they violated the Constitution.

Mr. HILL. What are you living under, if not under the Constitution?

Mr. HARDY. But your party has violated it.

Mr. HILL. Are we not living under the Constitution?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; and your party has violated it in passing tariff legislation not for revenue, but for protection.

Mr. HILL. And the people this fall are going to commission us to do it again.

Mr. HARDY. Whenever you announce the purpose of your legislation, if you will entitle your bill for the purpose of protection and not for revenue, your own courts will declare it unconstitutional.

Mr. HILL. The first tariff act that was ever passed in this country, in 1789, an act the effect of which, I think, was misconstrued by Chairman Parker in the Democratic convention, announced its object to be for the purpose of "encouraging the industries of the United States."

Mr. HARDY. And I want to say to the gentleman that if he will show me a law that says its purpose is solely for protection and not for raising revenue I will show him one that is not constitutional.

Mr. HILL. The gentleman can make that speech in his own time. Mr. Chairman, I rose for the purpose, as our honest Speaker said some weeks ago, to speak for the truth of history. He referred to certain matters that occurred in regard to the tariff act. I refer to statements that have been made since 1909 and brought down to now concerning the Payne tariff bill.*

Let me say that on the passage of the Payne tariff bill the gentleman rose from his seat when the bill was about to be passed, came down in front here, and said that the bill was a violation of the pledges of the Republican Party. The Democratic platform says so now, and he said then it would raise the duties 1.71 per cent. I will ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] if I am not right in my figures.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not recollect the exact figures, but I know it was very high.

Mr. HILL. He said that they would raise the Dingley duties 1.71 per cent. Now, no man can take a tariff bill based on specific duties and figure out what the rate will be when it goes into operation, because he does not know what articles will be imported and what the valuation of those articles will be. Therefore that statement made by the now Speaker of the House, while it was honest from his standpoint—as everything he does is honest, whether it is in a Democratic convention or anywhere else [applause]—nevertheless it was a mistake, because it was impossible for him to figure out what the rate would be.

But from that day to this, notwithstanding the mistake, Democratic speakers have gone on and made these statements, and Democratic conventions have gone on and made these statements, and Democratic platforms have gone on and made these statements, all in utter violation of the fact, as most Democratic political statements—I do not refer to Democrats individually, but most Democratic political statements are in utter ignorance of the facts.

Now, we had a Democratic convention a little while ago. The permanent presiding officer was a distinguished honored, and loved Member of this House. He did not have quite as radical a view on this subject as did the temporary presiding officer. He said that the rate of the Payne tariff bill was 47 per cent, and the temporary officer said it was 50 per cent. Now, I am not going to attempt to reconcile the disagreement between two Democrats. It is hard enough to have to reconcile the disagreements between a Republican and a Democrat, but I am going to give you some facts now in regard to that matter.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Of course I will.

Mr. FIELDS. Since the gentleman has drifted into a political speech——

Mr. HILL. Unintentionally.

Mr. FIELDS. Without knowing where the attack comes from, may I ask which one of the Republican parties he is affiliated with?

Mr. HILL. Oh, that is absolute nonsense. I am surprised that the gentleman from Kentucky should ask that question. I am a Republican. I will ask him, Are you a Bryan man or a Tammany man?

Mr. FOCHT. Answer; stand up.

Mr. FIELDS. I am a Democrat.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, at the Democratic convention a few days ago the temporary presiding officer made this statement:

* The average duties under the tariff of 1789 was 8½ per cent; now the average is 50 per cent.

Both were mistakes. There is no record of the average rate of duty under the act of 1789. The first publication, and the only one, is in the American State papers, volume 1, page 140. The first statement is from October 1, 1790, to September 30, 1791, and the average—and this is the important point, showing how easy it is for eminent gentlemen unwittingly to fall into a mistake—the average for the 34 months' receipts was 8.48, and he says that it is 50 now.

Then it was on all imports, free and dutiable. Now his 50 per cent is on dutiable only. Is it fair? He was wrong in both, but was his statement as he intended to have it fair? The first statement published by the Government is for 1791, where the rate on free and dutiable both is given as 22.24 per cent. It is only 20.1 per cent now, instead of being 22.24, as in 1790, on all free and dutiable as shown by the official records of the Government. To-day, after 34 months of operation of the Payne tariff bill, running through the whole of it, from the day of its passage down to the 1st day of June, it is only 20.1 per cent. Two per cent less than it was in 1790, and not 50 per cent, the rate which the judge indicated by his comparison, mistakenly, to be the rate on all importations. Is it fair?

I am not going to waste much more time on it, except this: He says in 1830 the rate was 32 per cent. It was not. It was only 24 on the dutiable and 17 on the free and dutiable. There were only 26 per cent of the importations that came in free. All through that period of time you have what is a fit illustration of your revenue tariff, a tax on everything, practically, with no free list, or very little, if any.

Do you know, gentlemen, that priding yourselves as you do on the legislation of this session, you have passed but one tariff bill in this Congress that complies with your own platform? That is the chemical schedule. On that you scaled the duties on finished products below the protective points, and you put a revenue tax on $47,000,000 of raw materials which had come in free the previous year under the Payne bill and added directly to the cost of every one of them. That is a fit illustration of a revenue tariff bill, and that is the only one you have passed in accordance with your platform.

Judge Parker said that in 1842 the rate was 32 per cent. It was not; it was 24. He said in 1846 it was 25 per cent. It was not; it was 31 per cent. He said in 1857 it was 20 per cent. It was not; it was 22.45 per cent, and the percentage of free importations was only 14.

I desire now to have the Clerk read from page 420 of Senate reports, second session Fifty-third Congress, volume 13, 1894, a note appearing at the foot of the table of receipts from all sources.

The Clerk read as follows:

NOTE.—In the table of receipts from all sources, published annually in the Finance Report, the column headed "Customs" shows the total annual customs collections from all sources covered by warrant into the Treasury, after deducting expenses of collection. From 1791 to 1850 collectors paid from customs receipts all expenses of their offices and turned the net amount remaining into the Treasury, but from 1850 to the present time they have been compelled by law to turn into the Treasury all amounts collected, while the expenses of their offices are paid by warrants on the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the Clerk to stop right there. When you go back to 1850 it will be seen that you are dealing with a different proposition, as the note states. The collectors prior to that time paid the expenses of collecting the tax and turned in the net amount to the Treasury, whereas now they turn in the whole amount to the Treasury, and the expense of collection is paid by warrants drawn on the Treasury, so that the comparison is not worth a cent. I will ask the Clerk to continue the reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

The figures in the column of the above table headed "Amounts of duty collected" from 1791 to 1866, inclusive, show the annual amounts of duty collected on merchandise only, without any deductions for expenses of collection, and omitting the collections from tonnage, lighthouses, fines, penalties, forfeitures, etc. (Explanation given by Register of Treasury.)

For these reasons the figures of "Duties collected" prior to 1851 in the above table largely exceed in many cases the amount of receipts from customs as shown in the Finance Report, inasmuch as the expenses of collection were of considerable magnitude during the years when the net receipts only were covered into the Treasury. From 1850 to 1866 the receipts in the table in the Finance Report should exceed the duties collected in the above table by amounts of collections from sources other than duties on merchandise, such as tonnage dues, fines, penalties and forfeitures, hospital dues, etc. Since 1866 the duties collected, as shown by the above table, are taken from the accounts of this office. While these data, showing the duties collected on merchandise from 1791 to present time, are somewhat diverse in character, they are the best attainable.

Mr. HILL. As I say, Mr. Chairman, taking the figures back of that date, and basing a comparison upon them, that comparison is not worth a cent, and when the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] and the gentleman from New York, Judge Parker, stated that the Payne tariff bill showed an average rate of duty of 47 per cent according to Mr. JAMES and 50 per cent according to Judge Parker, and Judge Parker comparing it with the rate on the first tariff bill, which covered both free and dutiable, knowing that his 50 per cent referred only to the dutiable, it will be seen that each of them made a mistake.

They sin not against knowledge but against mistaken information. Perhaps that is a little harsh to say, because they could have had the figures of the Payne tariff bill; and I am going to put in the RECORD to-day the complete figures certified to by the Department of Commerce and Labor of every importation made since the 5th of August, 1909—since the Payne bill was enacted—to the 1st day of June, and in two or three days I will put in the figures up to the 1st day of July. I have not got them now, as they are not ready yet, but they will be, and you will get all of this kind of figures you want in this campaign before you get through, gentlemen on the other side of the House:

Imports of merchandise into the United States, showing percentage thereof free of duty, customs receipts, and average ad valorem rate of duty during the 34 months' operation of the Payne tariff law, Aug. 5, 1909, to May 31, 1912, compared with like results under the entire operation of the Wilson and Dingley tariffs, respectively.

[2] Excludes last 8 days of July, 1897, included under Wilson law; excludes Aug. 1-5, 1909, included under Payne law.
[3] Includes Aug. 1-5, 1909, under act of 1897.

NOTE.—A reduction of about $55,000,000 was caused in customs receipts under the McKinley Act, due to reduced imports in the closing months under that act in anticipation of the passage of the Wilson tariff, whose revenues were correspondingly increased. Likewise a reduction of about $45,000,000 was caused in customs receipts under the Dingley Act, due to heavy imports in the closing months under the Wilson law, whose revenues were correspondingly increased.

I will just give a temporary alleviating dose now, and I will go back to the beginning of the Wilson bill, which ran 35 months. The entire dutiable rate of the Wilson bill for 35 months was 42.8 per cent. The whole average for its entire duration was 42.8 per cent on the dutiable articles alone. On the whole bill it was 21.9 per cent. It had a free list of 48.8 per cent. In other words, 48.8 per cent of all the importations under the Wilson tariff law came in free. Now, about the Dingley law. It was in operation 144 months. For that entire period the rate of duty on the dutiable articles was 45.8 per cent, 3 per cent higher than the Wilson bill. The rate on all importations for the entire 144 months was 25.5 per cent. Now you have got the Wilson bill and you have got the Dingley bill—the Dingley bill 25.5, the Wilson bill 21.9. Now, were we faithful to the trust reposed in us by the country? I do not stand here and say that there were no mistakes in the Payne bill. There were, and I was opposed to some of them, but the advantages of that bill, with reference to other matters than mere rates of duty, far outweighed any possible mistakes which were in it. Why? It gave us the customs court, the maximum and minimum system of duties, and, best of all, authorized the tariff board. I will give you the rate of the Payne bill. That bill has been in operation 34 months up to the 1st of June and the average ad valorem for the whole bill for the entire time has been 20.1 per cent. The Wilson bill was 21.9, the Dingley bill was 25.5, and the Payne bill 20.1. Were we faithful to the obligations imposed upon us? The ad valorem on the dutiable list only under the Wilson bill was 42.8; under the Dingley bill, 45.8; under the Payne bill, 41.2. Now, I want to say to you gentlemen when you stand before your constituents, tell them the truth. [Applause on the Republican side.] It will not hurt you; it will not hurt you. If you do tell them the truth, tell them this: Tell them that never in the history of the United States, from 1789 down to now, have there ever been but four years when there was as large a free list—I do not mean aggregate importations, for the country has grown in size, but I mean percentage of all importations—that never in the history of this country from its beginning down to now have there been but four years when the percentage of free importations has been as much as under the Payne tariff bill, and that was when sugar was free under the McKinley bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

There have been but 14 years since 1820 when the free and dutiable importations put together have had as low a percentage of taxation as they have borne under the Payne tariff law. Now, be honest about it. Tell them these things, make a fair comparison; tell them frankly you do not want protection; tell them you are opposed to all tariffs, as Dr. Wilson said when Commissioner Garland asked him if he was in favor of the abolition of tariffs, and he said, "All protective tariffs." [Applause on the Republican side.] Tell them that. If you believe it, tell them that. If you do not believe it, come out fair and square and say that half of the South today is for a protective tariff, notwithstanding your platforms.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. Certainly I will yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not think the gentleman is fair in giving that degree of intelligence to his audience on the Republican side, because he has made this speech to my certain knowledge so many times since I have been in Congress that I do not think he is fair to his Republican colleagues. Now, so far as the speech is concerned as it falls upon Democratic ears it is entirely deaf and has always been——

Mr. HILL. I know that, and always will be; the truth never had any effect upon Democracy.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I thank the gentleman very much as designating me as possibly being one of those who have listened to him attentively. Now, by the way, let me just suggest this. I do not envy the man who is going to try to answer the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], because he has traveled all over the earth and back again, but what struck me when he got up first and when he acknowledged he was in favor of the bill——

Mr. HILL. I am.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado (continuing). He went off and was damning this bill with faint praise in that he spoke about the labor organizations having met the recent Democratic candidate for President.

Mr. HILL. Does the gentleman mean to say that the language of Dr. Wilson, which I read, was "damning the labor organizations with faint praise?"

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. But the language refers to the labor organizations meeting the nominee for the Presidency. Does not the gentleman know that the labor organizations went before the resolutions committee in Chicago when the convention nominated President Taft, as well as before the resolutions committee at Baltimore?

Mr. HILL. I will just answer the first. I would rather the gentleman would make his speech in his own time. I am for the labor legislation that does the laboring man good, that fills his dinner pail, that makes him a respectable man, and enables him to live like a man and pay his taxes, live in his own cottage, have his day's work for his family, raise his children, and become a good, independent American citizen.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Is that the 1896 dinner pail or the 1912 dinner pail?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. As soon as I get through with this. There is one other set of figures that I want to refer to. Under the Wilson bill the free list for 34 months was 48.8 per cent, under the Dingley bill 44.8 per cent, and on the 1st day of June it is 51.2 per cent for the entire life of the Payne tariff bill. And I will say to you gentlemen who talk about the cost of living, that during this past year the American people under the Payne tariff law have had a foreign commerce of $4,000,000,000 [applause on the Republican side] with the balance of trade in our favor of $550,000,000. I am told that $1,000,000,000 of foreign products have come into the United States without paying one single cent of duty under the Payne bill during the last fiscal year. You never had a Democratic tariff bill, you never will have under any legislation that is possible for you to frame under the terms of your platform, that will show such a magnificent result as that. And this year, unless the importations of June indicate worse at the end than they did at the beginning of the month, the free list under the Payne tariff bill will be 55 per cent of all the importations. Go home and tell those things to your constituents and William Howard Taft will be elected. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly I will, if I have time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Just a question. Did not the Republican convention at Chicago declare for a revision of the present tariff law?

Mr. HILL. Certainly it did.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Why did they do so if we have such a splendid and perfect law now?

Mr. HILL. For the correction of some high duties, and in accordance with the findings of a permanent, independent, nonpartisan Tariff Board on every schedule, and I am for it. Are you? I am for correcting mistakes, whether they are Democratic or Republican.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to my friend from Texas with pleasure.

Mr. GARNER. I realize the gentleman from Connecticut is undoubtedly the ablest man on his side of the House in presenting the paramount issue——

Mr. HILL. Oh, leave that out.

Mr. GARNER. And I want to ask him if this is the opening gun as outlined at the White House by the committee the other night?

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] is too high-toned a man to ask such a question. If it was true, I would keep silent. It is not true, and I will say there is nothing to it.

Mr. GARNER. Then the gentleman is not taking advantage of the fact to make a tariff speech, other than to connect the two together?

Mr. HILL. Not in the slightest degree. I did not expect to make this informal talk when I came in here. I will tell you exactly how it came about. I was given certain statements last night. I do not like to make a statement unless I verify it. I was told of a certain baccalaureate sermon of Dr. Wilson three years ago. I went to the Library last night and got the Trenton paper, and have been copying from it this morning. I did not know what was up, and I did not expect to make any remarks at all. I came on the floor of the House and found a bill which was up last Wednesday and which I was for then and which I am for now. The whole trouble about the thing is how you are going to reconcile your advocacy of this bill with the views propounded by your candidate.

Mr. GARNER. It appears from the gentleman's argument that he is trying to show that the Democratic platform and the utterances of Dr. Wilson do not coincide and that they are not together upon the subject of the tariff.

Mr. HILL. Of course they are not.

Mr. GARNER. And I wish to ask the gentleman whether Dr. Wilson is stronger than the platform or the platform is stronger than Dr. Wilson.

Mr. HILL. I do not think either one of them is strong enough to win. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman honestly believe, under present conditions, that his prophecy that William H. Taft will be the next President will come true in next November?

Mr. HILL. I will ask you a question.

Mr. GARNER. Answer mine.

Mr. HILL. Do you not know that for the last six months I have said, and said, and said repeatedly, that your mistake here in this extra session on tariff legislation would force the issue before the American people next fall to be the tariff, the tariff, and nothing but the tariff, and that William Howard Taft would win because the people of this country, no matter how much they love you or distrust you, are a protective-tariff people, and you can not force free trade down their throats? [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. Now, then, I realize——

Mr. HILL. I believe, as much as I believe I am standing here, what I have said all the way through, that Mr. Taft would not only be nominated, but that he would be elected. [Applause on the Republican side.] Why, I remember——

Mr. GARNER. I ask the gentleman now——

Mr. HILL. I will tell the gentleman something else.

Mr. GARNER. Let me ask the gentleman this question. I asked it of the gentleman a little while ago. There is not a man in this House, whether on the Republican side or on the Democratic side, who does not believe in the mental honesty of the gentleman from Connecticut. I ask the gentleman this honest question: Does he tell this House to-day that he honestly is of the belief that William Howard Taft will be elected President?

Mr. HILL. I do, and I will tell you why. I have been through this experience once before—probably before the gentleman was born. I was a Liberal Republican in 1872. I trusted the promises of Democrats. I voted for Horace Greeley. The New York Tribune had been the political Bible of my father and my family. I was brought up on it, and when Horace Greeley was nominated by the Liberal Republicans and indorsed, as I thought honestly, by your people—I learned better since [laughter]—I thought that he was right, and I stood with him. And we swept this country up to the first Monday in October, and on the first Tuesday in November we were thrashed out of sight. You people stayed at home, and did not vote according to your agreement. You will do it again. Tammany will sell you out. You know it just as well as I do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. They can not do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I have seen them do it over and over again. They want New York City, and they are going to have it.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Will not Bill Barnes sell out?

Mr. HILL. Oh, you are beaten. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. AKIN of New York. Where is Bill Barnes? [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. You will be at home. You need not worry about it.

Mr. AKIN of New York. Well, and you need not worry about that.

Mr. HILL. You are beaten. You were beaten from the day that it appeared in the convention that the hand was the hand of Esau——

Mr. GARNER. Who is going to buy us? That is what I want to know. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. From the day that it appeared that the hand was the hand of Esau, but the voice was the voice of Jacob. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GARNER. You say Tammany is going to sell. Who is going to buy them?

Mr. HILL. I say you stayed at home. You indorsed Horace Greeley. You went back on your pledges, and you did not vote at all, and the regular Republican nominee was elected. I do not care how many third tickets or fourth tickets or fifth tickets you put up. William Howard Taft will be elected President of the United States on the issue of a protective tariff and against Democratic free trade. [Applause on the Republican side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ADAMSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On July 5, 1912:

H. R. 22006. An act authorizing the Choctawhatchee River Light & Power Co. to erect a dam across the Choctawhatchee River in Dale County, Ala.;

H. R. 18712. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 22194. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

H. R. 22867. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 23765. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors.

H. J. Res. 332. Joint resolution appropriating $1,350,000 for encampment and maneuvers for the Organized Militia.

On July 6, 1912:

H. R. 20628. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

H. R. 20738. An act for the transfer of the so-called Olmstead lands, in the State of North Carolina, from the Solicitor of the Treasury to the Secretary of Agriculture.

On July 10, 1912:

H. R. 24227. An act to amend section 11 of an act entitled "An act to grant additional authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out certain provisions of the public acts, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1909.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just a few words. I have some time left. First I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] is recognized.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I do not attempt to measure swords with my older and more experienced colleague from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] in making a protective tariff speech, but I am impressed by the fact that this afternoon in this House the gentleman is much more confident of the election of William Howard Taft than he was at a recent meeting of Connecticut postmasters. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Only this morning—and it seems as if it was rather providential—I received a letter, a part of which I hold in my hand, and in view of the political discussion having developed here, and in view further of the great confidence expressed in the election of the Republican nominee by my colleague, I want to read something that the gentleman from Connecticut said at a recent meeting of Connecticut Republican postmasters along this same line of confidence. I read from the letter in question:

I will retail to you a part of a speech that I heard at the annual banquet of the Connecticut Postmasters' Association, at which I was a guest.

Hon. EBENEZER J. HILL was the speaker, and he prefaced his remarks by asking if there were any reporters in the room, and upon being assured that there were not, he resumed his speech, which he evidently considered of a confidential nature. He began by saying that he was pleased to see all the old familiar faces, but he feared that some of those faces would be missing at the next annual banquet if they did not do better work in the next election than they did in the last.

[Laughter.]

Mr. HILL rose.

Mr. REILLY. I will not yield now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. REILLY (reading):

He said further, "You are all creatures of the present administration, and as such are expected to be in harmony with and part of that administration, and, furthermore, notwithstanding orders and statements to the contrary, you are expected to take off your coats and openly work for the continuation of that administration."

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

The letter continues:

But the part of his speech which will interest you most is that in which he alluded to you. He said, "Behold the man you have sent to Washington to represent this district. Do you know what he is doing? He is voting with the southern Democrats to destroy the manufacturers of Connecticut."

I deny that absolutely. I voted on tariff measures in this House with the majority of this House, and also with a large minority on the other side of the House who are honest in their convictions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I voted for tariff legislation that was promised the people of the country by the Democrats in 1910, after they had been deceived by the promises made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] and other Republicans in 1908. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I deny that I voted to ruin the manufacturers of Connecticut, and I deny that my southern colleagues have voted to do that either. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am sick and tired of hearing the gentleman from Connecticut, the know-all of tariff legislation, compared to whom the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is a mere piker; no one knows anything but the gentleman from the fourth district of Connecticut—I say I am sick and tired of hearing him, under the guise of protecting the American workingman, getting up here and feeding them with speeches on the tariff. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I say that the Democracy of this House has redeemed its pledges made in 1910 so far as an adverse Senate and a hostile President would permit them; and if the House legislation had been passed by the Senate and approved by the President the people of this country would have been far better off to-day, far better than they will be in listening to this buncombe every few days, under every pretext, that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] can inject into the discussion of bills in this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I desire to ask the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY] if he states on his honor as a Representative that he has quoted my language correctly.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I will state on my honor as a Representative that this is a bona fide letter, received only to-day from a friend——

Mr. HILL. I ask the gentleman fairly and squarely as a Representative from Connecticut if he is responsible for the correctness of the language which he has read on this floor?

Mr. REILLY. I will ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he denies having said that. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HILL. I want to ask the gentleman if he states on his honor as a Representative that the language which he has attributed to me was ever uttered by me; not because somebody tells him so, but will he be responsible for the correctness of it?

Mr. REILLY. I will not believe the language I quoted if the gentleman from Connecticut denies it; but until he does deny it I do believe it.

Mr. HILL. Oh!

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I emphatically deny the correctness of the language which has been read here by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY]. I have the right to know whether he knows himself that he has read language that he says he attributes to me.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason I deny it. I have kept silent in the past on attacks of this kind. I came into this Hall some time last winter when the gentleman from Connecticut was reading a prepared speech in which he accused me of having prepared a woolen schedule while president of a woolen mill and while my son was treasurer of a woolen mill. He did it deliberately. He might have known that it was false if he had wished to have known it. My son had died three years before that time. I had resigned from the vice presidency of the woolen mill prior to assisting in preparing the Payne tariff bill more than three years before. The gentleman from Connecticut knew it and he suppressed the facts on this floor. I say that statements of that kind coming from any man, Republican or Democrat, are not only not worth the paper they are written on, but they make the man unworthy of any credence whatever, either now or in the future. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SULZER. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, and I will yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, the attempt of the gentleman from Connecticut to sidetrack this present proposition by the introduction of another will not succeed. I want to correct the statement which the gentleman made here a moment ago. He said that I knew that he had resigned as the vice president of that Norwalk company. When I made the remarks in the House some time ago I did know he had resigned as vice president, and I said in that speech that he had resigned as vice president. I said also in that speech that he was still a stockholder and still a director in that company. I said that to him in public and privately, and I repeat it now. I said that he had resigned some time before as vice president, so he can not put that up to me as an accusation of being unfair.

I did not know that his son was dead. If I had, I would not have brought his name into the discussion; but the fact remains that his son had been treasurer of the company. The fact that the gentleman from Connecticut had resigned as vice president I stated on the floor, but he is still a stockholder and a director and the controlling interest in that company to-day, and I have nothing to take back in that speech. He can not sidetrack attention from what I quoted here to-day, and they will stand as true until he denies them.

Mr. HILL. Would the gentleman like to have me deny them now? There is no such company now and there was not when the gentleman made his speech. The stock had already been voted as a free gift to others at that time and the concern was out of existence.

Mr. REILLY. When that speech was made, within a month of making it, the annual report of the company was on file in the town clerk's office in Norwalk, the gentleman's home town. There is where my information came from; there was no hearsay, and the town clerk's records were the source of information. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, this is a hot day. [Laughter.] Let us keep cool. [Laughter.] I say this advisedly because I regret that gentlemen get unduly excited now about a matter which is not before the House and which will no doubt be thoroughly discussed on the stump in the cooler days of the autumn. [Laughter.] In view, however, of what the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] has said to befog the issue and to direct attention from the bill which we are now considering to something else which will be considered in due time, I want to say that, in my judgment, the people of our country are tired of hearing the gentleman from Connecticut expatiate on the tariff—threadbare subject to him—and they care nothing about his opinion to-day on that topic, but they do care a great deal about what Gov. Woodrow Wilson will say on the subject when he comes to speak. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The people of the country are waiting to hear the speech which Gov. Woodrow Wilson will make to the committee which will soon officially notify him of his nomination for President by the Democratic Party. I indulge in no prophecy as I look into the sad faces of the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle and read there what they really think and what they truly know, that just as sure as the sun will rise to-morrow morning Woodrow Wilson will be the next President of the United States. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SULZER. Is it for a question?

Mr. FOCHT. It is for an observation altogether germane.

Mr. SULZER. Never mind the observation. Ask the question.

Mr. FOCHT. I have here a book sold by the millions giving the speeches of a gentleman from New York named SULZER.

Mr. SULZER. Good. Has the gentleman read that book?

Mr. FOCHT. Read it and was glorified in the reading of it.

Mr. SULZER. Then the gentleman knows more now than he did before he read it. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FOCHT. Quite true, but we are informed in that book that the said gentleman has carried a Republican district some 20 or 30 times. Why should he do any hurt to the Republicans upon whom he depends for his majority?

Mr. SULZER. That is fine. I am not hurting the Republicans. I am just telling the truth. If that hurts, make the most of it.

Mr. FOCHT. I know that the whole world might sit at the feet of the gentleman and gather wisdom. Anyone who reads the book could not fail to do so.

Mr. SULZER. My friend is too complimentary. However, I do not want to get into a tariff discussion at this time, because I am too anxious to pass this bill to create a department of labor.

In all seriousness I trust we shall not get awry on extraneous matters, but stick to the subject matter which is before the House, to wit, the bill to create a department of labor. Nay, I hope that from now on until we take a vote on this bill Members will confine themselves to the subject under discussion and not discuss other matters wholly irrelevant. For one I am always glad to hear the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL], and I was gratified to hear him say that he was heartily in favor of the bill before the House. I do not believe there is a Member present here who is opposed to this bill, and if that be so let us pass the bill and then, so far as I am concerned, I will stay here until the cows come home and listen to Members discuss the tariff.

I know something about the tariff myself. [Laughter.] The tariff subject is a good deal like a fiddle. If you understand it you can play any tune on it, but if you do not understand it you can not play on it at all. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] understands the tariff question, and to-day he is playing his old-time tune on it. He has been playing the same tune on it for many, many years, but wait until you hear Woodrow Wilson, the next President of the United States, who understands the instrument, too, play the tune of the people on it. That is what the country it waiting for. Then you will hear the true response from the voters on election day.

But a truce to the tariff to-day. Let us consider this bill for a department of labor, and let us see if we can not pass it before we adjourn. It is a very important measure. It is a nonpartisan measure. It comes to us with a unanimous report, and I would like to see it pass the House before 4 o'clock by a unanimous vote, and to test the sentiment of the committee in that regard, I now ask, Mr. Chairman, unanimous consent that the House vote upon the bill at 4 o'clock.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let us vote now.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on the pending bill at 4 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from New York is very generous. The debate on this bill was opened by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] took the floor and made a political speech which had no relation whatever to the bill. He has now made another political speech which has no relation whatever to the bill, and having made two political speeches, he proposes, without any further consideration of the measure at all, to cut off debate. I object.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry the gentleman objects. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois how much time he desires.

Mr. MANN. I would like to have about two hours myself. I suppose I will not get that.

Mr. SULZER. Let us be fair. How much time does the gentleman really desire?

Mr. MANN. I am not proposing to make any arrangement whatever with the gentleman. I will make this proposition to the gentleman if he is in charge of the bill. I do not know whether or not he is in charge of the bill—I will make this agreement, that as far as I am personally concerned we run the debate on the bill and close at 5 o'clock and vote next Wednesday on the bill the first thing.

Mr. SULZER. Why put off the passage of the bill until a week from to-day? I will agree to close debate at half past 4 or 5 o'clock and vote on the bill to-day. Why wait another week?

Mr. MANN. Well, not because of any reason that affects this side of the House.

Mr. SULZER. Then let us close debate at half past 4 and pass the bill to-day.

Mr. MANN. We may close at half past 4 if we are ready when half past 4 comes.

Mr. SULZER. The gentleman is seeking delay. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. MANN. That is none of the gentleman's business at this time.

Mr. SULZER. I am seeking information.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is not seeking information at all. Give us a chance to discuss the bill and he will find out where I stand on it.

Mr. SULZER. The motives of the gentleman are apparent.

Mr. KENDALL. Let us go on with the discussion of the bill.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, very well. I reserve the balance of my time. I want to pass the bill to-day if it can be done, and it can be done if there be no filibustering on the other side.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to create a new executive department of the Government—a department of labor. It provides for a secretary of labor and three assistant secretaries of labor. It provides for a transfer to the new department of labor of the Immigration Service and the present Bureau of the Department of Labor. It adds in no way whatever to the duties to be performed by the existing bureaus of the Government, except in the one particular where it proposes that the secretary of labor shall have the right to interfere in every labor dispute, regardless of whether it involves interstate commerce or not.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. GARNER. It occurred to me a while ago, while the gentleman from Pennsylvania was reading the provisions of this bill with reference to providing for offices, whether or not the language in the bill is broad enough to add agents and employees of various characters by appropriation committees without being subject to a point of order. I would like to get the gentleman's opinion on that, because I think his opinion on that subject at this time would be worth something.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt——

Mr. GARNER. If the Appropriation Committee could add such employees and add such salaries as they would deem proper without a point of order being made against them.

Mr. MANN. I would not like to say you could change the class of the persons employed, so far as the point of order is concerned. The language in this bill is quite similar to language in other laws, and the gentleman knows the ruling has been consistent up to the present session of Congress, since when some Chairmen have been in the chair who have had no familiarity with the rules and precedents and have brought about a conflict of rulings. Heretofore they have been consistent. You could add to employees in a class where it was according to existing law. Some Chairmen have held you could do that and some have held you could not do it. I do not attempt to reconcile the rulings. When the gentleman from Texas asks me what the rulings of the Chair will be on a bill which is not yet a law it is a gambling chance.

Mr. GARNER. I was undertaking to put in the RECORD now the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois, who is looked upon as more or less familiar with the rules of the House. I want to get his opinion as to what the rule ought to be with reference to this bill in adding employees.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to express an opinion on the subject for future quotation. My opinions for or against points of order are too numerous now as printed in the RECORD, and anything I might say now would not add to anything which I have said.

Mr. GARNER. If Congress wants to control the matter, now is the proper time to control it in this bill, and therefore it is necessary to have the information by each Member of Congress as to what power it offers the appropriation bill and what the bill ought to be.

Mr. MANN. This bill authorizes the appointment of such other clerical assistants, besides the chief clerk and disbursing clerk, as may from time to time be authorized by Congress. That authorization is sufficient if carried in an appropriation bill, and also authorizes such number of inspectors and special agents as may be provided for by Congress. Whether that authorizes an appropriation bill to provide for them is a question which is not settled in my own mind.

Mr. Chairman, this bill not only provides for a secretary of labor, but it provides for three assistant secretaries of labor. The distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER], who introduced the bill, is now the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House. It is true that the Department of State has three Assistant Secretaries. In my judgment, the Department of State would be more efficient if it had only one Assistant Secretary. The Treasury Department has three Assistant Secretaries. But it has a very large field of work, and work which may properly be divided up among Assistant Secretaries, although, if we may judge from some statements which have been made in the papers recently, the result of having three Assistant Secretaries is that you can not get always the proper action from the real chief, the Secretary.

No other department of the Government has three assistant secretaries. The Department of Agriculture has one Assistant Secretary. The new Department of Commerce and Labor, which we created a few years ago, has one Assistant Secretary, and this House in the last Congress, with the Democratic side of the House voting that way, declined to provide a second assistant secretary for the Department of Commerce and Labor.

Now, there is much more reason for having two Assistant Secretaries in the Department of Commerce and Labor than there is in having two in the new department of labor, because the functions of the Department of Commerce and Labor cover a great many more bureaus and different classes of work than are proposed to be covered by the department of labor. There is absolutely, in my judgment, no justification or excuse for proposing three assistant secretaries in this new department. The Post Office Department has four Assistant Postmasters General, each with a certain class of work to perform, and covering an appropriation now of $250,000,000.

At the proper time I shall offer an amendment to provide that there shall be but one assistant secretary, and in the same connection to provide for the auditing of the accounts of the new department, which is not provided for in this bill and is not covered by any existing law. To that, I suppose, there will be no objection.

Mr. Chairman, there are nine Cabinet officers. We call them "secretaries of departments," except in the case of the Postmaster General and the Attorney General. Those nine Cabinet officers now stand at the head of nine executive departments. I believe they are all considered and classified now as executive departments of the Government. The only provision in the Constitution in regard to the executive departments of the Government is found in section 2 of Article II, where it is provided that the President—> may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

And, again, that—

> Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

Just what constitutes an executive department or the head of a department has never been fully determined. It is quite certain, however, that the head of such a department shall not necessarily be called into the President's Cabinet nor constitute the head of an executive department within the meaning of the Constitution. The President's Cabinet is not a constitutional office. The President's Cabinet is determined by the President, although now I suppose it is largely determined by the force of custom and possibly influenced to a certain extent by a recent provision in one of the appropriation bills. The President's Cabinet is not created by law. It exists voluntarily and only by force of custom. It has become the custom, however, that when a new department is created and an official at the head of it is called the "secretary of the department" to consider him as a Cabinet officer.

There is nothing, of course, to prevent the President from requesting the head of any other department to attend the meetings of what is called the "Cabinet." This bill, creating a new secretary of labor, should not of itself provide that the secretary should be a member of the Cabinet. There has been a Department of Labor for many years. First, years ago, there was a Commissioner of Labor. Afterwards that was made a Department of Labor, still with a commissioner at the head of it.

Mr. Chairman, only three new additional members of the Cabinet have been provided for more than 100 years. The Departments of State, War, Treasury, Navy, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General were established during the eighteenth century, and during the first 10 years of the existence of our Government under the present Constitution.

The State Department was the first executive department created, and was established under the title of the "Department of Foreign Affairs" by the act of July 27, 1789, the title of the department being changed to the "Department of State." by act of September 15, 1789.

The Department of War was created by the act of Congress of August 7, 1789. The Department of the Treasury was created by act of September 2, 1789. The salary for an Attorney General, which presumably carried the office, and which I believe was $1,500, was provided for in the act of September 23, 1789, and the office of Attorney General was created in the last section of the act of September 24, 1789. The Attorney General has always been one of the President's family and advisers and known as a Cabinet officer, though he was not always called in at the meetings of the three Secretaries at the beginning of the Government, and although the office of Attorney General was not in terms referred to as an executive office until the act of June 22, 1870, establishing the Department of Justice. A temporary Postmaster General was provided for by the act of September 27, 1789; and by the act of May 8, 1794, a general post office was established at the seat of government, with a Postmaster General in charge. The Postmaster General became undoubtedly the head of one of the executive departments of the Government, but the law did not so refer to him until the act of June 8, 1872, establishing an executive department to be known as the Post Office Department; and although the post office was established, and the Postmaster General, or a person in charge of the post office was provided at the beginning of the Government, the head of the office was not considered a Cabinet officer, nor was the Postmaster General called into consultation in the Cabinet until the administration of Andrew Jackson.

Jackson considered that the Postmaster General was so important in the distribution of offices and jobs that it was considered advisable that the head of that office should meet with the other gentlemen in the Cabinet when it came to the dividing up of the dope.

The act creating the War Department carried with it a provision for control of the Navy. It was originally contemplated that the Navy should be under the control of the War Department; but when war seemed imminent with a European power during the administration of Washington it was finally provided that there should be a Department of the Navy, and that was created by the act of April 30, 1798.

The six departments to which I have referred were all established practically at the commencement of the Government under the existing Constitution. There have been many requests for the creation of new executive departments of the Government in behalf of various interests. Since that time Congress has been very conservative about granting those requests. There are several bills pending now in the two Houses of Congress proposing additional departments of the Government. There is no special interest not already specially provided for, and some which are specially provided for, that do not seek to be specially represented in the President's Cabinet, upon the theory that an interest which has special representation in the Cabinet receives special advantage and special attention. It is quite within the bounds of reason to say that with the increase in number of the members of the Cabinet there comes a decrease in power and influence of the Cabinet itself.

Mr. Chairman, I had charge in this House of the bill creating the last new executive department of the Government, the Department of Commerce and Labor, and I have many times questioned since the enactment of that legislation whether after all it was to the interest of the Government to increase the number of Cabinet officers. I believe the Cabinet in the old days, when there were only six or seven members of it, had far greater influence in shaping the unity of purpose of the country than it has now or than it will have in the future when the number is increased.

It is easy to say that labor ought to have a representative in the Cabinet. It is just as easy to say that the people interested in health matters should have a representative in the Cabinet. It was for many years contended that the immense interests engaged in mines and mining should have a representative in the Cabinet, and it took a long time before the people engaged in the mining industry were willing even to accept a Bureau of Mines and Mining instead of a new executive department of the government of mines, to be represented by a Cabinet officer. It is undoubtedly true that from the start there was a desire to have some department of the Government which went beyond the mere matter of official control of official governmental activities. The Department of State is necessary in our relations with foreign countries. The Treasury Department is a mere instrument in connection with the collection and expenditure of the revenues of the Government. It relates to governmental activities. The War Department is a matter for control of one of our means of defense and offense. So is the Navy Department.

The Post Office Department results solely from the governmental activities of the Government in handling the postal matters of the country. The Attorney General's Office, or the Department of Justice, relates solely to matters arising out of advice in legal matters, which the Attorney General must give, and the activities which he represents in prosecuting cases or offenses in behalf of the Government.

There was a time when it was desired to increase the activities of the Government, especially in regard to the public domain, and for many years there was advocated a home department. Congress finally created the Department of the Interior, the title to which law is "An act creating a home department," although the words "home department" are not found in the act and the word "Interior" is not found in the title. There was transferred to that department various governmental activities, such as control of the the subject of patents and control more or less of the public domain.

In the course of time that great body of substantial yeomanry of the country known as the agriculturists demanded representation. For many years there existed a national body, voluntary in its character, representing the agriculturists of the country, who proposed a new department or a new bureau or some new governmental agency which would add a new department of agriculture. One of the first things which was done under the administration of President Lincoln, outside of the preparations and activities of war, was the passage of a law providing for a department of agriculture, which was to be presided over and was presided over not by a secretary but by a commission. That was really the first time that the Congress had entirely departed from the theory of having a Cabinet officer carry on purely government functions, and now provides for a new department entirely unrelated to governmental functions of the Government.

The Department of Agriculture, I think, has more than justified its creation. Some one asked a while ago about the expense that this department might reach. I suppose no one can tell what the expense of any department will be in the course of time. My recollection is that the first appropriation in behalf of agriculture was $5,500. When the new department was created it cost $64,000 a year. I forget just what appropriation is carried by the current agricultural bill, but the appropriation for 1912 is nearly $17,000,000. It is quite an increase from the original $5,500 or the $64,000 under the first act creating the department.

In 1889 the Department of Agriculture, which theretofore had been presided over by the Commissioner of Agriculture, was changed so that its head should be a Secretary of Agriculture. Thereupon the Secretary of Agriculture was called into the Cabinet. Congress has never provided that any of its officers should be placed in the Cabinet. But a few years ago when the salaries of the Cabinet officers were raised from $8,000 to $12,000 it was done by a provision upon an appropriation bill providing that the salaries of Cabinet officers should be increased to $12,000. I believe that is the only recognition of what a Cabinet officer is.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. In the bill creating the Department of Commerce and Labor, is not the Secretary made a member of the Cabinet?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have in my hand a copy of the act, and it reads:

> There shall be at the seat of government an executive department to be known as the Department of Commerce and Labor, and a Secretary of Commerce and Labor who shall be the head thereof, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and who shall receive a salary of $8,000 per annum, and whose term and tenure of office shall be like that of the heads of other executive departments.

I see that I am in error in the matter. I supposed that it provided for his being a member of the Cabinet.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, perhaps, confused the act with the report which I made upon it. There is no doubt that it was intended to make him a member of the Cabinet, and that statement was made in the report. Of course there is no doubt but that it is intended to make the Secretary of Labor a member of the Cabinet, and I take it that if the bill becomes a law the President will call the Secretary of the new department into his Cabinet. If there was any place where it could stop I would, perhaps, have no objection to increasing the number one more. But in the end we may make the Cabinet so large that it will no longer be a Cabinet. Even now, with nine members, it has come so that instead of waiting upon the Cabinet meeting and consulting, the President will send more often for the individual heads of the Cabinet and consult concerning the matters relating to their department, and not confine it to sending for the heads of the departments who are Cabinet officers but sending for other officials. There is such a thing as making the family of advisors of the President too large.

Now, what is the reason offered for this bill? We added the Department of Labor to the new Department of Commerce and Labor. Gentlemen say that that department is for commerce. It is no more for commerce than it is for labor. They may say that no laboring man has been Secretary of the new department, and they may equally and truthfully say that nobody who knew anything about commerce—that is, no one who is an expert, has been appointed as the head of that department.

No one knows whom the President will call; the moment you make an office political in character the appointment is more likely to be political in character than it is expert in character. The gentleman who is now at the head of what they call the Bureau of Labor, although the law denominates it as the Department of Labor, remained there for many years. It was not a political appointment, I take it. I think he has the confidence very largely of both labor and capital. In my judgment, it is better for both parties to have some one there who is not put in purely as a political proposition, and who can remain for a time, than it is to appoint a new man the head of a new department every presidential term, and if you can judge by the experience of the last 20 or 30 years, sometimes three or four times during a presidential term.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] says that one of the purposes of the bill is to permit the secretary of labor to appoint commissioners of mediation or conciliation, whatever they may be termed, in labor disputes. Is it not a wiser proposition to let the head of the department which represents both capital and labor, both commerce and labor, appoint this commission than it is a man who simply represents labor? What greater reason can be given for having the Department of Labor appoint the commissioners of conciliation than there is for having a department representing both commerce and industry appoint the commissioners of conciliation? I am perfectly willing for the passage of any bill into a law which may aid in settling contemplated and existing labor disputes. Organized labor is not always, it seems to me, quite fair on that subject.

A few years ago, while I was chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, we reported into the House a bill known as the Townsend bill which proposed to authorize the President in case of labor disputes which might involve interstate commerce to appoint in each case a board—I do not remember the title of it—which might investigate and endeavor to bring the parties together. That had no power to enforce anything. Organized labor was afraid of it. I am not criticizing them for being afraid of it. Perhaps it would have gone too far; I do not know. I do not see, however, but that the present bill in effect goes quite as far or perhaps farther. It does not offend my constitutional sense quite as much, I think, as it would that of some gentlemen on the Democratic side of the aisle to have a serious proposition here that the President of the United States, or one of his executive officers, can interfere in any threatened or existing labor dispute local in character purely which has no relation to any power of the General Government.

Under the terms of the existing bill, while that power would not be exercised because it would be too extreme, they might appoint a commission to investigate a quarrel between a farmer and a single farm hand as to the wages or other conditions under which the labor was to be performed. And it goes from that up. And yet I am not prepared to say that it may not work good. We have had a number of propositions of this sort before. One is this bill; another is another bill, I believe, reported from the Committee on Labor providing for a board of conciliation. I think the gentleman has a bill of that kind on the calendar.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Providing for the appointment of an industrial commission.

Mr. MANN. That bill is a bill providing for the appointment of a commission to be called a commission on industrial relations, a commission to be composed of nine persons to be appointed by the President, three of whom shall be employers of labor and three representatives of organizations of labor. May I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether if the pending bill is passed he desires to have the other bill passed?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That is on the theory that one might not become a law?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Not only on the theory one might not become a law, but on the additional theory that the industrial commission bill directs an investigation into the entire industrial situation. The bill under consideration does not direct any such investigation, but it gives to the Secretary the power of mediation and conciliation when in his judgment it is wise to exercise it.

Mr. MANN. Well, if you are to have a new department of labor for the purpose, in part, of collecting information, what is the department to do? I will be glad to know. We have had a Department of Labor for years, originally provided that there should be so many clerks and providing specifically for a force to be in the Department of Labor, and for years the department could not find enough to do, unless an accommodating Member of Congress would offer a resolution, which regularly came in once in a while, directing the Labor Department to make an investigation of some special case; otherwise there was no reason for continuing to pay the men, because they would have nothing to do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman given consideration to section 4 of this bill, which includes a number of bureaus of the Government?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Bureau of Immigration is included, and all immigration questions appear to be taken over into the proposed department of labor.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think it makes any difference whether the Immigration Service is in the Department of Commerce and Labor or whether it is in the department of labor. This is simply to give some excuse for the creation of this department. It will be no more effective and probably less effective in one department than the other.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman, in some of his preceding remarks, intimated it might not be well always to have a specialist at the head of a department——

Mr. MANN. I did not intimate it might not always be well, but intimated it is seldom done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman perhaps would not favor putting in charge of a Tariff Board, which has to do business for all the people and gather information from all the people, one who is a specialist on the free-trade side of the question or one who is a specialist on the protective side of the question?

Mr. MANN. Of course I was referring to the heads of departments, such as Cabinet officers, who are political appointments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I bring the question of immigration to the notice of the gentleman, with a view to calling his attention to the fact that there is a wide difference of opinion in labor circles whether there should or should not be a continuation of immigration to this country. Certain labor leaders are very much opposed to immigration and are greatly in favor of restriction.

Now, then, if immigration, which was provided for in the Constitution of the United States and which has given substantial basis to the prosperity of the country, is to be put in the hands of those who are diametrically opposed to it, it raises the question whether immigration should be relegated to a department of this kind.

Mr. MANN. Well, I will say to my friend from Pennsylvania that I think so long as I now remember in my service in the Government the head of the Immigration Service has been a labor leader and is now, a very competent and efficient official, and I believe he has the confidence of organized labor as well. Is not that so in the main?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. He has the confidence of the men who have been selected as officials of labor organizations.

Mr. MANN. I think so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He was himself an official of a labor organization.

Mr. MANN. He was a very efficient, so I am told, official of the labor organization, and I believe he has made a very efficient Commissioner of Immigration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would the gentleman think it was entirely proper to put at the head of the Bureau of Immigration a man who was an absolute restrictionist?

Mr. MANN. Oh, it is for Congress to determine the restrictions upon which immigrants may come into this country. Of course, I aired my views on that subject in the House here not long ago, briefly. I do not believe myself in the literacy test of immigration.

On the other hand I do believe that if there is some way of discouraging immigration to some extent it might be a wise thing to do—temporarily at least. I do not believe in making the test on a man as to whether he can read or write.

Mr. CONNELL. Does the gentleman believe the establishment of this new bureau would have anything to do with that test? Could they bring it about in any way?

Mr. SULZER. Certainly not.

Mr. MANN. That was the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CONNELL. I wanted it explained; that is all.

Mr. MANN. That is a matter for Congress to determine. There is no doubt that the officials in charge of the Immigration Service, who apply any law that we pass, have quite a degree of latitude in the application of the law. And the same is true of the Customs Service.

Mr. SULZER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] if he bases his criticism on the assumption that public officials do not do their duty.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not at all. But I would say that a man placed in control of a Government bureau or in charge of a department of the Government of the United States represents all classes of citizens, whether they are Democrats or Republicans or Prohibitionists, or whether they are aliens, or whether they are native born; and I would not like to see at the head of any department of this Government a man so prejudiced in his views on one side or the other side of a question affecting human rights as to be unable to fairly decide whether a man should come into this country or whether he should be kept out.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have noticed, with a good deal of pleasure, all my life, and I think it is the redeeming feature of popular government, that, as a rule, whatever views a man might express concerning a law or a proposition before he went into office, when he took the oath of office to administer the law as he found it, he attempted to fulfill the duties of his office and to carry out the law regardless of personal predilection or former personal prejudice. [Applause.] I think that is the case. I just as lief, so far as I am concerned, as a rule, take a man who might have been even a labor agitator opposed to immigration and put him in charge of the execution of the law, and I believe he would execute the law as he found it. If we ever reach the time in this country when people generally will not do that, we have reached the end of successful popular government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman surely would not consider that the labor interests of this country would be satisfied if John Kirby, the president of the National Association of Manufacturers, would be placed at the head of the Department of Labor?

Mr. MANN. They would not be satisfied, because the head of the Bureau of Labor, in addition to enforcing the law, has something to do with formulating the policy of the Government by the report which he makes to Congress. I am not so sure but that Mr. Kirby would be—I do not know what his attitude is—more self-opinionated than the average labor leader, and probably is more opposed to immigration.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the gentleman observed that in this section 4 no provision is made for that Division of Information which now undertakes to see that incoming aliens are properly distributed throughout the country and places of employment are pointed out to them? I would like to know, if the gentleman can not answer, from the chairman of the Committee on Labor, whether it was intentionally left out.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman will find that the language of this bill on that subject is taken from the language of the law creating the Department of Commerce and Labor. I drew the language in the law creating the Department of Labor. The language in the bill reads—

> The Commissioner General of Immigration, the Commissioner of Immigration, and the Bureau of Immigration, and the Immigration Service at large.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. What does that mean?

Mr. MANN. If that does not cover the whole subject, then I do not know anything.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is a bureau specifically named, for which appropriation is made this year, that is not designated here in section 4.

Mr. MANN. But it is covered by the "Immigration Service at large." I found in preparing the language which went into the act creating the Department of Commerce and Labor things like these: Take, for instance, the Department of Commerce and Labor, and we passed a law creating that department. We refer to it in the appropriation bills as the Bureau of Labor. I think the chief of it calls himself the Chief of the Bureau of Labor. The act of Congress says the Department of Labor. I sent over in connection with that to the Bureau of Fisheries and asked by what authority they were using the title they were using over there? They could not give me any, although their office had two or three titles in different laws of Congress, and not one of them had the title which the bureau was using. When I prepared that bill I used all titles that affected everything, for the purpose of covering the whole subject.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman whether section 9, as drawn, proposes to give to the secretary of labor the right to enforce compulsory arbitration?

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think so. I do not think that section 9 gives the secretary of labor the authority to enforce anything. As I understand the situation, the so-called Erdman Act provided that the Commissioner of Labor and a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission might, under certain circumstances, use their offices to bring about the end of labor disputes. I believe it is fair to this bill to say that I think that board under the Erdman Act has never followed the act itself; that they have always offered their services voluntarily, as is proposed to be done by this bill, and they have sought to bring the parties together, having some authority to do something—not very much—but using that authority not to do the thing that was provided by law, but to excuse themselves from "butting in." Of course, ordinarily in a labor dispute there are a great many men who would like to rush in and help settle it. I sometimes notice that Members of Congress would be quite willing to get in and settle a labor dispute if they thought they could settle it, and sometimes they are listened to. I take it that that section of the bill is simply for the purpose of giving some one an excuse or authority to say to people, "We want to see if we can not get you together." Am I right?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. That is practically the purpose of that section of the bill. It does not give any authority further than authority to go to the different parties in the contention and endeavor to bring them together. That is all there is in that authority.

Mr. MANN. Of course, necessarily it goes beyond that before it has been working long. If we are to endeavor to settle the labor disputes—and everyone hopes that he can settle them, or prevent them—we will have, in the end, to confer some authority upon people to obtain information; and I quite agree with those people who believe in approaching that subject carefully and by degrees, not stepping beyond where one can plainly see the ground ahead of him. I have no objection to that provision of the bill, except that I think it would be desirable to have it apply only where there was a pretense that interstate commerce was affected.

Mr. Chairman, I had intended to call to the attention of the House more fully the history of the development of the Cabinet and the creation of the offices. I regret to say that the time has been running very rapidly, and I fear I will not have the time. I hold in my hand a book, which every Member of Congress ought to be required to read, entitled "The President's Cabinet," by Henry Barrett Larner; a recent publication which gives a history of the creation of the different departments. The author was kind enough—I am giving a compliment back—to refer in complimentary language to the Member now addressing you in connection with the creation of the Department of Commerce and Labor. [Applause.]

Mr. FOWLER. Is that the reason why every Member of Congress ought to be compelled to read that?

Mr. LONGWORTH. One of them.

Mr. MANN. I will excuse them from reading that part of it, because, like my colleague from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER], I am heard from often enough from the floor without its being required that I be read elsewhere. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one more minute remaining. The gentleman has had 59 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Then, I shall reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if we can not proceed with the reading of the bill now?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill can be read if no one desires to address the committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] if the terms of section 9 give the secretary of labor the power to appoint conciliators in labor disputes in cases not affected by interstate commerce?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it gives the secretary power to exercise his judgment in that respect whether the dispute affects interstate commerce or not. The matter is placed entirely in the hands of the secretary, to use his own judgment as to whether he shall attempt to act as mediator or not, or whether he shall appoint conciliators or not.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no power that can be given to any Federal officer, is there, that would give him jurisdiction over cases that were purely intrastate?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. So far as giving him power to compel any employer or any employee to accept his opinion or his decision or his viewpoint, no such power is given nor can be given.

Mr. MADDEN. Most of the States of the Union have labor commissioners and a labor board that do take up cases purely within the States, have they not?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Some of them have and some of them have not. This, however, does not compel the Secretary to interfere or to offer to act as mediator, but gives him that power, which he can exercise upon his own judgment. It gives him no power to enforce his opinion or decision.

Mr. MADDEN. Of course he could not compel either an employee or an employer to accept any suggestion that he might make?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. No. There is no power of that character conveyed.

Mr. MADDEN. There might be cases where a question of principle was involved, either on the side of labor or on the side of capital, and neither side would agree to yield as a matter of compulsory arbitration.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Under those circumstances they would be as free to act as they are now.

Mr. MADDEN. There is not anything, then, the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks, that would lead to any compulsory settlement of any labor dispute?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Nothing whatever. I may say to the gentleman, as I said in response to a similar question some time ago, that if it gave any power of compulsory arbitration I would be opposed to the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. I will say to the gentleman very frankly that if there is any such intention in the bill I would be opposed to granting any such power.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If there was any suspicion in my mind of such a proposition I would be opposed to it.

[Mr. FARR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the House at this late hour to discuss this bill in detail.

This is a bill of great importance, and, in my judgment, it should have been passed without unnecessary delay. One sometimes begins to surmise that there is some influence somewhere which undertakes to defeat measures of this kind, not by opposing them openly but by delay, which may result in their defeat. We had the spectacle here last Wednesday of my colleague [Mr. MANN], leader of the Republican side of the House, calling for a quorum and stopping action at that time. We had the same thing, I believe, during the special session, which would make it apparent to me that if it is not done for the purpose of defeating this bill, it is for the purpose of delay, to defeat some other labor measures that are on the calendar.

On this question of legislation for labor I can not harmonize myself with the idea that there is any distinction between the interest of labor and the interest of honest commercialism.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. There is a majority of 60 on the Democratic side. Something was said about a point of no quorum made a week ago; I am not sure by whom, probably by my colleague [Mr. MANN]. If there was no quorum, that was the fault of the majority. Does not my friend think that while important legislation like this is being considered, it is the privilege, if not the duty, of some Member of the House to insist upon a quorum being present?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I would say it is the duty of every Member to be present when important legislation is being considered.

Mr. FOWLER. There is always important legislation being considered.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I feel it my duty to be here all the time. I felt that when I accepted the responsibility of an election.

Mr. CANNON. Primarily the responsibility rests upon the majority of the House.

Mr. MANN. Of whom there are now 25 present. I will give them a roast in a moment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It would not be the first one the gentleman has given us.

Mr. MANN. No; nor the first one that was deserved.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I was going to say it was a matter of regret that the question of politics was brought up here, and that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HILL] began it by making a speech for campaign purposes, declaring himself in favor of this measure. Yet he and others who have been in control of this House through the Republican Party for the last 16 years have let this bill lie in the committee without any action at all, at least for the last 10 years. And while I believe that a great many members of the Republican minority are in favor of this bill, and are just as much in earnest in pushing labor legislation as I am, yet there seems to be a cause somewhere which indicates that they want to delay action on labor legislation.

I started to say that I can not harmonize myself with the views of those who make a distinction between the interests of labor and the interests of honest, legitimate business and commercialism of this country. Every interest is concerned in the welfare of labor. Anything that results to the benefit of labor must result to the benefit of the whole people and the business interests of this country. No distinction can be made with regard to these things. If we consider the conditions that exist not only in this country, but throughout the world, we must admit that if there ever was a time when sincere, earnest men, both in public and private life, began to see what is threatening this country, this is the time. We have now in Europe business tied up by strikes. We have strikes here and there in this country, which show the unrest that is existing among the working people.

Bureaus of this kind ought to be able to do something to eliminate whatever it is which is creating that unrest. Possibly if such a bureau had been in existence we would not have had the spectacle that we had here in the investigation of the Lawrence strike, a strike which occurred in one of the most highly protected industries that we have heard so much about, as to the protective tariff which protects labor. Probably a bureau of this kind would throw light on questions of this character and avoid these costly strikes, which cost everybody so much. It is not a question of labor alone. Suppose, for instance, the anthracite-coal strike could have been avoided through some instrumentality of this kind. What would have been the value in dollars and cents? If you do not want to look at the question from a humane point of view, take into consideration the loss of time to the strikers, the excessive prices of coal which the people of this country have had to pay as a consequence of that strike, as well as the prostration of business in other lines.

It is my opinion that it is very rare indeed that a strike affects only local conditions, because the business of this country has become very much concentrated. In the building industry contracting corporations are putting up buildings from one end of the country to the other, and in almost any line of industry you will find that similar conditions exist. Therefore, in my judgment, it is almost impossible for a strike to develop that does not concern the whole country, and certainly every strike goes very much further than the men who are immediately concerned in it. If it is true that strikes do affect the whole business interests of the country, then this question is one which affects all the people of the country, no matter whether they be in business or engaged in professions or are themselves working people. For that reason these subjects are of the most importance. The greatest problems to be solved in this country to-day are found in the industrial world, and if you will do something which will tend to stop these industrial wars, if you will do something to educate the employer and employee to understand that their interests lie together in so far as industrial peace is concerned, you will benefit the whole country. It has been said that labor creates capital, therefore why should labor and capital be antagonistic to each other? Is it not due to some misunderstanding? Is it not due to something wrong which affects the interests of this country? If that is true, is it not worth our while to provide by law for the investigation of these matters, to throw light on the question as to the proper way to settle these things, and maintain peace and prosperity in the industries of the country?

Now, I was interested in having this legislation expedited, for the reason that there are other measures on the calendar which I hope to reach. One is an industrial commission, an important measure from my point of view. Also the eight-hour a day for drudge workers, and a bill to protect the working people against the vicious features of the Taylor system. All these, it seems to me, are worthy of consideration. It seems to me the working masses of the country are worthy of consideration, and it seems to me that an important bill of this character, when there is no apparent opposition to it, ought to be passed without bringing in the arguments that have been brought in, which is evidence to my mind more for the purpose of delay than anything else. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say something on this bill. But first I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, my colleague from Chicago has undertaken to read me a lecture because I made a point of no quorum a year ago. It seems to me that my colleague has considerable nerve and gall. Here is a Democratic majority in the House with 60 majority, and 25 of them are here doing business. Twenty-five! They have the responsibility. There have been three bills, three laws, passed creating new departments of the Government in 114 years. The gentleman says that it involves grave responsibilities, and yet he wants to pass it with a Democratic membership in the House of 25—less than 10 per cent of the membership on the Democratic side of the House. If he wants to place the blame, let him blame his own side of the House. He has no right to criticize me because I asked that on an important measure the Democratic membership of the House attend to the duties for which they are elected and for which they are paid. I am doubly glad this day, on this occasion, to see that my colleague himself happens to be here.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I think when the RECORD is looked over that my attendance will be found to be about as good as that of my colleague. If it is not, I will answer to my constituents in regard to that. I do not have to answer to him. It is a fact that he created a filibuster during the special session for the purpose of delaying the investigation on one of the most vicious systems ever installed in this country. He did it, either consciously or unconsciously, for the purpose of assisting the big employers of this country.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the gentleman from Illinois going on. I have the floor, but I am willing to listen to him.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The statement of the gentleman from Illinois is erroneous. I helped to pass a bill providing for the appointment of a fair commission. The gentleman from Illinois did not desire a fair commission; he wanted a packed commission, of which he would be one of the leading lights.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] want time?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; I have time of my own; I reserved my time, and I am willing to give some to my colleague, if he wants it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I accept for a text the desire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] that capital and labor shall work together. I am glad such a thought emanated from such a man, because he is a spokesman for organized labor of the country. Labor and capital ought to work together. One of the great difficulties is that they too frequently misunderstand each other because of false teaching on both sides. There is no use to mince words about it. Labor is as easily misled as some manufacturers may be misled. Perhaps it is due to the fact that labor is not always able to see through unprejudiced glasses. There is not a man in this House, Democrat or Republican, that does not wish labor well; but what is the distinction between a laboring man and any other human being? We are all laborers. If we listen to the clarion notes that come so frequently from the other side of the House, we would believe that every one of the majority drawing salaries as Congressmen were laborers. They claim that right, and why not concede it to those who work on this side of the House? Why make this class distinction?

In the days when the gentleman from Illinois was active in the ranks of organized labor of this country, and when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] was delving in the mines, I was in close association with the labor interests of the United States, working with them hand and glove for seven years. I have studied these labor problems, and have wrought and worked with labor to see that its rights were maintained. I have never encouraged a labor leader to draw the line between himself and some one else.

Class distinction is made by those who preach it, not by those who work. The old soldiers of the war of 1861–1865 are not the men to wave the bloody shirt to-day. They are the men who greet each other with earnest and hearty handclasps, because they know now that there were brave men on either side; they are not doing the kicking about the North and the South. Some other men who shout so vociferously come from a younger generation. It is the younger generation that does not know the perils and privations through which the men of 1861–1865 labored and wrought. The men who preach discontent and dissatisfaction to-day, the men who are constantly harping on the "rights of labor," the men who are persistently preaching of the downtrodden, and who always have in their vision the "grinding corporations" are the men who do not remember the difficulties through which honest labor has passed, and they do not recall the days when labor went to the soup houses.

I want labor to have its rights, because I labor and I do not limit my labor by any eight-hour law. I concede eight hours to others, but work beyond that period of time myself, within my own right.

Mr. SULZER. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in favor of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am in favor of the bill as it should be amended; yes.

Mr. SULZER. If the gentleman desires to offer any amendments——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will when the time comes; the gentleman does not want to cut off debate now?

Mr. SULZER. I do not want to, but——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Illinois has just intimated that the majority vote is with the other side. Yesterday we were told we must act upon a bill limiting the powers of the courts to do justice as between man and man, within three hours. The other day we were told that we must vote upon a measure which determined the rights of workingmen before the courts within a limit of time.

If you want an excuse for cutting off debate upon a bill which creates new offices, which fixes places for men who are to be paid by the workmen of the country, and you want us to do all this in a few moments, without a full and frank discussion, I would like to know it.

I know it is easy for a man to stand in the calcium light of labor and keep constantly preaching the doctrine of labor and pleading its cause, but I notice the men who do that sometimes ride in automobiles and dine at great hotels, and that labor pays for it. There is no use mincing words when we are dealing with a subject that affects the rights of the workingmen. If $3 a day is not enough for workingmen, I am ready to vote him $4, $5, or $6, but I do not want you to be constantly preaching the rights of labor for political purposes nor to obtain partisan victory or advantage.

You are going to create a department of labor. Very well. As I said a moment ago, I am going to join with you if you do it right. If you are going to make this a general labor bill that will be in the interest of all the laboring men, the fellow who pays his dues into a union and who supports the leaders of labor as well as others—if you are going to make this bill in the interest of those who start out at 6 o'clock in the morning and quit at 5 or 6 at night, I am with you—but if you are going to pass a bill that means a sinecure for those who preach labor and do not practice it, then I am not with you on the passage of that kind of a bill. I will talk to the workmen on this line any time the question is raised. I am for labor, Mr. Chairman; I am for the real and genuine labor that works, not for the labor that talks and preaches and goes about upon the street corners ringing its sleeves in hypocritical agony. If you are going to do this for labor, to meet the demands and requirements of honest labor, very well. Then let us have that comity of interest that the gentleman from Illinois referred to a moment ago, when he said that capital and labor should walk hand in hand. That is good, Brother BUCHANAN, of Illinois. Let labor and capital walk hand in hand, and we will have a prosperous country, regardless of Democrats and Republicans.

And while you are creating a Department of Labor, you who have the power to do it and who do it now with a taunt on this side of the House that it has not been done before, let me ask you why, with this thought of capital and labor walking hand in hand, you destroyed the Bureau of Manufactures in the Department of Commerce and Labor when you considered your legislative, executive, and judicial bill two or three weeks ago? That bureau had a purpose. That bureau was to promote, foster, and develop the commerce and trade of the United States, to advance the industries of the United States. You never gave it a fair show, and the other day, in the interest of Democratic economy, you took it out of the Government and said it should not be. If capital and labor are to walk hand in hand, if you are to give an equal chance to the man who employs labor with the man who is employed, if you want him to prosper so that he may pay the better wage that labor demands and earns, then give him "a show for his white alley," too. Why take away the Bureau of Manufactures in the Department of Commerce and Labor that was created to promote, foster, and develop trade, that gives an opportunity for the employment of labor, and then come in and tell us that we were derelict in not providing for labor heretofore? You took away the volume of employment that it would give; you destroyed the influence by which it was proposed to build up the trade and commerce of the country and to give a fair chance to those who are employed to obtain a higher wage. I want a department of labor if it will be effective, but the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], whose long interest in the labor cause is well known by all of us, admitted frankly and squarely upon the floor of the House in the presentation of the bill that there was no power in it to enforce any measure the secretary of labor may recommend. And he said, more than that, that if it should be a question of forcing the employer and the employee to get together to dispense with these industrial troubles that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] so deplores, that he would then be against the bill itself. Well, if we can not have compulsory arbitration, and I am not advocating it, why can not we have a labor bill that means something in the settlement of labor controversies and in the adjustment of those questions which will lead to the goal suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, that labor and capital shall at last walk hand in hand. There is no purpose to the bill in any one of its paragraphs. It proposes simply to create a department of labor. For what purpose? The gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] says the purpose is written in every line of the bill. Will you show me the purpose indicated? Purpose No. 1 proposes the creation of a secretary of labor at $12,000 a year; purpose No. 2, the creation of the office of first assistant secretary of labor at $5,000 a year; purpose No. 3, the creation of the office of second assistant secretary of labor, at $5,000 a year; purpose No. 4, the creation of the office of third assistant secretary of labor, at $5,000 a year; purpose No. 5, the appointment of special agents to obtain information, and a solicitor general, at figures indicated in the bill. What is the purpose of the bill? Merely to create these offices? Is it merely to seek out men to occupy these places and to hold them down? Or is it to take hold of labor of the United States in an intelligent way and lead it onward and upward in the manner indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, who would have industrial peace and who would like capital and labor to walk hand in hand? When the proper time comes—and I am not going to talk any longer lest the charge be made that I am endeavoring to delay action on this bill—I shall introduce an amendment stating the purpose of the bill, and when the proper time comes again I shall offer another amendment inquiring why the Division of Information in the Department of Commerce and Labor, which proposes a distribution of the labor of the country, is omitted from the provisions of this bill. I want a labor bill that will be a labor bill that will be of advantage and benefit to the labor of the country. I want a bill that will mean that capital and labor shall walk hand in hand; that the industries of the country shall not be stricken down, but that they shall be encouraged and reared; that the actual wage earners, men and women, will be enabled to earn that stipend which is the reward of honest labor, and that, if possible, through a department like this intelligently directed.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will yield.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you know of anything that would more fittingly dignify labor than to create a department of labor?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman is seeking dignity for labor, I am inclined to think labor would reply it would rather see the wage. It has had enough dignity for a great many years.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman does not answer the question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the purpose of the department is stated, and that purpose is to intelligently protect the labor of the country in order that it may improve its condition and obtain a higher wage, I say, yes.

Mr. FOWLER. If you give it that prominence that this bill proposes to give it, do you not place it then on a nearer equality before the law than it ever has had before?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has not the gentleman been giving labor prominence enough for years? Have the gentleman and his party given even the postal clerks, who labor, the opportunity to obtain that higher wage which was promised in the post office and post roads bill? They held it off until next year. Why not give it now?

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman has criticized this bill in a way. I am putting a fair question to him. If we pass this bill creating a department of labor, will it not enable labor then to stand upon a higher plane before the law than ever before?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That will depend very largely upon whether or not those put in charge of the Labor Department are ornamental or useful.

Mr. FOWLER. Well, it is presumed that the officer will discharge the duties of the office, is it not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If he is properly directed by law.

Mr. FOWLER. Everything else being equal, then will it not give labor a better opportunity to maintain itself before the law than it ever has had heretofore?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Not as the law is written, because the law provides for nothing except that certain statistics shall be gathered, which are now gathered by the Bureau of Labor. The secretary has power to invite men to settle their troubles, but if they do not settle them, they can go on troubling themselves just the same.

Mr. FOWLER. Is not that connected with another department of the Government—with that of the Department of Commerce?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman can no more separate labor from commerce, and have one or the other——

Mr. FOWLER. You might just as well say you can not separate agriculture from commerce as to say you can not separate labor from commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Agriculture is labor. The Department of Agriculture is already provided for, to improve conditions among the farmers.

Mr. FOWLER. And for the same reason there ought to be a department of labor, in order to give labor that prominence to which it is justly entitled and of which it has been deprived in all the years of the history of America.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman read the bill after he finishes his address?

Mr. FOWLER. I have read the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell me what it proposes to do?

Mr. FOWLER. It proposes to give to labor that prominence it ought to have.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In what way?

Mr. FOWLER. By a department of the Government of the United States, and putting a secretary of labor in the Cabinet of the President of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. At how much per year?

Mr. FOWLER. It proposes then to give labor that opportunity of having a man at the head of labor to study the interests of labor of this country, and to seek out the best way to give labor an opportunity to be prosperous and happy and decent in this country.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No one disputes——

Mr. SULZER. Read!

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Just one moment. If you are going to do that, I will hold the floor. I do not propose to have "read" rung out on me when I am discussing the question with the gentleman from Illinois.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] waxes eloquent on this question. He is as friendly to the black man as he is to the white man; he is a friend of the farmer as well as of the man who works in the mill. But the gentleman from Illinois can not point out to this House wherein this bill indicates the duties that are assigned to the secretary of labor.

I should like also to know, so long as the gentleman from Illinois has raised the question, whether he means to stand upon the term "decency" that he applied a moment ago to one set of laborers as against others who honestly labor? The gentleman from Illinois is so busy that he does not take time to notice a question that may be vital to him in his own district. I assume that he has no desire to raise a question with regard to classes of labor that may be employed in the district in which he lives.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I said a moment ago that if this matter were to be rushed I would occupy all the time I am entitled to occupy. I now say voluntarily that I do not rise for the purpose of delaying the consideration of this bill. I want that to be understood, and I do not care to have suggestions made to the House that that was the purpose for which I rose. I desire to say that in my own right and of my own volition. I am now through until the time comes for offering amendments. I do not desire any more time, and I do not reserve any time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby created an executive department in the Government to be called the department of labor, with a secretary of labor, who shall be the head thereof and a member of the Cabinet, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and who shall receive a salary of $12,000 per annum, and whose tenure of office shall be like that of the heads of the other executive departments; and section 158 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended to include such department, and the provisions of title 4 of the Revised Statutes, including all amendments thereto, are hereby made applicable to said department; and the Department of Commerce and Labor shall hereafter be called the department of commerce, and the secretary thereof shall be called the secretary of commerce, and the act creating the said Department of Commerce and Labor is hereby amended accordingly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 7, after the word "accordingly," by adding the following: "The purpose of the department of labor shall be to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment speaks for itself. I do not desire to argue it or to occupy any time in discussing it. The purpose of this bill is not stated anywhere in the bill. I suggest the purpose, which is clearly to elevate and exalt labor.

I ask that this amendment be fairly considered by my friends on the other side. It gives an effective status to the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am willing to accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 7, by inserting after the amendment just adopted, as a new sentence, the following: "The said secretary shall cause a seal of office to be made for the said department of such device as the President shall approve, and judicial notice shall be taken of the said seal."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That there shall be in said department three assistant secretaries, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to wit:

A first assistant secretary, whose duty it shall be to supervise all matters within the department relating to labor engaged in manufacturing and the transportation industries.

A second assistant secretary, whose duties shall be to supervise all matters within the department relating to labor employed in mining, fisheries, and agricultural industries.

A third assistant secretary, whose duties shall be to supervise all matters within the department relating to labor engaged in building and the mercantile industries.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out section 2 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"That there shall be in said department an assistant secretary of labor, to be appointed by the President, who shall receive a salary of $5,000. He shall perform such duties as shall be prescribed by the secretary or required by law. There shall also be one chief clerk and a disbursing clerk, and such other clerical assistants, inspectors, and special agents as may from time to time be provided for by Congress. The Auditor for the State and Other Departments shall receive and examine all accounts of salaries and incidental expenses of the office of the secretary of labor, and of all bureaus and offices under his direction, and all accounts relative to all other business within the jurisdiction of the department of labor, and certify the balances arising thereon to the Division of Bookkeeping and Warrants, and send forthwith a copy of each certificate to the secretary of labor."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered is to take the place of both sections 2 and 3 of the bill, and in addition makes provision for auditing the accounts of the new department and certifying balances to the Treasury—a provision which is not now made in the bill and which is not now in any law.

It is necessary to provide in some way for the auditing of accounts. Various of the departments have auditors, but there is one general auditor called "the Auditor for the State and Other Departments," who audits the accounts of all the departments now except those few like the Treasury, War, and Post Office which have special auditors.

The amendment which I have offered provides for the appointment of an assistant secretary of labor, to be appointed by the President, in lieu of the three assistants provided by the bill, to be appointed by the President by and with the advice of the Senate.

The amendment which I offered carries the provision in section 3 as well, because they might as well all be in together, and it comes in harmoniously. I can see no justification for providing for three assistant secretaries of labor. The new department will be the smallest department in the Government at the outset. It will be less in size than the State Department is. It will not be one-tenth as large as the Treasury Department, and nothing like as large as the Agricultural Department, or the department of commerce, which will be less, so far as the duties are concerned.

If after its organization it is found necessary to have additional assistant secretaries, it will be time enough then to provide for them. There is no occasion for them, to begin with, in my judgment.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, there is need for these three assistant secretaries, particularly because of the work mapped out for the department in section 9 of the bill. However, I shall not seriously object to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illionis [Mr. MANN] because I realize that if the bill passes with one assistant secretary provided for, as the work of the department develops and it is seen that there is necessity for additional secretaries, they can be provided by Congress. So I have no desire to offer any serious opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. As I understood the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, it provided for the appointment of the assistant secretary without confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. That is the case now with the Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. COOPER. But the Secretary is appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Personally I prefer, and the committee prefer, this section of the bill in its present form; but I have no serious objection to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois what is the purpose of omitting from his amendment the provision that the appointment of the assistant secretary shall be with the advice and consent of the Senate?

Mr. MANN. I am frank to say that I think the Senate, through the confirmation of officers who are not constitutionally required to be confirmed by the Senate, has outgrown the power that it ought to have as compared with the House. When we passed the law providing for the Department of Commerce and Labor provision for confirmation of the assistant secretary by the Senate was left out. I think that the assistant secretaries of the various departments ought not to be political jobs.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman is undoubtedly right about that.

Mr. MANN. The head of the department is necessarily a political appointment, but the assistant secretary ought to be kept in his office regardless of the political inclinations of the administration. That can not be done as long as he is confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. In other words, when the President appoints a competent man to be assistant secretary his appointment will not have to go to the Senate and a question of political expediency be discussed by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. He ought to remain in the position.

Mr. RAKER. And take the oath of office and take hold of the business of that department. I am in favor of this bill. It should be passed by the House. The people generally for many years have desired this legislation. There is a general demand for it. The labor question is one of the great problems of the day. Labor and capital should walk hand in hand and work together. Both should be given fair and equal treatment. This will give labor an equal chance. Place it on a high basis, where it should be put. It will have a Cabinet officer at the councils at the White House with the other great Cabinet departments.

The Democratic platform of 1908 declares:

> That we pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law creating a department of labor, represented by a secretary in the President's Cabinet.

Again, the late Democratic convention held at Baltimore on June 20, 1912, in its platform declares:

> We pledge the Democratic Party to the enactment of a law creating a department of labor, represented separately in the President's Cabinet, in which department shall be included the subject of mines and mining.

These pledges should be carried out. Now is the time to do it. It will be done.

Mr. COOPER. I should like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if he thinks the secretary himself ought to be a political appointment.

Mr. MANN. It is inevitable that the head of the department shall be a political appointee. When the President selects his official household the selection is political.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman think the Postmaster General ought to be a political appointment?

Mr. MANN. I think the Postmaster General ought to be a political appointment. I agree with the gentleman that there ought to be some officer in the Post Office Department who would remain permanently in charge in the main of the conduct of the business, who should not be a political appointment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I know that there is a general idea that the Postmaster General or any other Cabinet officer ought to be a political appointee. I have labored under that impression, and when I was trying to devise some bill that I thought would take the Post Office Department, for instance, out of politics, I came up against that very proposition. Everybody seems to say, "Oh, a member of the Cabinet ought to be a political appointee." I myself do not see why. I have never been able to see why the Postmaster General, for instance, or this secretary mentioned here——

Mr. FOWLER. Or the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. NORRIS (continuing). Or the Secretary of Agriculture, should be a political appointee. If I had my way, I would still further change the bill, and I would change the law controlling the Post Office Department particularly, so that the Cabinet officers in those instances would not be political appointees. So far as I have been able to determine, there is no legal definition or authorization of the Cabinet. It has grown up without any law. Its members are called the President's advisers, and we in this bill follow along in the same old rut and provide that this new member of the Cabinet shall be a political appointee, when his duties are nonpolitical and ought to be absolutely divorced from politics. It is the same with the Postmaster General. The President does not need to take political advice from a member of his Cabinet if he does not desire to do so. There is no law that makes a member of the Cabinet the President's political adviser. When the country reaches the point where the people fully realize that we should take some of these departments out of politics and make them business corporations or institutions, they will do it by taking the head of the department out of politics. I wish that the Postmaster General could be appointed for a term of 10 years, so that his term would not expire with that of the President, so that he would be divorced entirely from partisan politics and partisan considerations, and would devote his attention and ability to the management of the great Post Office Department, which comes to the homes and firesides of all the people of this land. It ought to be a great business institution, operated entirely and solely upon business principles and business considerations, instead of being, as it is and always has been, the greatest political machine on earth.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the gentleman a question. In this bill you have a chance to bring about and consummate the very purpose you have in mind by striking out the provisions in section 1 of the bill, in lines 6 and 7, and providing that the President shall appoint the Secretary of Commerce and Labor without the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I am in favor of it.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion? Under the Constitution the heads of the departments must be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska was making a presentation of the matter, and I made that suggestion to him.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The Constitution provides that the official—I can not quote the exact language, but I looked it up—that the public officials of the United States must be appointed by the President and that the Congress has the power to designate that these officials can be appointed by the heads of departments. I think, technically speaking, the head of a department, which would be a Cabinet officer, must be confirmed by the Senate under the Constitution. But because they must be confirmed under the Constitution is no more reason why they should not be taken out of politics than it would be with reference to the Supreme Court judge, who must be confirmed by the Senate, and he is understood to be and ought to be and is outside of partisan politics.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Nebraska permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not the floor. The gentleman from California has the floor.

Mr. RAKER. I will yield.

Mr. MADDEN. In order to do what the gentleman from Nebraska suggests, would not you have to take the President and the Senate out of politics?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not. The members of the United States courts are not in politics, and yet the Senate confirms them. The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission are confirmed by the Senate. They are not in politics; they do not represent a political machine. But if you would make the term of office of a Cabinet officer, like the Postmaster General or this officer that you are providing for here, make their term of office 10 years, not to be removed until the expiration of that time except for cause, you would take him out of politics. I think the Senate is patriotic enough so that it would have no disposition to put it back into politics. I do not think the fact that the Senate having the confirmation has anything to do with its being politics.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with what has been said by the gentleman from Nebraska, it is interesting to recall that the Post Office Department was not made an executive department of the Government until 1872, and that the Postmaster General, or official in charge of the Post Office, was not called into the Cabinet until, I think, 1827 or 1829, by President Jackson. I do not understand how it is possible to have the President's advisers, called around the Cabinet table to determine political policies of the administration, nonpolitical.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the gentleman will permit a suggestion, I think it will answer his question. Take the Postmaster General, for instance. I suppose his particular duty is to advise the President in regard to the Post Office Department, its doings and operations, but he does not have to be a politician.

Mr. MANN. No; but I take it the Cabinet as a cabinet goes beyond the advice concerning the particular duties of the department.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no law for that.

Mr. MANN. There is no law for it. From the start, when Washington first asked that matters should be submitted in his absence to the Secretary of State, Secretary of War, and the Secretary of the Treasury—he did not include the Attorney General—up to the present time, the Cabinet, while it is extra legal as far as statute law is concerned and is only recognized in one law, has been considered as the political advisers of the President as well as his business advisers.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. If Washington considered the Cabinet position purely political, how did he happen to take Hamilton and Jefferson into the Cabinet at one and the same time?

Mr. MANN. I did not say he considered them as purely political offices.

Mr. CONNELL. And why did Cleveland take Gresham into his Cabinet?

Mr. NORRIS. My own theory and my idea is that the President ought to be perfectly free to secure his political advisers anywhere, and there is no intention of circumventing him by any law or rule to get his advisers wherever he may seek them.

But the country's interests, for instance, in the Post Office Department, is to have an efficient service, and it ought to have the best possible service, and if to do that it is necessary to deprive the President—which I do not think would necessarily follow—of a political adviser, it certainly would not interfere with the President's political plans if he did not want to have a Postmaster General advise him, for he could go outside of the Post Office Department and would not be required to ask the Postmaster General for political advice.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Nebraska and myself in the main agree. It is not necessary for the President to ask advice of these gentlemen. I do not know what the effect would be, although it would be a refreshing change, if any President would really make his Cabinet of political advisers and select men who were competent to give political advice and then would follow it. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, not, perhaps, to say anything of importance on the bill, but I am moved to submit an observation or two.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Make it two.

Mr. CANNON. Perhaps I will make it three if I have time. There are governments and governments. Ours is a government by the people, or, as some express it, the plain people, and I can prove it by two or three candidates for the Presidency. [Laughter.] We are all tolerably plain. Lincoln said he thought God must have loved the plain people, because he made so many of us. This is a government by majorities. Sovereignty rests in each citizen, but they can not all have their way all the time touching the policy under which the Government shall be conducted. Therefore, we have got to have the election, and the majority says what the policy shall be.

Now, I am quite willing to say as to the mere clerical positions, where the policies of the Government are not affected, I see no necessity for their being politicians. For instance, clerks in the departments, clerks in the post offices, although they might be an asset for activity under conditions just before and at the elections. But when a majority is chargeable it ought to have full power with the responsibility.

The President ought to call about him in his Cabinet men in sympathy with the policies of the majority that made the President, because they helped to establish the policy. Well, you may say the Cabinet need not take an interest in politics. Well, I fancy they should. Even if the President were elected for six years and had Cabinet officers for six years, he would be responsible and they would be responsible with him and ought to be in sympathy with him and the majority that made them. Oh, gentlemen have said about the judges of the Supreme Court and the inferior Federal judges that they constitute a coordinate branch of the Government without being politicians. That is true, but the judges have a life tenure or during good behavior, and the Federal judiciary do not participate in partisan contests.

The President and the Congress are chosen by a majority of the people and should, by administration and legislation in conformity with the policy of the party majority which elected them, perform their function, at the same time preserving all the constitutional and legal rights of all the people. Now, there is one way we could keep the President and the Cabinet officials—and for that matter all legislative officials—out of partisan contests, and that is to select them for life or during good behavior.

That would take them out of politics, and yet you and myself and the people would not assent to it, because from time to time the people become dissatisfied with the policies of one party and try another, and some people desire a change without good reason therefor. Why, the lifetime of a generation is only 36 years. The men who voted in 1896, more than half of them, are dead, and the 5-year-old boys then, from that up to 21, will control the policy of the country for the next four years when they vote in November next. Some of them do not know whether the policies of this party or that party are correct, and it is possible that they will not know until they run up against the buzz saw and get information through experience.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I guess we had better go along and keep house in the same old place and in the same old way, and if you Democrats come into power, if I may be indulged for just one sentence more, in November next, I want you to come into full power [applause on the Democratic side], and then quit playing to the galleries, because with full power there will be full responsibility, and if you do not do well the people will turn you out under the leadership of that Republican Party, as they did in 1896. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. It is a very interesting study to see the various attitudes assumed by gentlemen who believe in one case that we ought not to have any politics mixed with the Government and in the other case that it ought to be all politics. Just now most of the Democrats believe that we ought not to have any politics, and some Republicans agree with them; but I notice when the Democrats reported the legislative bill they provided that all clerks in the departments should go out of politics, or go into politics, because they did not want them to hold office for longer than five years, and that is intended, of course, not to have them out of politics, but to put them into politics. Is that not true? The Republicans have been getting so virtuous on the question of politics lately that if anybody in the party talks about politics he is subject to ostracism, and the Democrats have been preaching the doctrine of political interference in governmental affairs for the last 20 years, and just as soon as they begin to smell an opportunity to get into power they support a bill to put everybody who is in office out of office so that they can reappoint fellows who will go into politics and keep the Democrats in power the rest of their natural lives. [Applause on the Republican side.] We think we ought not to appoint a Postmaster General or a Secretary of the Department of Commerce and Labor who has ever smelled politics anywhere. We think the President of the United States ought not to mix in politics. A good many people believe he has not mixed much in it in the last three or four years. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] And they say that a Cabinet officer, the President's political adviser—if I were President I would appoint some one who knew how to advise me politically. Why, the people of the United States are all in politics. It is one of the greatest honors that a man can have conferred upon him to be recognized as a politician, and it should be. What is a politician and what is politics? Is it not a question of policy? We are all interested in the Government, the Government is ours, and we are the Government, and we ought to put men into office who know something about politics or the policies of the people and who agree with the policies of the people, and I believe that every man below the real managing man in the various departments ought to be out of politics, but that every man who is appointed to that great place and who has the direction of the department over which he is appointed ought not only to know politics, but to engage, to indulge in it, and possibly advise the man who is at the head of the Nation about the politics and policies he ought to pursue.

I get very tired of listening to these Democratic reformers prating on keeping out of politics and then witnessing the spectacle of their reporting bills to put every present incumbent out of office when they think they are going to get in. If they get in after next November, watch them. There will be no apology for politics; every fellow who does not smell like a Democrat will go out of office. I am in favor of their throwing the Republicans out because it makes them better Republicans. I am not in favor of keeping Republicans under a Democratic administration, but I believe in going out on the street and carrying the banner of Republicanism to the people everywhere and showing the iniquity of the Democratic Party wherever they have control of things. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the salary of each of the assistant secretaries of labor shall be $5,000 per annum, and that there shall be one chief clerk, a disbursing clerk, and such other clerical assistants as may be from time to time authorized by Congress, and such number of inspectors and special agents as may be provided for by Congress.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, as the subject matter of this section is covered by the amendment just adopted, I move to strike out the entire section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, by striking out all of section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the following-named offices, bureaus, divisions, and branches of the public service now and heretofore under the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and all that pertains to the same, known as the Commissioner General of Immigration, the Commissioners of Immigration, the Bureau of Immigration and the Immigration Service at Large, the Bureau of Labor, and the Commissioner of Labor, be, and the same hereby are, transferred from the Department of Commerce and Labor to the Department of Labor, and the same shall hereafter remain under the jurisdiction and supervision of the last-named department. The Bureau of Labor shall hereafter be known as the bureau of labor statistics, and the Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor shall hereafter be known as the commissioner of labor statistics; and al the powers and duties heretofore possessed by the Commissioner of Labor shall be retained and exercised by the commissioner of labor statistics.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 6, after the words "Bureau of Immigration," by adding "the division of information."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] will accept that amendment, because it does his bill no harm, unless there is some reason for leaving this division out.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. So far as the committee is concerned they supposed and believed they were taking over to the Bureau of Labor all of the Immigration Service, and so far as I know there is no law creating the division the gentleman has reference to. If the adoption of the amendment gives a legal status to that division which it does not now have, then there might be some doubt as to whether it ought to be accepted or not. If it does not give any more legal status to it than it has now, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think there will be no harm done. That is a division that was created, by the way, since the Immigration Service was covered into the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the bureau of labor statistics, under the direction of the secretary of labor, shall collect, collate, and report at least once each year, or oftener if necessary, full and complete statistics of the conditions of labor and the products and distribution of the products of the same in each of the different industries herein mentioned, and to this end said secretary shall have power to employ any or either of the bureaus provided for his department and to rearrange such statistical work and to distribute or consolidate the same as may be deemed desirable in the public interests; and said Secretary shall also have authority to call upon other departments of the Government for statistical data and results obtained by them; and said secretary of labor may collate, arrange, and publish such statistical information so obtained in such manner as to him may seem wise.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend, page 3, line 21, by striking out the word "one" and insert in lieu thereof the word "once."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether this contemplates that the bureau of labor statistics shall collect the same information which is collected by the Bureau of the Census?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I did not quite catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. MANN. This section requires the commissioner of labor to collect at least once a year—full and complete statistics of the conditions of labor and the products and distribution of the products of the same in each of the different industries herein mentioned.

I do not know whether any industries are mentioned herein or not. Does this contemplate that the Commissioner of Labor is to collect industrial and labor statistics every year, some of which, at least, are collected twice every 10 years by the Census Bureau? I take it that there was no intention, in the first place, of having a duplication of work?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is no desire for that kind of duplication.

Mr. MANN. I call it to the gentleman's attention, because I believe that under the language of this bill it necessarily requires a duplication of work. Certainly the Bureau of Labor ought to be permitted to obtain from the Census Bureau any information that it can without being required to collect it originally itself. I simply make the suggestion to the gentleman for further consideration in the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The power is granted to the secretary to call upon other departments for such information and statistics as they may have in their possession in order to accomplish this purpose.

Mr. MANN. I know; but this section requires the Commissioner of Labor to collect labor statistics.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It does not say where he shall collect them, but it states he may collect them from the other departments.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Before I ask the question, I want to make a statement as to what experience I have had in this matter. There is the Bureau of Statistics, statistics gathered by the State Department, statistics gathered in the Agricultural Department. I do not know, and I doubt whether or no the majority of the Members of this House, if they start out to get full information, will know where they can go to get it. But when they get it they will find much duplication.

I believe that if intelligently administered and organized, the employees in the department being efficient, they might well be diminished by one-third. I do not say they will be, and I do not know exactly who can intelligently organize them. But I have read the bill, and I have had a fear that if the employees of this department gathered their information from the other departments, and the other departments, including the Census, published that information we would have other publications duplicating again that which had already been duplicated in some instances before.

Take, for example, the Statistical Abstract, which is of as much use to me perhaps as any other publication. Every once in a while I am jerked up by somebody asking, "Where is your authority?" I answer, "The Statistical Abstract." Then the question arises, "Where is its authority?" Then I have to go wandering about to find out.

I am not antagonizing the bill or seeking to embarrass the gentleman, but am speaking in good faith and suggesting to the gentleman if it may not be well enough to wipe out that matter.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, I may say that the committee took into consideration that very phase of the subject, As the bill originally came to the committee what is now section 11 was not in the bill. There was a disposition to add onto the bill certain bureaus and divisions, and so on, which would have made the department very much larger than is proposed by this bill. Now, the committee came to the conclusion that it was a very difficult matter to build up a department under existing circumstances without more or less of duplication, and so they proposed to transfer to this department existing bureaus, with practically the same rights and powers and privileges that those bureaus now have, and then provide:

That the secretary of labor shall investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities, duties, and powers of the office of the secretary of labor with the activities, duties, and powers of the present bureaus, commissions, and departments, so far as they relate to labor and its conditions, in order to harmonize and unify such activities, duties, and powers, with a view to further legislation to further define the duties and powers of such department of labor.

That language was placed there for the purpose of avoiding, so far as possible, that duplication.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, I should think that provision is a wise one; but when I say that, I want to call attention to the fact that, according to my observation, when you once get work started "all the king's horses and all the king's men" can not stop it and get rid of it. It is easy to create places and beget duplication and difficult to get rid of them.

If you call this man "commissioner of statistics"—if that be his title—he has got something to do, and he becomes active. My experience, after 25 years' service upon the Committee on Appropriations, a portion of that time when that committee had all the money bills except the river and harbor bill has been that you do not get rid of offices when you once create them.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] will be considered withdrawn.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois and adopted as a substitute to section 2, that section being stricken out, enumerated the different industries which are mentioned in section 2. If that did not reenumerate the different industries, then I call attention to line 24, on page 3, wherein it is required that complete statistics of the different industries therein mentioned shall be compiled. If section 2 be stricken out, where is there any enumeration of industries?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. There is not now in the bill.

Mr. COOPER. Then the words "different industries" should be stricken out, and there should be inserted after the words "of the" as they appear in line 24, "products," and so forth, "of the manufacturing, transportation, mining, fisheries, agriculture, building, and mercantile industries."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct in his criticism.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the gathering of statistics relating to the mining industries is now committed to the Bureau of Mines and Mining. The gathering of information relating to the fisheries industries is now committed to the Bureau of Fisheries. The gathering of statistics relating to the agricultural industries is now committed to the Department of Agriculture. The gathering of statistics relating to the transportation industries is now committed to the Interstate Commerce Commission. All of these bureaus or departments of the Government collect complete statistics relating to the industries.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The Bureau of Labor to-day is more of a statistical bureau than anything else.

Mr. MANN. As to labor.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. As to labor.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry whether the bureaus as now constituted in other departments of the Government are required to give complete statistics of the conditions of labor?

Mr. MANN. No; I think not.

Mr. COOPER. This requires "of the conditions of labor." That is a very important thing.

Mr. MANN. I did not think that the words "the different industries herein mentioned" were a limitation.

Mr. COOPER. The conditions of labor in different industries.

Mr. KENDALL. With relation to the distribution of the products of labor.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend, page 3, line 23, by striking out after the word "same" the words "in each of the different industries herein mentioned."

Mr. MANN. That will cover it.

Mr. KENDALL. Without any insertion.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 3, line 23, by striking out after the word "same" the words "in each of the different industries herein mentioned."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That there shall be a solicitor of the Department of Justice for the department of labor, whose salary shall be $5,000 per annum.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the chairman of the committee compared this salary of $5,000 with the salaries of the solicitors in other departments?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. It is the same as the salaries of solicitors in other departments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the Solicitor of the Navy Department receive $5,000?

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I could not say offhand. I know at the time the matter was under consideration this salary was compared with the others.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am under the impression that it is higher than is paid in other departments.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I think not. There was no intention of doing so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman feels sure he has not raised the amount, I shall not offer an amendment.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I am satisfied it is the same as that provided for other solicitors.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Very well.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That the secretary of labor shall have power to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes whenever in his judgment the interests of industrial peace may require it to be done; and that all power and authority heretofore possessed or exercised by the head of any executive department over any bureau, office, branch, or division of the public service by this act transferred to the department of labor, or any business arising therefrom or pertaining thereto, whether of appellate or revisory character or otherwise, shall hereafter be vested in and exercised by the head of the said department of labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 5, line 25, by inserting after the word "done" the following:

"And the secretary of labor, or through him the mediators or commissioners of conciliation appointed by him, shall report to the President their findings, with conclusions and recommendations thereon."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe this interferes with what is in the mind of the chairman of the committee. He has indicated a number of times in reply to questions that he does not stand for compulsory arbitration and that he will not do so; but there is no good effect to be derived from this paragraph, no benefit to capital or labor, unless some such amendment as this is made.

You have not even instructed the secretary or any one of the mediators or conciliators for whom you provide, to report any finding whatever. I am not asking in this amendment that you even give the secretary power to enforce any judgment that may be arrived at, but I do believe that if we bear the expense of a great department like this and of the machinery that will be attached to it, that the common people, the public, the wage earners all over the land, should know the result of the investigation that may be undertaken. As this paragraph stands, it provides:

SEC. 9. That the secretary of labor shall have power to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes whenever in his judgment the interests of industrial peace may require it to be done.

Not a word more, not another thing, no information to the public as to the result of the investigation or the conclusion. The secretary of the department may spend weeks in an endeavor to settle a dispute arising in Chicago; his mediators may go to Boston or Philadelphia and investigate for weeks and months, and that is the end of it; you have no condition that they shall report even to the secretary. Why not let the public know? If you do not care to enforce the decree, why not let us know what the conclusion of the investigators may be? Why not let the public know what they did? We have paid them for that purpose.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. Under this provision of the bill, does not the gentleman think the commissioners appointed by the head of the department would naturally make a report to him?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is not an obligation in this paragraph, or in this bill, upon the part of the secretary or anyone appointed by him to tell the public anything about what they do.

Mr. FOSTER. You do not do that when you report to the President, do you?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; it becomes public information.

Mr. FOSTER. Not all the reports made to the President are public property.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If trouble arises and the secretary appoints conciliators to go and settle the dispute, which will be of advantage to all the people, we ought to know about it. Take such a trouble as occurred at Lawrence.

Mr. FOSTER. Have not they made that report?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not recall.

Mr. FOSTER. I think they have, and it is in the hands of the printer and will be out soon as a Senate document.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If they have done it in the Lawrence case, it is under some existing law. This law which takes over all this business makes no provision for report or publication, and leaves the public in the dark as to what these men do. I am not asking the committee to go to the length that I thought perhaps we might go to enforce a decree.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON. I did not want to ask the gentleman a question; I wanted to speak in my own time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then I will continue my statement. Here is the Congress of the United States providing for a new department which gives recognition to a vast body of the people at the Cabinet table of the Nation. We are appointing a secretary, at a large salary, and an assistant secretary, giving them authority to appoint investigators to attempt to settle labor disputes, to attempt to conciliate those who are at variance in industrial circles.

Yet we are attaching no string to them whatever. We are telling them to go ahead, if there is an outbreak, if there is an industrial disturbance, and do what they can to settle it; but they need not tell us anything about it. How is Congress to know what effect the work of the department of labor is having? How is the public to know whether it is a good thing or a bad thing? The secretary is to have the power to appoint, ad libitum, inspectors, investigators, mediators, conciliators; pay them whatever wage he sees fit; keep them employed as long as he desires; and then convey no word to Congress or to the people. It seems to me that if you were not desirous of hiding the conclusions of the men who undertake to do this work for the Government, if you desire that some good shall result from the department you undertake to create, you will at least let the public know what the judgment of the Secretary is in regard to the merits of the controversy, and let the public know what the mediators find as the result of their investigation; that you will at least give an opportunity to the public to understand whether the money spent in this manner was properly spent. How do we know how long the men were employed in efforts at conciliation or mediation? How do we know with whom they have dealt, whether they have treated with only one side or with both sides? Give us a chance to learn what they have done. Let their findings see the bright daylight. It seems to me there can be no objection to a provision of this kind. I am not trespassing on the precincts which the chairman of the committee seems to regard as sacred. I have attempted to bring back to the people who created the office the right to know what their servants have done and the right to understand what conclusions they have reached.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] apparently has an entirely wrong conception of what is sought to be accomplished by section 9 of this bill. It does not propose to give to the secretary of the department of labor any power to arrive at any conclusion of any kind whatever concerning a trade dispute. It does not give to him or to the conciliators any power to arrive at any conclusion or any determination of the facts in the case, and thus it seems to me to be useless to provide that the secretary shall make a report on conclusions that he is not authorized to make to the President of the United States.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman embodies the distinctive difference that there is between the power conveyed by this bill and the power as proposed in the Townsend bill and gives to the secretary of labor the power that he should not have—the power to organize, direct, and concentrate public opinion so as to compel the employer to give conditions he does not want to give or the employee to accept conditions he does not want to accept. Both of them are wrong and should never be incorporated in the laws of the United States. I ask for a vote.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 6, noes 62.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 5 by striking out all of section 9, after the word "done," in line 25, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"And all duties performed and all power and authority now possessed and exercised by the head of any executive department in and over any bureau, office, officer, board, branch, or division of the public service by this act transferred to the department of labor, or any business arising therefrom or pertaining thereto, or in relation to the duties performed by and authority conferred by law upon such bureau officer, office, board, branch, or division of the public service, whether of an appellate or revisory character or otherwise, shall hereafter be vested in and exercised by the head of the said department of labor."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered does not, in fact, strike out any provision that is in the bill. The language as it now reads is, "and that all power and authority heretofore possessed and exercised," and so forth, and the amendment I have offered reads, "and all duties performed and all power and authority now possessed or exercised." Of course it might not very well be heretofore exercised, because that might have been changed since, but my amendment adds the words "duties performed" and adds "officer" and "board." When we created the Department of Commerce and Labor, and there was a transfer from other departments to that department, the amendment which I have now offered was agreed to in reference to that. It was very carefully examined and approved by the Comptroller of the Treasury, who has to pass upon accounts, and is more complete in language and more certain to be fully effective than the language included in the bill.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment presented by the gentleman from Illinois; but, so far as I am able to discern, it is simply a case of tweedle dum and tweedle dee. There is not a snap of a finger's difference——

Mr. MANN. There is no difference in the intention, but it is quite a difference when the matter comes to be construed by a court.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I have no objection to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the secretary of labor shall investigate and report to Congress a plan of coordination of the activities, duties, and powers of the office of the secretary of labor with the activities, duties, and powers of the present bureaus, commissions, and departments, so far as they relate to labor and its conditions, in order to harmonize and unify such activities, duties, and powers, with a view to further legislation to further define the duties and powers of such department of labor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, after line 23, insert as new sections:

SECTION —. That a commission is hereby created to be called the commission on industrial relations. Said commission shall be composed of nine persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States, not less than two of whom shall be employers of labor and not less than two of whom shall be representatives of organized labor. The Department of Commerce and Labor is authorized to cooperate with said commission in any manner and to whatever extent the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may approve.

SEC. —. That the members of this commission shall be paid actual traveling and other necessary expenses and in addition a compensation of $10 per diem while actually engaged on the work of the commission and while going to or returning from such work. The commission is authorized as a whole, or by subcommittees of the commission, duly appointed, to hold sittings and public hearings anywhere in the United States, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses and to compel testimony, and to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which such commission is created, and to authorize its members or its employees to travel in or outside the United States on the business of the commission.

SEC. —. That said commission may report to the Congress its findings and recommendations from time to time, and shall make a final report not later than three years after the date of the approval of this act, at which time the term of this commission shall expire, unless it shall previously have made final report, and in the latter case the term of the commission shall expire with the making of its final report; and the commission shall make at least one report to the Congress within the first year of its appointment and a second report within the second year of its appointment.

SEC. —. That the commission shall inquire into the general condition of labor, especially in the principal industries of the United States, and especially in those which are carried on in corporate forms; into existing relations between employers and employees; into the effect of industrial conditions on public welfare and into the rights and powers of the community to deal therewith; into the growth of associations of employers and of wage earners and the effect of such associations upon the relations between employers and employees; into the extent and results of methods of collective bargaining; into any methods which have been tried in any State or in foreign countries for maintaining mutually satisfactory relations between employees and employers; into methods for avoiding or adjusting labor disputes through peaceful and conciliatory mediation and negotiations; and into the scope, and methods and resources of existing bureaus of labor and into possible ways of increasing their usefulness. The commission shall seek to discover and to point out the underlying causes of dissatisfaction in the industrial situation.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am willing to be heard on the point of order, Mr. Chairman. This bill creates a department of labor, throws open everything which can go in it into a department of labor. I have offered an amendment to cooperate with the Department of Labor in collecting information and a report to Congress, and I do not think that the gentleman desires to make the point of order when he understands what the amendment is.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I understand what the amendment is. The amendment is the industrial commission bill as reported from the Committee on Labor, with the exception of the last section of that bill as reported. That is what the measure is, and if included in this bill it would simply load down the bill with the impossibility of either becoming a law. I do not think I would raise the point of order but for the fact that if we include it in this bill it simply means the death of both of these bills, and I have no desire to have that brought about.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it means the death of either one, and the gentleman has no cause for stating that where he expects to pass two bills separately he can not pass the two bills together. That is queer reasoning to me. The gentleman expects that this bill will become a law. He wants the other bill to become a law. Complaint was made here to-day that the other bill could not be called up.

Now, I have offered the provisions of the other bill as an amendment to this bill. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON] wants to take the responsibility of killing the bill, that is his responsibility and he has the right to assume it, and I know he is not afraid of assuming any responsibility which comes upon him; but it will be his responsibility. I do not think, however, that the amendment is subject to a point of order. In creating a new department of the Government we have a right to put in anything that belongs in that department, and make any amendment which can in any way relate to labor. I have offered an amendment providing for a temporary industrial commission to cooperate with the new department of labor in obtaining information and for the purpose of making recommendations to the President and to Congress for future legislation. Now, is that not germane to a bill to create a department of labor, just as much germane as the Bureau of Labor Statistics is germane, and much more germane to the bill than the Immigration Service is germane? The commission proposes to deal directly with the same question of conciliation in labor disputes that is dealt with by section 9 of the original bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the point of order made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILSON], and I agree with him that both of these bills are of too much importance to jeopardize either of them by attempting to combine the two in one bill. It seems to me that the bill which is offered as an amendment to this bill is not germane to the subject matter of the bill.

The primary purpose of the bill that is pending before the House is to create a department of labor. It is the organization of a new and great department. The bill that is offered as an amendment is to create a temporary commission that deals with the investigations of certain subjects, some of which are germane to a department of labor, but many of which have no relevancy to this bill whatever. It is to go into the broad question of the cost of living, and that investigation will probably be germane in some of its particulars to every department of this Government. Could the Chair hold that on an appropriation bill that was making appropriations for the Department of Commerce and Labor that that amendment would be in order because some of the provisions in it related to the Department of Commerce and Labor? It is true that there are provisions in there that might relate and correlate to this bill, but there are many provisions that do not. This bill is intended solely for the purpose of creating an executive department of the Government. The purpose of that bill is an industrial investigation, and it seems to me clearly one is not germane to the other.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has had but little opportunity to investigate this matter and has no precedent at all, but the Chair is of the opinion that this bill offered as an amendment by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], while upon the same subject, is an independent bill, for a different purpose, and some of its provisions are inconsistent with the purposes of the original bill. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the appeal do lie on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard. The bill expressly provides——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, is my motion in order?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an appeal pending now from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the motion is not allowable in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, section 9 of the bill provides that the secretary of labor shall have power to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes whenever, in his judgment, the interests of industrial peace may require it to be done; and the provisions of the amendment which I have offered authorizes a commission to inquire into the existing relations between employers and employees, into the effect of industrial conditions on public welfare and the rights and powers of the communities, and so forth, exactly in line with the purpose of the bill in section 9 and certainly germane to a bill creating a department of labor. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania had offered the amendment as a committee amendment, the Chair would have overruled a point of order made by me that it was not germane.

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. HOBSON. I make the point of order to the statement that the Chair would rule differently as between two different Members.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is an undue reflection upon the Chair. The gentleman, however, will proceed.

Mr. MANN. The Chair knows perfectly well that I was making no reflection upon the Chair. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has a peculiar cast of mind, and that is sufficient. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman please repeat that? I did not catch it.

Mr. MANN. I said the gentleman had a peculiar cast of mind.

Mr. HOBSON. Oh! [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Now, I maintain that if the Chair had held that a committee amendment offered in precisely the same language that I have offered in this was in order, he would have been right. I think the Chair, suddenly called upon to rule upon an amendment of this sort, has been misled in his belief that the amendment is not germane. Any amendment which relates to the subject of labor is germane to a bill to create a department of labor, and any amendment which proposes a new form of activity on the part of the Government relating to labor is germane to a bill creating a department of labor.

No one would claim that if I had proposed an amendment to create a new bureau to deal with labor in some way it would not have been germane. I insist that the amendment which I have offered is germane, and I offered it because—it seeming to have met in words the approval of both sides of the House heretofore—I wanted to give an opportunity to the House really to act upon the amendment, and if that side of the House is sincere—which I doubt—in its advocacy of the measure, it will take a chance to hold it in order and vote it into the bill. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. With high respect for the Chair, I agree with my colleague [Mr. MANN] that, as he stated, the Chair ruled hastily. My recollection is, touching the germaneness of an amendment, that the wisdom or unwisdom of the amendment does not determine, if it be touching the same or a similar matter. The province of the Chair is—whether the amendment is wise or unwise—to let the House dispose of it. To my mind, my colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is right in his contention.

I did not address myself to the point of order because it seemed to me so patent that it was in order that I did not think it was worth while. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "ayes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 70, noes 29.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That this act shall take effect July 1, 1912, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A few moments ago, when my colleague from Illinois, Mr. MANN, and myself were in a colloquy, he made a statement which I did not understand at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the Committee on Labor desires to be recognized.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I want only a minute. He made a statement that I desired a packed committee to make the investigation of the Taylor system. I think it is only due to the Committee on Labor, as well as to myself, to state to this House that that statement is absolutely unfounded in fact. I believe the chairman of the Committee on Labor will probably bear me out in the statement that I told him I did not want to be on any of the special investigating committees and that I had enough to do without that.

Such a statement as that made by my colleague from Illinois is untrue, and it seems to me my colleague ought to admit that the statement is not correct, or else he wants to take the position of separating himself from the truth, as he sometimes does in this House. [Laughter.]

I think it is only fair that I should make this statement. I do not know what my colleague cares to do about it, but I claim that his statement is a reflection upon the Committee on Labor. That resolution, which the gentleman filibustered against at the time, provided that the Committee on Labor should make the investigation. Therefore, if it is believed that I favored the making of the investigation by a packed committee, this House ought to make an investigation and find out whether it was so or not.

This report was recommended unanimously by the Labor Committee, and no one apparently objected to it that night except my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The investigation was made. I have no criticisms of the investigation, and the matter is past; but I can not let go unchallenged a statement of that kind. If the gentleman wants to make a statement that reflects on me personally, well and good. It does not amount to much anyway, probably, in his view, and I care little about his opinion in regard to it as far as I am concerned; but he should not make such an erroneous statement reflecting on the Labor Committee.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I move to amend page 6, line 24, after the word "that," by striking out the words "this act shall take effect July 1, 1912," so that the section will read:

All acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that there ought to be a time fixed when this act shall take effect.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I am perfectly willing to change the date, and make it October 1.

Mr. MANN. I suggest that instead of making it a definite date the gentleman make it 90 days or 60 days after the passage of the act. There ought to be a certain time fixed, because certain officers exercise authority every day, and they ought to know the day when the transfer is made. If it is to be the day the bill is passed, it will scarcely give time for the transfer.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to modify my amendment so as to strike out the word "July" and insert the word "October." If the bill is going to pass at this session, that will give ample time. If not, then the Senate can correct the time later.

Mr. MANN. That is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments and with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 23913) to create a department of labor, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

By unanimous consent Mr. REILLY was given leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to the final passage.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

No separate vote was demanded.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I do not make the point in connection with the passage of the amendments.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and twenty-nine Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. The previous question having been ordered on this bill and amendments to final passage, will this go over until to-morrow as unfinished business, if adjournment is had now?

Mr. MANN. The Speaker ruled recently on a case exactly similar to this that it would go over until the next Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. It would go over until the next Calendar Wednesday.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take a vote on this bill to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. MANN. I would not make objection, Mr. Speaker, but as the Chair has already declared that there is no quorum present, of course the House is without power to enter into any such an order.

The SPEAKER. That is true, and there is no quorum present.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves a call of the House.

The question was taken, and a call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll. Members whose names are called will answer "present."

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Did I understand the Chair to say that the vote of Members on this roll call will be "present," or is it on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER It is not on the passage of the bill; the Chair has not put that question yet.

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not understand the remark of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There was considerable confusion the other day about the vote and the Chair made this statement merely to explain to Members what the situation was, and that they were to merely answer "present."

Mr. CLAYTON. I did not quite catch the remarks of the Speaker at the time, and I wanted to be sure that this was not a vote on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. There was nothing being voted on at the time the point of no quorum was made. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ninety-four Members are present; it lacks two of a quorum. Call my name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri, and he answered "Present."

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to bring in absentees.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the Sergeant at Arms be authorized to arrest and bring in absentees.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Subsequently—

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and ninety-six Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. MANN. The Chair is quite sure this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes what the Clerk says; that is the only guide he has to go by. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 159, noes 3.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 9, noes 170.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the engrossed bill. The engrossed bill is not at the Clerk's desk.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5271. An act to confer concurrent jurisdiction on the police court of the District of Columbia in certain cases; and

S. 23. An act to authorize the extension of Underwood Street NW.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BARTLETT, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. JACKSON, for one month, on account of serious illness in his family.

RETURN OF BILL H. R. 23515 (H. DOC. NO. 867).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered printed.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring) of July 3, 1912, I return herewith House bill No. 23515, entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors."

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 10, 1912.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. That is one thing the Speaker is forbidden to do; that is, to entertain a motion on Calendar Wednesday to recess.

Mr. WILSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, we made an agreement in the House to do certain things to-morrow, and I object.

The SPEAKER. The rule reads as follows:

It shall not be in order for the Speaker to entertain a motion to recess on any Wednesday, except during the last two weeks of the session.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 38 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Thursday, July 11, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, owing to the general interest in this case I deem it my duty to myself and to the people of my State to explain my vote, which was cast on the first trial without explanation.

When the resolution for the new investigation was offered in this body, it was a foregone conclusion, to my mind, that on account of the subtractions from and additions to the Senate since the first trial, a majority of this body was ready to vote for the conviction of LORIMER that day without any new evidence, and so believing, I did not think it fair to him that the case should be reopened, and if I had been given the opportunity to vote against the new investigation I would have done so, but there was no opposition to it.

But when the new trial was ordered I determined that I would decide the question in the light of the new testimony and reverse my first vote if I thought the evidence justified it; and the only comment I have made was that while I reserved my judgment, unless the prosecution made a better showing than it did before, I would vote again as I did then. My position from the beginning has been that in order to justify myself in voting for the expulsion of Mr. LORIMER, it was necessary that I should believe either that a sufficient number of votes to change the result had been corruptly cast in his favor with or without his connivance or knowledge; or that even a single vote had been corruptly cast for him with his connivance or knowledge; and in either case I should have voted against him. But neither proposition was proved to my satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt or by the preponderance of evidence. I thought then it was extremely probable that bribery was resorted to in that legislature, but it was not at all clear to me that it was done with Lorimer money or to secure LORIMER'S election, and much less clear to me that it prevailed to a sufficient extent to have changed the result of the election, or that LORIMER had any participation in it directly or through an agent.

And so viewing the evidence, I could not vote otherwise than I did.

Under this new trial I can not say I have read all the voluminous evidence, for that would have been impossible under the circumstances, nor have I read a line of the brief of LORIMER's attorney sent to me as to all other Senators, but I have carefully read the majority and minority reports and have given close attention to the arguments, though following more particularly those directed against Senator LORIMER than those in his favor.

And I can see no reason to change my former verdict, but think the case against him has been weakened rather than strengthened by the new trial, a conclusion which seems to be shared by the senior Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], whose personal integrity, independence of thought, and intellectual ability is not questioned by any Member of this body, who voted against LORIMER before, but who this time was a member of the committee that took the testimony, thus giving him every opportunity to form a correct judgment, and this fact, combined with his openness of mind, has forced him to change his former opinion in consequence of the new evidence.

The minority report virtually concedes that the evidence does not show Senator LORIMER'S connection with or guilty knowledge of any corruption in the election and does not show the source of any corruption fund, when it says, at the bottom of page 110, that it is not necessary to do so, because, in their opinion, the facts show that a sufficient number of votes were corrupted; but of course they would have shown a guilty knowledge of LORIMER or traced the source of the corruption fund to him if they could possibly have done so under the evidence, as indeed it would have been their duty to do if they could. I do not claim that it is necessary to show by the testimony of eyewitnesses that Senator LORIMER paid money personally to bribed members of that legislature or to agents to be used in bribing them, for my judgment can be influenced by circumstantial as well as by direct evidence, and I have sometimes in the trial of cases considered that circumstantial outweighed direct evidence.

But I do consider that the evidence against the validity of this election, whether it be direct or circumstantial, must be sufficient to convince my mind beyond a reasonable doubt or at least by a preponderance of testimony that enough votes were bribed to change the result or that LORIMER was contributing to or cognizant of any bribery. I feel justified in assuming from the new evidence what was generally believed before, that a corruption fund, called "the jack pot," had been for many years put up by interested parties to influence the votes of members of the Legislature of Illinois to support or oppose certain measures brought before that body, to be divided at the close of the session, and I think now, as I thought before, that it is highly probable that some of that body were paid from that fund before or after the adjournment; but it is not shown that LORIMER is even remotely connected with the raising or distribution of that fund.

And as it is not proved to my mind beyond a reasonable doubt or by a preponderance of the testimony, either that enough votes were corrupted to change the result or that Senator LORIMER was contributing directly or through an agent to any bribery or was cognizant of any, I can not vote otherwise than I did at first. Much has been said during this discussion about public opinion being in favor of LORIMER's conviction, and there can be no doubt about the correctness of the statement, and it can not be denied that it takes more moral courage to vote for than against him.

I feel a due respect for the opinion of any large number of the American people, especially on any proposition of general policy that they have had the opportunity of studying, even though I may differ from their conclusion; but that does not apply to a case like this, of which on account of its nature the great body of the people can know nothing or next to nothing of the evidence except what they have gained from newspaper editorials or comments, written by parties who in turn know nothing or next to nothing of the evidence.

It is not unnatural that the sentiment of the people on a question should be more or less influenced by newspapers, and I know that I came to this body with an undefined feeling of prejudice against Mr. LORIMER, due to statements I had read in the public press, a feeling that I tried to suppress, knowing that I must sit as a judge in his case.

A fair general sample of public opinion as to how Senators should vote on the question is found in an anonymous communication addressed to a north Louisiana paper during the early part of 1911, which a friend cut out for me, and which I still have, abusing me for not taking sides against LORIMER, and from which I make the following quotation:

> It is the consensus of opinion that LORIMER was cognizant of the graft and bribery perpetrated in the Illinois Legislature, and the best men on the Democratic side are opposing him, as well as the clean Republicans.

But I was sitting then, as I am sitting now, as a judge in the case, bound by my oath of office to decide it according to the law and the evidence as it appears to me and not according "to the consensus of opinion" or the views of a majority of the American people.

Of course the members of this body who are opposed to Senator LORIMER on this question know that those Senators who will vote for him are fully their equals morally and have quite as much intellectual ability as themselves to analyze the evidence in the case, but outsiders do not know this so well as the Senators themselves.

Last winter I read with much interest and, I hope, with much profit to myself also the recent publication of the venerable and esteemed Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], entitled "Fifty Years of Public Service," and, among other things, I was particularly struck by this remark:

> It would inure to the advantage of the country if there was a more general disposition on the part of public men to adhere to their own convictions, regardless of what current opinion might be.

It would have been to his political interest if in his vote on the Lorimer case he had not put his precept into practice, for it was his action in that matter that caused his defeat for reelection in the primary of this year.

I was told on the high seas last fall by a very intelligent Republican of Illinois that the enemies of LORIMER in that State were determined to beat Senator CULLOM for that vote regardless of how much money it would cost to do it, and that just as surely as he ran they would beat him.

To the credit of that gentleman I wish to say that he supplemented the statement by adding that, although he had for years trained with the anti-Lorimer side in Illinois politics, he would not lend himself to assist in the defeat of Senator CULLOM, because he voted his honest conviction in that matter.

And his prophecy was true, and the venerable statesman, who had served Illinois with honor and fidelity for 50 years as a member of her legislature, Congressman, governor, and Senator, with never a breath of suspicion against his integrity in all that time, was repudiated by her, because he was true to himself in this Lorimer election case.

Yet, unless I misjudge him, he would rather have received this unmerited blow than have been untrue to his convictions; and I wish to go on record here as saying that in my opinion the State of Illinois dishonored herself by her action in this matter, but not him at whom the blow was aimed, he who had honored her by a half century of honorable public service.

Yes I feel an appreciation for public opinion, being very differently constituted in that respect from the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], who in his anti-Lorimer speech on this floor last Saturday said that he did not care what the people of the United States or the people of Montana or the other Members of the Senate thought about his course in this matter.

I do care what the people of the United States and the people of Louisiana and my brother Senators think of my course in this matter or in any other matter of general interest; and I would wish to have the approbation of all three of these classes if I could receive it without acting contrary to the dictates of my conscience; but, while I prize their approbation, over and beyond that I prize my own self-respect, and that would be forfeited if I now voted for the conviction of Senator LORIMER.

I believed when I voted before that I was voting with the majority and I believe when voting now that I am voting with the minority, but, of course, as the opinion that I was with the majority of the Senate could have no influence on my vote then, so the opinion that I am with the minority can have no influence on my vote now. With one thing I have been greatly struck, and that is that despite all the efforts of his political enemies in Illinois against him, his private and personal character has never been heretofore besmirched nor his word questioned; and, as was beautifully expressed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] in the opening speech against him, he is "A man of pleasing personality, whose private life, as I understand, has been pure and whose home life is ideal."

A Member of the House of Representatives of an opposite political faith from Mr. LORIMER, a close friend of mine for practically a lifetime, and himself a man of high integrity as well as ability, said to me when I first took my seat in this body: "I understand that Senator LORIMER's title to his seat is to be tested on the charge that he obtained it by corrupt methods. I know, of course, that you will vote on the matter according to your conception of duty, according to the law and the evidence submitted to you, but I wish to say that Mr. LORIMER served eight years in Congress with me, and I have had the best opportunities to discover his character, working together as we did on important committees. I know his public life, and I know his private life both here and in his own home, which I have visited, and it would take the most direct and incontrovertible proof to make me believe he had been guilty of corruption himself or that he would be willing to receive the benefit of corruption."

This is the reputation of the man whom we are now called on to say we think guilty of procuring his election to this body by bribery, for that is exactly what a verdict against him means.

Yet I heard this man, standing on the floor of this Chamber last year, declare to his brother Senators on his honor as a man and as a Senator that he was not guilty of any bribery in the procurement of his election, and had no knowledge in the remotest degrée that bribery and corruption were practiced in securing his election, nor did he believe that votes were bought by anybody to secure his election.

The reputation of this man for truth and personal integrity in all his past career entitles his word to credence with me in this particular matter unless the proof to the contrary is evident or the presumption strong.

And in case of doubt I would feel compelled to give the benefit of it to a man of that stamp, who is also a brother Senator, as the law requires me to give it to the meanest and lowest criminal of the land. Feeling as I do about this matter, I can not vote to degrade this man; for if I did, as I told my home people last year, my conscience would give me no peace hereafter.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, it is a disagreeable duty to attack the right of any man to a seat in this Chamber, and especially is it a disagreeable duty to perform in this case. Speaking for the members of the special committee presenting the minority view, it would have been far pleasanter for them had they been able to join in the majority report exonerating Senator LORIMER. This was impossible upon the record in this case.

Voluminous as this record is it involves but two questions, and they need now but brief discussion. The first is a question of law and the second a question of fact.

The question of law presented is whether the Senate has a right now to consider this case, since, on March 1, 1911, by a vote of 46 to 40, a resolution was adopted declaring the election of Senator LORIMER valid. The second question, one of fact, is whether this record now before the Senate establishes the election of Senator LORIMER to have been obtained by corrupt methods and practices.

Considering the question of law first, the plea of res adjudicata was pleaded after the conclusion of all the testimony and immediately prior to the conclusion of the hearings by the special investigating committee. It presents to the Senate the question of whether the plea of res adjudicata, as known to court practice, can prevent a reconsideration by the Senate of this case upon its merits.

The majority of the committee, after the filing of this plea and briefs in support thereof by the attorneys for Senator LORIMER, took the position that the plea of res adjudicata prevented the Senate now from holding the election of Senator LORIMER as invalid. This position is absolutely inconsistent when considered with the attitude of several of the majority members of the committee when the question of reopening the case was presented to the Senate in May of last year. At that time it was the attitude of several Senators, who subsequently composed a majority of the special committee making this investigation, that not only should the case be reopened, but that the case should be referred again to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and furthermore, that it would be not only discourteous but a serious reflection upon the members of the Privileges and Elections Committee who had made the previous investigation if the resolution requiring a new investigation was not referred again to the same committee. It is inconceivable that these Senators would have clamored for the right to take jurisdiction of this question if they had known or believed at that time that the Senate, and therefore any committee or subcommittee of the Senate, was without authority to take jurisdiction of the matter. It would have been unfair to the Senate for them to have asked for a jurisdiction which they believed they had neither the power nor the right to exercise. The views of these Senators prevailed, and the resolution calling for a new investigation of this case was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which promptly reported the resolution, which, when adopted, ordered the second investigation and raised the special committee of eight that made the investigation. This resolution, approved and reported by the Senators who subsequently constituted the majority of this committee, ordered an investigation de novo, not merely an investigation to determine whether there was new and material evidence upon which the former judgment of the Senate might be reversed. Were these Senators asking the Senate to permit them to try a case over which they knew they had no jurisdiction, or did they not believe at that time that they had jurisdiction of this case and that they were competent to try it?

The position of the majority members of the special committee upon the question of law is absolutely inconsistent. They first insist that the Senate's position upon this case is identical with the position of a court that has rendered a final judgment in a case; and, second, after making the analogy between the Senate and a court complete, they quote the uniform rule of courts that a case once finally decided can never be reopened, even where there is newly discovered evidence.

On page 50 of the majority report it says:

> As an application of the principle established by the authorities last referred to, the law is clearly to the effect that newly discovered evidence furnishes no ground for avoiding the bar of a former judgment. Some of the laity may have the impression that a former judgment can be nullified by bringing forth at the second hearing newly discovered evidence, but no law author and no court recognizes any such exception to the doctrine of res adjudicata.

Again the majority of the committee, on the same page, said:

> The authorities make it plain that the Senate is barred by the rule of res adjudicata from reopening and rehearing this case on the ground of newly discovered evidence.

Arguing from this premise, the conclusion of the committee would logically have to be that the Senate, being a court, when it considers the election or qualification of its Members could not reopen a case even upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, and such would seem to be the conclusion drawn by the committee in the majority report, for on page 48 of its report the following is found:

> Your committee therefore concludes that both on principle and by authority the action of the Senate of March 1, 1911, deciding that the election of WILLIAM LORIMER was valid and legal constitutes res adjudicata as against any subsequent attempt to have the Senate decide that the election was invalid and illegal.

After drawing the analogy between the Senate considering the election or qualification of its Members and that of a court, and announcing the sound principle of law governing courts in reconsidering cases that have gone to final judgment, and after drawing a similar conclusion in regard to the Senate based upon this analogy, the majority of the committee then did not have sufficient confidence to apply the principle which it had announced and pursue the logical conclusion which it had drawn from its premises.

On page 54 the committee said:

> Under the principle laid down by the highest judicial tribunals of the land, the Senate of the Sixty-second Congress would not question the right of Mr. LORIMER to his seat, the right to which was determined in the Sixty-first Congress, even though new evidence had been produced to impeach him. This committee, however, would not feel inclined to follow this rule implicitly, and if new and substantial evidence had been discovered, showing clearly that he had secured his election by corruption, we would recommend a reconsideration in order that the honor and integrity of the Senate may be maintained.

This illogical and inconsistent view of the majority means either that the Senate was not properly likened to a court in considering such a plea or the authorities cited by the majority as sustaining the plea of res adjudicata are incorrect and unsound.

The final position of the majority, however, lies between these views, and is that the plea of res ajudicata does not prevent a reopening and reconsideration of the case where there is newly discovered and material evidence which, if true, would warrant a reversal of the former verdict. As soon as the majority concede this much they concede that the case is before the Senate for reconsideration, and the only difference between the majority of the committee and those who take the opposite view is whether the case is before the Senate only to consider newly discovered evidence, or whether the entire case is before the Senate. There can be no doubt that the authorities are uniform in holding that whenever a new trial is granted on whatsoever ground the case is then considered de novo upon its merits, and the tribunal having jurisdiction of the reopened case is not bound to consider only newly discovered evidence.

Even the inconsistent reasoning of the majority, as announced by it, brings this case before the Senate for consideration, and the question it presents is not whether there is newly discovered evidence which is true or false, but whether the whole record of the reopened case discloses that corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

The majority of the committee are now facing a condition and not a theory. Theoretically they insist that the case should not now be reopened and be before the Senate for consideration, but they fail to remember that it was with their vote that the case was ordered unanimously to be reopened, and, having been reopened, it is now before the Senate for consideration. Their action in voting, first, that this resolution should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to consider whether a second investigation was necessary; second, their votes in the Committee on Privileges and Elections in ordering this resolution reported by the chairman; third, their votes in having this resolution adopted by the Senate and the investigation begun; fourth, their votes and actions, upon the special committee raised by their votes in summoning all the old witnesses as well as the witnesses to new facts show that it was the belief and desire of the majority of this committee at the beginning and during the continuance of this investigation that the entire record should be reopened and all the facts, both old and new, again presented to the Senate for consideration. The action of the majority upon any other hypothesis is untenable and inexplicable. The majority of the committee is now in the position of a court, to use their own analogy, that having ordered a new trial, and after the new trial has been ordered and the evidence upon the new trial presented, is unwilling to pass thereon or to permit the record made on the new trial to be presented to the appellate court.

The views expressed by the minority members of the committee upon the question of res adjudicata can be considered in a dual light. One view is that when an election case has been decided by the Senate that it can be reopened upon new and material evidence being presented; and when reopened the case is before the Senate again upon its merits; and that, as in the case of Spofford and Kellogg, so in this case a resolution was adopted by the Senate of the State of Illinois setting forth new and material evidence; that this resolution, together with the resolution of the Senate was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections to report whether a second investigation was proper and necessary, and that the Committee on Privileges and Elections unanimously reported that a second investigation was necessary and proper, and, in accordance with this report, introduced a resolution ordering a second investigation upon the whole case, which was unanimously adopted by the Senate, and that thereupon the entire question involved in this case is before the Senate for consideration. The reasoning in support of such a view necessarily means that unless there was new and material evidence there could be no reopening of the case, as was decided in the case of HENRY A. DU PONT, of Delaware. (Buck's Senate Election Cases, pp. 818–874.) There is also a broader view of this question which has my full approbation, and that is that the Senate is a continuing body and the judicial powers vested in it relative to judging the election and qualifications of its Members are merely incidental and subsidiary to its main powers, which are purely legislative. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that where a body was created, like a railroad or corporation commission, vested with judicial, executive, and legislative powers, and where it exercised judicial powers, but exercised them as incidental to its legislative powers, the plea of res adjudicata could never be invoked.

The Supreme Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Holmes, in the case of Prentiss against The Atlantic Coast Line, said:

> Proceedings legislative in nature are not proceedings in a court within the meaning of Revised Statutes, section 720, no matter what may be the general or dominant character of the body in which they may take place. * * * That question depends not upon the character of the body, but upon the character of the proceedings. * * * The decision upon them can not be res judicata when a suit is brought. And it does not matter what inquiries may have been made as a preliminary to the legislative act. Most legislation is preceded by hearings and investigations. But the effect of the inquiry, and of the decision upon it, is determined by the nature of the act to which the inquiry and decision lead up. * * * The nature of the final act determines the nature of the previous inquiry. As the judge is bound to declare the law, he must know or discover the facts that establish the law. So when the final act is legislative the decision which induces it can not be judicial in the practical sense, although the questions considered might be the same that would arise in the trial of a case. If a State constitution should provide for a hearing before any law should be passed, and should declare that it should be a judicial proceeding in rem and the decision binding upon all the world, it hardly is to be supposed that the simple device could make the constitutionality of the law res judicata if it subsequently should be drawn in question before a court of the United States.

If the decision be sound that a body expressly vested with judicial as well as legislative powers can not be estopped from further action upon the same subject by the plea of res adjudicata where the judicial powers are exercised as incidental to its legislative powers, then it necessarily follows that where a body like the Senate, whose primary functions are legislative and whose judicial powers are purely incidental to the legislative powers and conferred for the purpose of preserving its legislative powers free from corruption and fraud, as is the case of the judicial powers of the Senate to judge the election and qualifications of its own Members, can not have its deliberations concluded and circumscribed by the technical judicial plea of res adjudicata.

The judicial functions of the Senate in passing upon the election and qualifications of its members are purely incidental and subsidiary to its principal functions, which are legislative. The distinction between the functions of a legislative body and a judicial tribunal is that those of the legislative body are necessarily never final, while those of the judicial tribunal must necessarily be final. It is conceded that the plea of res adjudicata can never be properly invoked in court until there is a final judgment, and as there never can be a final judgment in a legislative body, whose judicial functions are merely incidental to its legislative functions, the plea of res adjudicata can never be properly plead.

The true doctrine is that the Senate should never reopen an election case for the purpose of permitting a changed political complexion to reverse a former verdict, but that the Members of the Senate should never hide behind a technical plea to avoid correcting a former erroneous decision; that an election case is never finally decided until it is decided right upon the fullest and fairest investigation and consideration of all the facts that can possibly be obtained. The reason for such a rule is apparent. If a changed political complexion would justify the reversal of the former verdict, then election cases would be decided, not according to their merits or justice to the parties, but according to the dominant political opinion of the Senate. On the other hand, the reason is equally strong that the Senate should reopen an election case wherever there is new or material evidence or where, on the whole record, from an equitable standpoint, it should reconsider its former verdict either for or against the Member whose seat is contested. According to this view, had Senator LORIMER been deprived of his seat in this body by the vote of March 1, 1911, and had he afterwards been able to present to the Senate uncontradicted evidence that the former judgment of the Senate was wrong, he should, by all rules of equity, be allowed to present that evidence, and upon it he should be entitled to his seat in this body. This reasoning would hold good whether a successor after the first verdict had been elected or appointed to take a seat in this body, for the appointment or election of a successor would necessarily be grounded upon the condition precedent that the election of Senator LORIMER had been invalid, and as soon as that judgment was reversed and the election of Senator LORIMER held valid, there would be no vacancy to be filled either by appointment of the governor or election by the legislature.

Upon either view of the minority, relative to the plea of res adjudicata, it can not be invoked in this case, and this case is now before the Senate upon its merits for consideration.

And the second question, the question of fact—whether corrupt methods and practices were employed—is now presented to the Senate for its determination.

Let us consider the facts now presented to the Senate from the standpoint of the majority's view of the law. On page 54 the majority said:

> This committee, however, would not feel inclined to follow this rule implicitly, and if new and substantial evidence had been discovered showing clearly that he had secured his election by corruption we would recommend a reconsideration in order that the honor and integrity of the Senate may be maintained.

We insist that according to this view we can show that there was new and substantial evidence that the election of Senator LORIMER was obtained by corrupt methods. This record discloses the fact that Edward Hines raised a fund for the purpose of corrupting the legislature in Springfield. This fact was established by the testimony of Clarence Funk and William Burgess, Funk testifying that he was asked by Hines to contribute the sum of $10,000 to a fund of $100,000 that had to be raised to reimburse those who had elected LORIMER, and Burgess testifying that C. F. Wiehe, brother-in-law and confidential representative of Edward Hines, stated in his presence that he, Wiehe, had contributed $10,000—the same amount asked of Funk—toward the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

Either Hines or Funk committed perjury—Funk solemnly swearing that he was asked to make this contribution by Hines, and Hines denying he ever requested such a contribution from Funk. The two statements are irreconcilable. It is admitted by both that there were no witnesses to the actual conversation that took place on the day at the Union League Club in Chicago that Funk alleged this contribution was requested of him, and on which Hines admits that Funk came to him and asked him to step aside and speak to him for a moment. Therefore the Senate is forced to choose between the testimony of Funk and the testimony of Hines. Funk's testimony was reluctantly given; it was only given in the first instance before the investigation of the Illinois Senate for the purpose of preventing a friend, to whom he had confidentially communicated the information, from being imprisoned for contempt. It was given at a long period of time after it occurred and after the first investigation by the Senate had been concluded by the vote of the Senate, thus showing that Funk had no motive or desire to injure either Hines or LORIMER. This record does not disclose any facts which would warrant any member of this committee in believing that there was any motive or self-interest which could have influenced Funk to commit the crime of perjury by manufacturing this story of the request by Hines for the $10,000 contribution to the Lorimer election fund. This story is either true or it is manufactured evidence and Funk has committed willful and deliberate perjury. On the other hand, there is the instinct of self-preservation and the escape from punishment for the crime of bribery which would induce Hines to contradict Funk and to commit perjury. The absence of any interest or motive on the part of Funk and the presence of the strongest incentive in the world—self-preservation—on the part of Hines to commit perjury should be sufficient to convince any fair-minded, unbiased person that Funk's story is true and that Hines's denial is absolutely false. But, in addition to this reason, there are circumstantial evidences which go to brand Hines as a perjurer and unworthy of belief.

It is established that he attempted to influence Cook and O'Brien—two men who heard his telephone conversation from a room in the hotel at Chicago to Springfield on the day on which LORIMER was elected—to leave Chicago and to get out of the jurisdiction of the grand jury of Cook County when it was investigating this case. These reasons, and the additional reasons disclosed by the attitude of Hines on the stand and before the committee during its sessions, warrant the Senate in absolutely accepting the story of Funk and in refusing to believe Hines's denial, even though supported by self-serving declarations to employees and business associates. The story of Burgess, though admitted to be partially contradicted by several people associated with Hines in business and by one Charles P. McGowan, should be accepted as true. There is established no motive or self-interest on the part of Burgess that would prompt him to manufacture the evidence and commit the perjury that his statement would be unless true. On the other hand, Hines's and Wiehe's denials are prompted by the strongest of self-interest.

If they were guilty of raising this corruption fund and of the crime of bribery, it follows as the night follows the day that they would be willing to commit perjury to avoid punishment for the crime of bribery. If Burgess had been planning to manufacture evidence and commit perjury for any purpose, it is inconceivable he would have placed the scene of the occurrence in the smoking room of a car, accessible to all the occupants on the car, rather than to some other place where he could have held the manufactured conversation without the danger of witnesses being present. The fact that Burgess relates that the conversation occurred in the smoking car where the weight of numbers are against him is one of the marks that stamp it as the truth. Again the denial of the statement by Burgess by the employee and business associate witnesses of Hines are of such a character as not to contradict the truth of Burgess's statement, for, according to my recollection of their testimony, not one of them swore that he was in the smoking room from the beginning of the journey of Wiehe on that occasion to the end of it; so that their testimony may be regarded as nothing further than testimony to the effect that they were not present if such statements were made. The only man swearing that he was in the smoking room from the time when Wiehe entered the train to the time he left was poor Charles P. McGowan, whose character was ruined and whose testimony was rendered unworthy of belief by his admissions that he received money from C. F. Wiehe, Hines's brother-in-law, other than his expenses to Washington, where he went to testify. McGowan's guilt and infamy were so brazen that he set them forth in a letter, the authenticity of which is not denied, and which is as follows:

ELORA, ONTARIO, November 19, 1911.

A. C. BAILEY, Esq.,
1607 Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa.

MY DEAR ART: Your very kind letter received some days ago, and I note you say you are all business. For myself, eating, sleeping, and smoking comprise my daily duties at present. A day or so after my return home the Hines people sent me a telegram asking me to meet one of them in Toronto. I presume they wanted some more affidavits or something, so I wired them they had better come to Elora. By God, they would have been shown what forced hospitality was. The old shotgun would have been loaded with a couple of Peters No. 2. I made them come across at that—not all I expected, though—and I had a hell of a time getting it, too. Had to threaten him with all kinds of exposure.

I was sorry I did not see you the afternoon I left, but hope we will meet again in the near future. I do not know just now what my plans will be for next year. Father is talking very seriously of buying a flour mill for my brother and myself. What kind of a miller would I make, do you think?

Let me hear from you as often as you can spare the time to write, and if you are in this vicinity any time, run up; I will always be glad to see you.

Yours, etc., CHAS. MCGOWAN.

P. S.—Give my best to your brother.

MCG.

The testimony of Funk and Burgess is absolutely true to the best of their recollection, and, being true, it establishes that a corruption fund was raised for the purpose of electing WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate; and the fact that even an egotist like Hines had sufficient discretion not to embalm the evidence of this crime upon his personal books or those of his company should not have the slightest weight in discrediting this testimony.

The majority elected not to believe Funk. If they had, according to their own statement of the law, this evidence not being in the former record, they would be forced to vote that the election of WILLIAM LORIMER was invalid. They say that it is not probable that Hines, a successful business man, would make this statement to Funk, a casual acquaintance; yet, in its report, the majority elects to believe that Funk, a successful business man, would not hesitate to ask Hines, a casual acquaintance, to let him become an accessory to the crime of corruption by contributing to the campaign expenses of Senator LORIMER. The difference between Funk and Hines upon this record is that Funk would have to lie to commit the crime of perjury, while Hines would have to lie to escape the crime of bribery.

This record also discloses new evidence, in that on this investigation Wayman and Burke, district attorneys for Cook and Sangamon Counties, are called, and enter emphatic denials of any third-degree methods or improper influences being used upon witnesses before the grand juries of those counties that induced those witnesses to make false confessions. Much was made in the argument on the former case of these improper methods having been employed by these district attorneys, although these men had been subject to the jurisdiction of a former investigating committee and had never been called.

In the third place, there is new evidence in this record that makes the deposit of $2,500 by Holstlaw in the State Bank in Chicago, on the day of his visit to John Broderick, a fellow member of the State Senate of Illinois, who, according to Holstlaw, had promised him money if he voted for LORIMER, so clear that not a single member of the committee dares to question the fact that Holstlaw did on that day make a deposit of $2,500 in currency, a fact that was absolutely challenged upon the former argument of this case, it being insisted that the duplicate deposit slip was a forgery.

In the fourth place, the testimony on the former investigation showed that among other members of the legislature going to St. Louis to meet Browne on June 21, 1909, and Wilson on July 15, 1909, was one Henry A. Shephard. The former evidence showed that Shephard visited his bank box upon that day, but that the visit to this bank box was before the visit to Wilson's room. The evidence now establishes that the visit of Shephard to his bank box upon the day of his visit to Wilson in his room at the Southern Hotel, in St. Louis, was after his visit to Wilson, and was made upon the records of the bank owning the vaults in the name of his brother, both his brother and himself having access to the bank box. The issue in this case as to Shephard being whether Shephard received money or not from Wilson, it is of the greatest importance and most material to establish that Shephard visited his bank box immediately after his conference with Wilson, who admittedly distributed money on that day in St. Louis to other members of the Illinois Legislature who had voted for LORIMER. The importance of this testimony is increased when it is recalled that one of the members confessing to having received money from Wilson on that day testified that a $500 bill was given to Shephard, and by the fact that Shephard for some reason, which is now disclosed to be that of escaping detection, made a false entry upon the record of the bank owning the vaults, showing that it was his brother and not he who entered the bank vault upon that occasion.

In the fifth place, the testimony of William C. Blair upon this record establishes him as a member of the legislature who received money for his vote for LORIMER.

According to the testimony of Allan C. Tanner, Blair made a statement to him before the vote for LORIMER relative to it meaning a great deal to him if he voted for Senator LORIMER. According to Blair's own testimony, and out of the mass of contradiction and perjury which he uttered while on the stand, the facts are established that before he voted for LORIMER he was in debt and had no money; that after he voted for LORIMER and after his visit to Thomas Tippit, in July, 1909, the leader of one of the factions who brought his following to LORIMER, a visit which he denied and which he made every effort to conceal by stating he was in a different place on that day, and which he admitted only after having been confronted with the hotel register showing he was in Olney instead of Mt. Vernon on that day, Blair displayed a large sum of money in currency, varying, according to witnesses, from twelve to fourteen hundred dollars, and admitted by Blair to be between eight hundred and one thousand dollars. Then there is the testimony of Moore that Blair stated to him, in June, 1909, that he would have been very foolish to have voted for Stringer and to let all the Lorimer money get by him and not get his part of it. Blair's testimony may be resolved into the following syllogism:

(a) There is money in it for me if I do a certain act, i. e., vote for LORIMER.

(b) I have no money.

(c) I did the act, i. e., voted for LORIMER.

(d) I now have money.

The conclusion, therefore, is that he obtained the money for doing the act, namely, voting for LORIMER.

These instances might be multiplied in a longer speech, showing that new and material evidence was established in this record, but it is useless, as the majority of this committee apparently fail to give credit to the oath of any man swearing in opposition to the validity of the election of WILLIAM LORIMER.

The instance of their treatment of Holstlaw's testimony is a fair example of their attitude toward all the witnesses. It is acknowledged by the majority of this committee that Holstlaw received money from Broderick. This acknowledgment could not be withheld, for the record shows, by the testimony of the president and other officials of the State Bank, that upon two occasions Holstlaw deposited money in currency in that bank—on one occasion $2,500 and on the other $700—and both of the dates given by these bank officials are the same as the dates on which Holstlaw testified that he made his deposits and on the days that Holstlaw testified he was summoned by Broderick to meet him in Chicago; and one of these deposits was on the day after the date of the letter introduced in evidence from Broderick to Holstlaw asking Holstlaw to meet him (Broderick) in Chicago, although Broderick denied at first, and until confronted by this letter, that he had ever requested Holstlaw to meet him in Chicago for any purpose. But the majority refuse to believe Holstlaw when he said he was promised money by John Broderick before he (Holstlaw) voted for LORIMER, because they say Holstlaw was a bribe taker, although Holstlaw's evidence is corroborated by other evidence. Yet the majority of the committee readily believed Broderick when he said that he did not promise Holstlaw money for voting for LORIMER before Holstlaw voted for LORIMER, although Broderick stands on the same footing as Holstlaw, being, according to the admissions of all, a bribe giver.

Confronted by the fact that Holstlaw received $2,500 in currency on one occassion from John Broderick and $700 on another; that Holstlaw went to Chicago for the purpose of seeing Broderick on both these occasions and in response to Broderick's invitation, although Holstlaw had never visited Broderick before, the majority of the committee was forced into the realm of imagination and compelled to conjecture that Broderick paid Holstlaw these sums of money, not for the purpose which Holstlaw swears they were paid, but for the purpose which even Broderick does not swear they were paid, of corrupting Holstlaw to vote against the local option or temperance measures in the Illinois Legislature.

Why should the majority of the committee refuse to accept Holstlaw's statement that this money was received by him after he voted for LORIMER, knowing he would receive $2,500 if he voted for LORIMER, and instead conjecture and imagine that it was received for Holstlaw's vote upon the liquor question when no one, not even Broderick, suggested that explanation? Why not conjecture or imagine any one of a thousand other possible explanations?

The majority of the committee treats the testimony of White, Beckemeyer, and Link in the same forced and far-fetched way.

It is not seriously questioned by even the majority of this committee that Browne and Wilson, on the occasions of their visits to St. Louis on June 21 and July 15, 1909, respectively, distributed money to the members of the legislature who met them there at their invitation, and that these members of the legislature had voted for LORIMER. Corroborating evidence strengthens the confession of each of the men who confessed to having received money from Browne and Wilson upon these occasions. The majority members of the committee know that the record shows that Wilson left the country under an assumed name while the former investigation was being held in Chicago, and returned to testify before the former committee some two or three months afterwards, when the investigation had been found to be innocuous and harmless; that the record shows that Beckemeyer and Wilson manufactured an antedated letter nearly a year after the visit to St. Louis for the purpose of giving a reasonable excuse for that visit; that this record shows that White was in debt before he visited Browne in Chicago and Wilson in St. Louis, and that thereafter he deposited a large amount of money with a department store in St. Louis. There is evidence, likewise, of Beckemeyer and Link having money in large bills in their possession after their St. Louis visit. Yet the majority of this committee is willing to brush aside these confessions, strengthened by corroborating evidence, and hold LORIMER's election valid, although in so doing they attempt to erase from the statute books all laws relative to bribery, for they make the proof of the crime of bribery impossible. If bribery can not be proved to the satisfaction of the United States Senate by the confession of one of the guilty parties and by corroborating evidence, then it is impossible to prove bribery in the Senate of the United States. Even should both the bribe taker and the bribe giver confess, according to the reasoning of the majority of this committee the evidence would then be doubly untrustworthy and incredible.

In the course of his discussion of the case the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has greatly narrowed the issue of fact between the majority and minority of the committee.

The Senator from Washington admits that Lee O'Neil Browne, Wilson, and Broderick had a corruption fund and that they distributed this fund to certain members of that legislature. To this point the majority views, as expressed by Senator JONES, and the minority views coincide. Senator JONES then insists as his theory that this corruption fund was distributed in payment for votes or support against the local-option measures though there is not a single witness testifying to this effect or a scintilla of evidence in the entire record to support such a theory.

The minority insists that this admitted corruption fund was distributed in payment of votes for LORIMER, and cites witnesses and corroborating evidence to support its contention. The fact that Browne, Wilson, and Broderick contradict these witnesses and the corroborating evidence that this corruption fund was Lorimer money can have no weight, for as soon as Senator JONES admits that Browne, Wilson, and Broderick distributed any corruption fund he brands each of them as a perjurer, as each denies, under oath, such disbursement, and all of their testimony must be viewed and weighed as that of perjurers.

There is no need in discussing at length the entire record in this case from the standpoint of the minority. It can be stated in a few words. Four members of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois who voted for Senator LORIMER have testified that they received money therefor, known as Lorimer money, after they had voted for Senator LORIMER; they testified that they received it from certain men, naming them, at certain places and at certain times, and the record shows that these men confessing to have received this money were at the places named at the time named and met the men named; and the corroborating evidence also shows that they had in their possession thereafter money in large amounts and in large denominations, and that before that time, in some instances, they were without money. The bribe giver being equally guilty with the bribe taker, and these four men confessing—White, Beckemeyer, Link, and Holstlaw—testifying that they received this money from certain other members of the legislature, to wit, Browne, Wilson, and Broderick, then the votes of the bribe givers are to be considered as corrupted with those of the self-confessed bribe takers. This makes a total of seven corrupted votes cast for Senator LORIMER. Without discussing the fact that some of the 108 votes he received changed to him after he had received more than a majority, it is sufficient to say that deducting 7 votes from 108 leaves 101 votes which Senator LORIMER received, or less than a majority, which view of the case renders it unnecessary to discuss the other votes which circumstantial and other evidence establishes were also corrupted.

The minority can summarize or state their conclusions in regard to the corruption of these seven votes in no clearer, more concise, or more forcible language than by quoting the lucid statement on this subject made by the Senator from Washington in the course of his discussion of this case on February 7, 1911, which is as follows, according to page 2065 of volume 46, part 3, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> The testimony seems to be clear that White had considerable sums of money at the times he testifies to have received it from Browne and Wilson. It is shown that after he received the money in Chicago he took a package to the Grand Leader store at St. Louis and left it there, marking on it "$700" or "$800." Mr. Kirkpatrick, who is entirely disinterested, corroborates White in this particular. It is shown that he paid off a great many bills of varying amounts, made a trip to Tennessee, gave a $50 bill to his mother, one to his father, and other various sums to different persons. After he received the money at St. Louis he went to Chicago and spent some time carousing with Browne, and Browne himself claims that he took a couple of hundred dollars from his person while he was in a condition not to look after himself and kept it for him.

I have gone into the testimony more than I should, in view of the many exhaustive reviews that have been made of it. I am convinced that White, Link, Beckemeyer, and Holstlaw were corruptly influenced to vote for Mr. LORIMER. I also am convinced that Browne, Wilson, and Broderick corruptly influenced them. The bribe giver is just as corrupt, if not more so, as the bribe taker. These seven votes were corrupt votes and should be deducted from the vote cast for Mr. LORIMER. These may not be all the corrupt votes cast; I do not think they are. I believe the evidence shows clearly and definitely other corrupt votes. I also am convinced that the tainting of Browne's vote under the circumstances tainted every vote among his faction that followed him, unless such vote is shown clearly not to be corrupted. Under my view of the law, seven tainted votes are sufficient to invalidate the election, but if more were necessary they could easily be pointed out.

There is certainly no evidence in this new record that contradicts or renders less effective, according to the minority view, this able summary of the evidence upon this subject in the old record.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LEA. Certainly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not wish to interrupt the course of the Senator's argument, but in the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] from the Chamber I presume that the Senator will be willing to have it appear here that that Senator in his exhaustive speech yesterday stated substantially what has been read now from his former speech, but that by reason of hearing all the evidence taken before the present committee he had been compelled to change his views on the question and his judgment upon the finding of facts.

Mr. LEA. I am very glad to have the statement made. I did not know that the Senator from Washington was not in the Chamber. He was in the Chamber when I began.

These confessions, made by men under circumstances that ruined their standing in their communities, drove them in exile from political life, and pilloried them in public shame, can not be thrust lightly aside. They bear the earmarks of truth, and would not stand, as they do to-day, uncontradicted, after the fear of punishment has been banished by the expiration of time, unless they were the truth, which can not be destroyed.

The whole record must be considered. It can not be read without convincing the unbiased that there was a wholesale scheme of corruption during the Legislature of Illinois of 1909 that turned about the senatorial election as a pivot, and that the recipient and beneficiary of that corruption was WILLIAM LORIMER.

The one vote of Senator LORIMER in the Senate may not be able to change the legislative course of this Nation, and it may not, from that point of view, be of much importance whether he continues to serve the remainder of the term which he insists is his. But it is of the utmost importance in preserving the integrity and perpetuity of our institutions that an innocent man be not driven in disgrace from this Chamber, or that a guilty man be not permitted to remain here as a monument to the power of money and to the callousness of this Senate to corruption.

In discussing this question it seems impossible for some of the Senators favoring the validity of Senator LORIMER's election to conclude their remarks without a tribute to their own inherent and superb courage and political bravery; without picturing themselves as patriotic heroes and political martyrs.

It is not the desire of the minority to snatch from any Senator the laurels with which he has crowned his own political brow or destroy the impression that he is other than the dauntless hero he has pictured himself to be; but the minority can not permit the issue in this case to be presented as one of courage on one side and cowardice on the other.

It is entirely a question of judgment upon the law and facts presented by the record. On the one hand, it is insisted that the facts do not warrant holding the election of Senator LORIMER invalid, though in so doing such insistence would establish a principle that will prevent the Senate from protecting itself from fraud and corruption. While on the other hand, it is insisted that the facts here presented warrant the decision that the election of Senator LORIMER was invalid if the Senate is ever to be able to protect its purity and preserve its integrity from the corroding influences of fraud and corruption. The Senate must, in this case, establish no unsound precedent that will prevent it from meriting and deserving the confidence that it will enact legislation only by the votes of Senators honestly elected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of the length of this discussion, the extreme heat of the day, the small number of Senators present, as well as in view of the exhaustive discussion already had, I do not intend to undertake to go into an argument of this case or to do more than to take up a few scattered points, which, it appears to me, have been obscured by statements which have been made by some who have preceded me.

I join with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] in protest against all those who have here defended Senator LORIMER's title to a seat, insisting upon picturing themselves as heroes ready to perish in the cause of justice as martyrs who are approaching the stake with the spirit of the old Christians who went with songs of praise upon their lips to death. I insist that none of these gentlemen are warranted in wearing home-manufactured, handmade halos. It appears to me that they possibly might be allowed to indulge in this sort of self-laudation if their very laudation of themselves did not imply that those who see fit to vote against LORIMER are controlled by sordid, selfish, or cowardly motives.

Throughout this discussion the impression has been sought to be made that the great newspapers of the city of Chicago have entered into a foul conspiracy to destroy the rights of the sovereign State of Illinois and to crush an individual, and that every man who votes to exclude LORIMER does so in obedience to that conspiracy rather than in response to the demands of justice and the plain facts of the record. The impression is sought to be made that all who vote against LORIMER are fleeing before the wrath and power of these newspapers. One Senator has gone so far as to read into the RECORD an editorial telling the sad fate of Senators who heretofore have voted for the seating of Senator LORIMER. His evident purpose was to at once picture himself as a man of extraordinary courage and those who differed from him as poltroons without the boldness to perform a sworn duty.

Mr. President, I consider that kind of argument as a reflection upon the honor of those Senators who are going to cast their votes in favor of unseating Senator LORIMER. It is as unjustifiable as would be the charge that all who are going to vote in his favor are acting from corrupt and improper motives. There is as much evidence in the one case as there is in the other; yet I would not by implication, by so much as the shadow of an implication, attribute an improper motive to any Senator who shall see fit to vote for the retention of Senator LORIMER. On the other hand, I do not intend that the innuendo that I and other Senators who intend to vote for the vacation of this seat are impelled by improper motives shall go unanswered or unrebuked.

So far as newspapers are concerned, and so far as their connection with this case is concerned, I have this to say: I have known newspapers upon inaccurate information to begin attacks and to maintain attacks which were wholly unjustifiable; I have known them to act upon suspicion; I have known them to make warfare upon men which was a wrongful and unjust warfare; we all have known such cases. These newspapers are run by human beings who make mistakes; they are controlled by human beings who have the "bodies, parts, and passions" of men. Sometimes they are not run with a true regard for the highest ethics. But, notwithstanding, I say this: That I have never known of great newspapers, edited by great newspaper men, deliberately entering into a conspiracy to fasten a foul crime upon another man and deliberately seeking to suborn perjury in order to destroy the character of any man. If it be true that the editors of these great Chicago papers have entered into such a conspiracy, then the press of that great city is in the hands of arrant knaves and consummate criminals, who ought to be in the penitentiary.

But, sir, I shall require some other proof of their villainy than the evidence that has been produced in this case. On the contrary, so far as this evidence goes, it appears they have done nothing more than to endeavor to bring sworn testimony to the bar of the courts and to the bar of legislative assemblies, and to there lay bare the naked truth for the honest judgment of disinterested tribunals. When a man is driven in his defense to a charge that men of the highest character and standing have deliberately entered into a foul and vicious conspiracy of this kind, it seems to me that the very hardships of the case which drive a man to that sort of plea indicate strongly that he has no just defense.

Mr. President, there are two or three crucial things in this case. One of them is the relation of one Edward Hines to this transaction. I do not mean, sir, that this record shall be slummed over, as it has been, without a word of protest. It was stated here yesterday that Edward Hines was only a friend of Mr. LORIMER and that he did no more than a friend might do in order to secure the election of a friend. That, sir, is in the face of the record; it is in the face of the boastful testimony of Edward Hines himself. He does not pretend that merely as a Republican and as a friend of Senator LORIMER he left Washington and went to assist in his election and that he took the interest which a common man takes in the election of another. Ah, no; that is not the position of Edward Hines. Let me give you the position of this man. He parades himself as a sort of guardian ad litem for the United States of America, as a man whose business it is to look after legislation, whose guiding hand and whose genius control in the Senate of the United States and in the House of Representatives.

Here is a letter sent out by Mr. Hines, one sentence of which will show the intellectual attitude of this man, and also will throw a little light possibly upon his interest in senatorial elections. It is dated March 17, 1911. It is on the letterhead of the National Lumber and Manufacturers' Association, and at the head is "Edward Hines, president, Chicago, Ill." It is addressed to "the members of the affiliated associations." It is signed by the general manager, and contains this sentence, in speaking of the reciprocity bill and the attempt to pass legislation affecting the tariff upon lumber:

> The agreement which, chiefly because of our efforts, failed to become a law at the last session of Congress, will, of course, be presented at the opening of the extra session, April 4.

Thus these gentlemen proclaim themselves as able to have stopped this important legislation and declare again their intention to control the same character of legislation in the extra session of Congress then about to be convened.

Mr. President, there is a little light here upon the character of Mr. Hines. There are bribe givers and there are bribe takers, who go about like the thief in the night; their ways are silent and their lips are seldom opened; when they do speak it is in parables and by inuendo. There is another class that grow bold in their iniquity, who are proud of their influence and ability to control legislation. This man Hines shows he belongs to the latter class when he puts his name, or the name of his manager, to a paper proclaiming to "the affiliated associations" that they have already controlled the legislation of Congress and boast their ability to further control.

I have spent more time on that than I should; indeed, I think I have spent more time on Edward Hines than this egotistical bribe monger deserves at the hands of this body; but I intend to spend a little more time, not because of the importance of Hines, but because I am replying to the remarks of a Senator who painted Mr. Hines as merely the disinterested friend of Senator LORIMER, working only as a Republican friend and neighbor for his success. It is not thus Hines paints himself.

I call attention, sir, to his testimony. In it Mr. Hines declared, not that he engaged in this matter as a common Republican, a rank-and-file party man, but that he was sent from Washington to Chicago and to Springfield as the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the President of the United States and of Nelson W. Aldrich. Over and over again he tells how the President sent him messages through Mr. Aldrich, and how, on the behest of the President of the United States, he set forth to secure LORIMER's election and to secure it quick, and to get LORIMER here as early as possible.

Now, just a word with reference to the truthfulness of this distinguished gentleman. I think he did talk with Nelson W. Aldrich. I can understand why, out of a consultation between Edward Hines and Nelson W. Aldrich, the scheme for the election of Senator LORIMER should have been brought forth. From that sort of meeting I can imagine there would be that kind of result.

But, sir, the President of the United States has stated in the public press that he did not send Edward Hines. So I take it the first witness we can call against the truth and veracity of Edward Hines, against his pretensions, against his false claims, is the word of William H. Taft himself.

Of course, I am and always have been in political opposition to William H. Taft and his party, and I have but little regard for the political views of William H. Taft. Yet, notwithstanding certificate as to his character ofttimes furnished by one Theodore Roosevelt, I still believe William H. Taft to be a man of the highest veracity; and I would require more than Hines's or Roosevelt's statement to the contrary before I would change my opinion.

Let us follow Mr. Hines briefly. He goes from Mr. Aldrich's office to Chicago. What for? Why was this wealthy lumberman in this fight—this man who represented, directly and indirectly, some dozen or more associations of lumbermen? Why was this millionaire lumberman going down into Illinois to interest himself in this election of a Senator? Why was the first place he went to a great bank? Why did he conduct his operations more or less from places where capital was centered? What was his interest? He was not ordinarily in politics. His conduct and his appearance at this time and under these circumstances indicate to my mind that "big money" had become interested, and that cash had been put into the senatorial controversy.

Having given this brief sketch of Mr. Hines's primary connection with this matter, I pass from Hines to another character, Mr. Lee O'Neil Browne.

There is no candid man who gives to Senator LORIMER the credit for that intelligence which we know he possesses, or that political acumen and shrewdness which is attributed to him, who can read this testimony and arrive at any other conclusion than that Senator LORIMER must have known that Mr. Browne was engaged in very peculiar practices.

It was said here that Mr. Browne was not especially intimate with Mr. LORIMER. When I asked or started to ask Senator JONES a question, and used the term, "Browne, the agent or representative of Senator LORIMER," he repudiated my statement at once. He would not accept the term "representative or agent." He said, in effect, that Browne had very little to do with Senator LORIMER.

Upon that question, let us see what the testimony was.

I say that if this were an ordinary civil case, involving property which a man had acquired and taken to himself through the acts of Browne, he could no more repudiate his acts and keep the property than he could do any other impossible and illegal thing. This record proves to a demonstration that Mr. Browne was Mr. LORIMER's confidential agent and friend. No man can accept the benefits and fruits of another's acts and at the same time repudiate the agency of that man.

Let us see whether Browne and LORIMER were intimate. Senator KERN asked Senator LORIMER these questions when he was on the stand, Senator KERN was in his questions quoting from the testimony of Lee O'Neil Browne:

> Senator KERN. I want to ask you something about the activities of Lee O'Neil Browne in your behalf, and the conferences you had with him. I call your attention to Mr. Browne's testimony, on page 4894, where he testified to a promise which he says he exacted from Mr. Shurtleff and yourself concerning the roll call, which I imagine was that there should not be a roll call for you until you had enough votes to elect:
> "Senator KENYON. Then, when did you exact it from Mr. LORIMER?
> "Mr. BROWNE. Just as soon as I had any conversation with him in regard to the matter, which was shortly after I saw Mr. Shurtleff—very shortly, because the conferences relative to that campaign commenced to take place in those rooms very shortly after my telling Mr. Shurtleff what I would do.
> "Senator KENYON. Did you frequently meet Mr. LORIMER there?
> "Mr. BROWNE. Oh, yes; every night, and sometimes there would be half a dozen conferences in the night, the same as there are in any campaign.
> "The CHAIRMAN. In the speaker's rooms in the hotel?
> "Mr. BROWNE. Yes, sir."

A little farther on—and I am omitting, now, part of the testimony, but reading still from Browne's evidence—Senator KERN asks:

> "What would be the purpose of a dozen conferences in one evening; how would that contingency arise?
> "Mr. BROWNE. An endeavor to ascertain accurately how some one member or members stood about whom there would be some doubt.
> "Senator KERN. Yes. That is to say, when a question would come up about a member, you or some one would go and see the man?
> "Mr. BROWNE. Or have some one else go; some one who would see the member.
> "Senator KERN. And then you would have another meeting to find out the result of that effort?
> "Mr. BROWNE. He would come back and report; yes.
> "Senator KERN. You told Mr. LORIMER, during this period, as to just what you were doing toward furthering his canvass?
> "Mr. BROWNE. Yes; in a general way.
> "Senator KERN. And you went over the list with him?
> "Mr. BROWNE. Oh, as I have told you, I probably did frequently, in part. I do not think I ever went over the entire list."

After reading all of that testimony this question was asked Senator LORIMER:

> I want to ask you if that accords with your recollection as to what Mr. Browne and other members were doing?
> Senator LORIMER. I should say, substantially, yes.

There, then, is the admission of Senator LORIMER under oath that night after night, not once but a dozen and more times a night, they consorted and consulted together; that they compared notes; that they sent out agents; that they gathered in votes; and that Senator LORIMER was party and privy to all Browne did. Yet Senators have the temerity to stand in this body and say that there is no connection shown between Senator LORIMER and Mr. Browne!

Ah, sir, they can not say that in the face of the admission of Senator LORIMER under oath.

Let us now go a step further. It is admitted here upon all hands that Browne is a bribe giver, a distributor of corruption funds. It is admitted now that he corrupted White. It is admitted that he corrupted or paid money corruptly to some six or seven other men. It is admitted that he was the distributor of the whisky slush fund in that legislature, and possibly of other funds. He stands here before this body, by the admission of every man, a knave, a scoundrel, a bribe giver. Yet, after all this had been dragged into the public light, after the blazing glare of the sun of publicity had been poured upon it, after the conscience of the American people had been shocked, we do not find Senator LORIMER saying, as a just man would say, "This man has trampled upon the law; this man has dragged my name and honor in the dust; this man is now at the bar of justice; let him suffer for his sins." On the contrary, we find LORIMER contributing $10,000 that this almost self-confessed and certainly guilty wretch should go unwhipped of justice—$10,000 that the lash of the law should not be laid upon him!

Why, sir, there was conspiracy before the act; there was coordination and intellectual cohabitation and ratification after the act. They stood together before the act, they stood together during the act, and, like good friends and fellow soldiers in a bad cause, they stood together in the last act of the drama; and they stand together as friends now.

Let us analyze this a minute. We are told that Senator LORIMER'S mind was pure, his heart was stainless, he had not lifted up his hand to do iniquity; that he stood there as an honest man seeking a high and honorable position; that without his knowledge, without his consent, without his privity, a scoundrel proceeded to distribute money corruptly among members of the legislature; that finally all the villainy came to light; that when it did the face of every man was set against Senator LORIMER. That although innocent of any wrong the acts of Browne caused suspicion, distrust, and disgrace to fall upon LORIMER.

What then, sir? If that were true, Browne had been his greatest enemy. In the guise of pretended friendship he had done that which would destroy his good name. He had entered his council chamber ostensibly an honest man and driven the dagger of death into his reputation and good name.

What would an honest man do under such circumstances? Would he go to the rescue of the man who had thus dragged him to obloquy and disgrace? Or would he, upon the other hand, turn upon that man and say, "You are the scoundrel who has brought this upon me and I shall now turn my power to the vindication of the law and I shall purge my own hands by assisting in your punishment"?

LORIMER did not do so. He stayed by his false friend. That fact speaks volumes. Tell me he did this to defend his own name in the courts? Ah, what a pitiable excuse is that! Was it necessary for him to defend this man against the charge of distributing bribes in order to defend himself? On the contrary, what ought he to have done? He should have gone to the authorities of the State and said, "I have been wronged. Here are all the facts. Here is every circumstance in my possession. If you need assistant counsel, I am willing to bring him forward. Let us find out if bribe money was paid and punish the bribe giver and the bribe taker. All I ask is that in fairness you shall find out who the actual wrongdoers were."

But LORIMER did not do that. He went to the complete defense of Browne. He stood with the man who they are now forced to admit is a bribe giver, a distributor of corruption funds.

LORIMER, the injured, innocent, goes to the defense of the man who had injured him.

Mr. President, the two positions can not be reconciled. No amount of logic, no amount of sophistry, will reconcile them.

Let us return to Edward Hines. Edward Hines had a conversation with a man named Funk. He denies Funk's statement. He now says he did not use any money for LORIMER; he did not raise any money for LORIMER; he had nothing to do with raising any money for him. Yet I can take before any jury in the land, that hears the evidence and looks the witnesses in the eyes, the statement of Funk and the statement of Hines, and I can make the statement of Funk an impregnable thing which must be believed, by adding to it the statement of Hines. It frequently happens that in trying to defend against a crime you strengthen the evidence of the State. The position of Mr. Hines is that he never talked about money; that he never thought about money; that he had nothing to do with money; that Mr. LORIMER had used no money; he had not heard money discussed; and yet upon the first talk he had with Mr. Funk money was discussed. Funk, he says, wanted to contribute to LORIMER'S campaign fund, and he went from Funk to LORIMER to see how much money LORIMER had expended and how much money ought to be contributed. What was he doing that for if no money had been spent? Why was he inquiring? What business was it of his? How did he come to be thinking about it? Why did he bear that sort of a message? Why did he go to the principal in the case and say, "How much did you spend, and do you need some of it back?"

Why, sir, it is as plain as the noonday that instead of Funk saying to Hines, "How much money did Mr. LORIMER spend? we want to contribute," Hines told Funk that money had been spent, and they wanted Funk to contribute. Why did Hines go to LORIMER, the pure man, the man of spotless life, the man of stainless escutcheon, and ask him if he did not want some money from Funk's concern? The story is unbelievable. It simply amounts to this much in this case: That it is an admission that he was discussing money matters with Funk and with LORIMER. It is unbelievable that Funk came to Hines and volunteered the payment of money. It is only believable that Hines came to Funk for money.

But that is not all, sir. There are two or three telegrams in this case. The most unfortunate thing that ever happens to a man who has a bad case and is trying to bolster it up by false stories is to have something in writing. An old Irish verse runs:

Billets-doux less dangerous are
When held unto a burning taper;
Much may be whispered in the ear
That is not safe to say on paper.

Let us lay these telegrams down beside Hines's story. Hines says he had a conversation with Funk; that Funk was trying to get to contribute money. It certainly did not make much difference to Funk whether he paid out money, great or small, in this matter. Surely if Funk was once assured that LORIMER had spent no money and did not desire any contribution he would have been content. Yet Mr. Hines, the agent of Mr. LORIMER, then went from Chicago to the city of Washington, and so important did this matter appear to Hines that he made it the subject of a conversation over the long-distance telephone from Washington to Chicago, telling his confidential man, Mr. Wiehe, to be sure to see Mr. Funk and tell him "there was nothing in that matter." Why that ambiguous language? Why was he wanting to communicate with Mr. Funk?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think the Senator would like to be corrected. That conversation was in Chicago, before he went to Washington.

Mr. REED. My recollection is that there was a long-distance telephone message in regard to this matter from Washington to Chicago.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not want to interrupt the Senator at all——

Mr. REED. The Senator is at perfect liberty to interrupt me.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But I know he wishes to be correct. As I remember that incident, it was held before leaving for Washington. Having consulted with Senator LORIMER and finding that he had no campaign expenses, he told Mr. Wiehe to tell Mr. Funk there was nothing in that matter; and afterwards, in a long-distance telephone message from Chicago to Washington, Mr. Hines said that Mr. Funk did not seem to be satisfied with that and wanted to see it, or something of that kind.

Mr. REED. Very well; let us have it that way. He took pains in Chicago to send his agent to Mr. Funk, and it was the subject of a long-distance telephone conversation afterwards. They were assuring Mr. Funk there "was nothing in it." Nothing in what? In the desire to pay money? Is that why it was so important that this message should go back to Mr. Funk? I think not. Then, why was it necessary to have these telegrams passed which are written into the record here?

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 4, 1909.

E. H. L. Co., Chicago:

Have Funk meet me Chicago Saturday or Sunday. Could meet him any time. Like to leave here to-day. Answer quick.

EDW. HINES.

Put your brain to work on this now and answer the question, those of you who can, Why was that telegram sent; why was Hines wanting to meet Mr. Funk; and why did he want a quick answer? Why, I say, if all Hines wanted to do was to assure Mr. Funk that LORIMER had expended nothing and hence no contribution was desired? Why the telegram asking for a meeting with Funk in Chicago to tell him that there was no necessity to contribute when he had already been told by Wiehe and Wiehe had telephoned the fact to Hines from Chicago to Washington? Does any sane man believe Hines gave the true reason for his anxiety? Here is the second telegram from Hines's concern to him, as follows:

JUNE 4, 1909.

EDWARD HINES,
New Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

Funk New York to-day. Leaves this afternoon, Washington. There to-morrow. You can reach him to-day, George Perkins's office or Judge Gary, 51 Broadway.

E. H. L. Co.

If I remember aright, there was another telegram, or two telegrams. It was not in regard to ordinary business Hines wanted to meet Funk. He was not seeking him for that purpose. It was in regard to this matter, to get the news to him that had already been once conveyed to him, that sad, cruel, brutal fate had decreed that he could not contribute to LORIMER's campaign fund, because LORIMER did not have any expenses. Does anybody believe that?

I will tell you what those telegrams mean. They mean that Mr. Hines had gone to Mr. Funk and had asked him for this money; that Mr. Funk had indignantly rejected the proposition; that Mr. Hines had told it to him in a somewhat veiled way, and that Hines then became nervous about what Mr. Funk might say, so he sent his agent to Funk to tell him there was nothing in it; to say it was all a mistake; "there was not any money paid out." "I did not really want any money." "I was just in error about it."

After arriving in Washington Hines was still nervous, so he had his long-distance talk with Wiehe at Chicago. He wanted to know from his confidential man, Wiehe, whether he had seen Mr. Funk and given him the assurance that it was all an innocent and idle dream and that there was nothing to it. Hines, even after talking with Wiehe, was not satisfied; he wanted to assure himself by a personal talk with Funk that everything was safe. So he sent a second message to find where in the world Funk was, so he could have a personal interview with him; and then came the second message that Funk was in New York and could come to Washington. Hines was simply trying to cover his tracks.

There is not a man living who can furnish a lucid or reasonable explanation of those telegrams except that they were inspired by fear by a desire to hide the truth and, if possible, remove suspicion and at least insure silence. Beyond doubt Hines hoped to convince Funk that his words should be given an innocent construction, hence the message "there is nothing to it." If Hines could not convince Funk, at least he hoped to induce him to keep still.

Men may be so peculiarly constituted intellectually that they can see these telegrams and facts in some other light. Some brains may conceive that they refer to the music of the spheres, the procession of the equinoxes, or to some declaration of the decalogue, but so far as I am concerned they indicate to me that fear was in the heart of Edward Hines that he had gone too far; that he had made the mistake of expressing a corrupt transaction to an honest man; and hence he wanted to try to convince Mr. Funk there was "nothing to it all."

Now, Mr. President, I am going to discuss just one matter more. There has been a good deal said about White. The declaration is frequently made that this case hangs on White's testimony. It does not. What about Holstlaw's testimony? What about the defense formerly made to Holstlaw's testimony? It is a rule of law that wherever a man by perjury seeks to avoid responsibility the fact that he caused perjury to be committed is a circumstance strongly to be taken against him. It is like flight in the presence of a charge. It is like the destruction of papers, of instruments, of documents of an evidential character; the presumption at once arises against the man who is guilty of the destruction.

On the former hearing Holstlaw testified that Broderick, who had been active in the cause of LORIMER, had said to him that if he voted for LORIMER there was $2,500 in it; that he afterwards went to Broderick's saloon and got the $2,500; that a letter had been written to him telling him to come to Broderick's at that time, and that he went, expecting to receive the money. That is the testimony as it stood before. But Holstlaw could not produce the letter. Accordingly LORIMER put on witness after witness to show that Holstlaw's statement was a fabrication, a lie out of the whole cloth, a piece of black and damned perjury. That was the defense made in the Senate in LORIMER's presence. But in this case at this time the letter is produced, and it demonstrates that Holstlaw told the truth, and told it from the first. Those who testified to the contrary wrote the crime of perjury against their souls, and those who stood in the Senate and argued that Holstlaw gave false evidence, with the knowledge of the facts or without the knowledge, stood upon that perjury either wittingly or unwittingly. I exonerate Senators from any intentional wrong. But LORIMER and his attorneys must have known what Broderick knew. He was in their council and sat with them. Now, it transpires that they are forced to admit that the $2,500 was paid, that the letter was written, and that Holstlaw told the truth. So we need not rest the case on White's testimony; we have White's testimony and also Holstlaw's testimony.

There is another man who received a thousand dollars, and when he received the thousand dollars the statement was made "There is your Lorimer money." Is there anybody now who will say that the case stands or falls with White?

But suppose, sir, it does rest upon White. They tell us he is a black and an infamous character. When did he become a black and an infamous character? Up to the time that he began to come under the influence of Browne he could have proven as good a private character as is admitted for the Senator from Illinois. Nobody said anything against the character of Charles A. White up to that time. I grant that character ought to be taken into consideration in this case. It is not conclusive, but it is always in a man's favor. But, on the other hand, seldom men fill a high office who are not able to prove a good character. Indeed, the very election is a certificate at least that in the public opinion they possess a good character.

But now, Charles A. White, an inexperienced youth, comes down to the Legislature of Illinois, and whom does he meet? He meets Mr. Browne, who afterwards becomes the agent, as I have shown, and representative of Mr. LORIMER. There is no question about that. The first thing Mr. Browne does is to commit those acts which the professional lobbyist, the professional political freebooter, always adopts with the young and the unwary. What does he tell him? "Have you got your transportation yet?" And he gives him a list of attorneys of railroads to whom he can write and get train and Pullman passes, I believe telegraph passes also. Thus he brings this boy up to that form of indirect bribery which is by many regarded as not really corrupt at all. He gives him a taste of that emolument which comes with office, but does not go as the salary of the office or honestly with the office, the perquisites that come from power and the ability to bestow favors.

Thus, poor Charlie White comes under Browne's influence little by little. Little by little Browne begins paying him money. Finally, to use the old Biblical expression, Browne made him "twofold more the child of hell than himself." But that overstates it. This boy did take bribes and was guilty of admitting his guilt. I am going a little over the ground that was covered by others, yet I can not refrain from contrasting the fate of this outcast with the fate of those who took bribes and did not tell it at all or for a long time. These men were put into office by that same machine Mr. LORIMER is credited with controlling, all of them honorable men holding honorable positions. They did not tell. Browne himself, the bribe giver, is still at large and back in office, but the man who did tell is an outcast and his name is anathema and maranatha upon the lips of men.

What is the distinction between the two classes? One of them was impelled by conscience and the cry of outraged nature, and gave the truth to the law, or else impelled by sordid motives gave it. If it was the former, then we ought to draw the mantle of charity and forgiveness over him and give him credit for repentance. If it was the latter, he was only resorting to the vile impulses and to the inordinate and damnable appetite that had been created in his soul by Mr. Browne, the accredited agent of Senator LORIMER. Nobody says White ever took a dishonest dollar in the world until LORIMER's agent got hold of him.

To my mind, instead of condemning poor Charles A. White and heaping upon him all the terms of reproach known to our language we had better reserve a few for the man who destroyed him. I hold it to be true, sir, that between the bribe giver and the bribe taker there is a gulf as wide as separated Dives in perdition from Lazarus reclining upon the bosom of the Master in the celestial court of heaven, and that the bribe giver is a thousand times the baser villain. I will tell you why I say that.

The bribe giver is almost invariably a man in affluent circumstances; he is not driven on by want. He is a man generally of mature age, a man of experience, a man of skill, a man who possesses money, a man who knows the power of money. On the other hand the bribe taker is nearly always a man impecunious, a man whose necessities and whose desires are tempting him. He has to resist both the cry of want and the temptation of gold. He has to fight against necessity unarmed and alone, to stand up against the cupidity that is in his soul, against the tempting gold that is laid before him, and make the fight alone. Generally he is by nature a weak creature. Ordinarily these temptations are laid before a youth, a man whose mind is only half formed and whose character has not yet taken on the stability of age.

And so the seducer comes with his gold. He whispers in his ear that it is all right; that nobody will know it; nobody will find it out; that others take the money; that everybody takes the money; that it is the custom to take the money; until at last the trembling hand is reached out and the bribe touches the palm. And when it does, manhood departs and the soul is destroyed. Hell laughs at such a scene as that. Who is worse—the bribe giver or the bribe taker; the man who coldly destroys a soul by temptation or the creature who yields to temptation?

I say, sir, that if a father is warranted in striking down the creature who shall debauch his daughter, then surely is a man justified in destroying the villain who murders the soul of his son by making him a bribe taker. The real villain in every tragedy of this sort is a bribe giver.

And here is Lee O'Neil Browne covered all over with the leprosy of corruption. He is now plainly branded as a bribe giver. It is admitted that he is loathsome with the sores and ulcers of villainy. But he is still the boon companion and friend of the Senator from Illinois, who puts up $10,000 to defend this wretch against crimes of which he is indubitably guilty, and admitted here to be guilty. Of course, LORIMER says the money was paid to shield himself, but the money was nevertheless paid in Browne's defense.

Mr. President, this is not a criminal trial. This is not a lawsuit. This is an inquisition conducted by this body to determine whether a certain individual should sit here to represent a State. The parties to this transaction, and the only parties whose interest are to be considered, are the sovereign State of Illinois and the people of the United States.

If there was an honest election then is Illinois represented, and so will the people of the United States, under their Constitution be represented, well or ill. If there was not an honest election, then the people of Illinois are not represented, and the man who sits here with a dishonest title is merely an obtruder who has no right in this Chamber. That is the issue, and this body at any time has the right to investigate and inquire into the facts relative to the election.

We are told, sir, that for 30 years a jack pot has been known to exist in the Illinois Legislature; that in the State of Abraham Lincoln and the State of Logan, the State of many illustrious names, for 30 years an organized scheme of corruption has existed. For 30 years they have met there and conspired, and the bribe givers and bribe takers have parted the raiment of the people among them, and upon the vestments of the public they have cast lots. From that body this certificate comes.

If it be true that a body of men gain control of a legislature and are able to dominate its policies, that those men have for their ammunition of war corrupt money and they do control by corrupt means, then no man should be allowed to be sent by such a body here, because he does not represent the conscience of the people, because he does not represent the Commonwealth. He represents in truth nothing more nor less than a crowd of criminal conspirators who have subverted the government.

If all that has been said is true of the Legislature of Illinois, I question whether it would be capable of electing a Senator. But I do not place my argument upon that ground. The corruption here has been traced to men who voted for LORIMER. Taking the evidence in the best sense you can for the defense, for I will use that term, out of a common fund, and that common fund was used to control votes, and the men who submitted to that control took their pay out of that fund after the legislature adjourned. That is all that is necessary to be proven.

Mr. President, to my mind the day has struck in this country when money and corrupt influences are no longer going to be able to send their representatives to the United States Senate. There has been a prevalent impression in this country for some years that a senatorial office can be purchased by the highest bidder. That as a diamond necklace in a sales window may be acquired by the harlot's hire as well as the lady's dower, so can men with money, shamefully acquired, buy a seat in this body.

That day is past in this country. I unhesitatingly say that it ought to be the rule of the Senate that every man who comes here shall be able to show, if his right is challenged, that he comes in response to the will of a sovereign people, unbought, unpolluted, and untarnished. The people of the country are going to demand that. The people of the United States are going to have that. The day is here now when men can not assume to represent the 100,000,000 freemen of this country unless they come with clean hands and with an unspotted title to their office.

Mr. LORIMER obtained the floor.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, I shall not attempt to discuss the question of res adjudicata at any great length, but shall content myself with stating what I believe is the view of the average American citizen.

Before taking up a discussion of the case I desire to give the Senate an insight into the character of the men who organized the conspiracy against me and who are responsible for the continuance of the agitation which has for its object my ruin, politically and financially, and who are the same men who humbugged the Senate into ordering a further investigation into my election through the shameless performance at Springfield, Ill., under the direction of Charles S. Deneen, John J. Healy, and the newspaper trust of Chicago, and which is usually referred to as the investigation by the Helm committee.

When I review the views of the minority members of the committee I shall point out many misstatements of the record and many unwarranted insinuations and inuendos which have the appearance of a deliberate attempt to mislead Senators who, in the performance of their many and arduous duties in this body, may not have had the time to make a careful analysis of the testimony given, and who must, therefore, depend to a large extent upon information furnished by the committee or by its members upon this floor.

It is a fact that the Senate has the power, which is subject to review by no authority under heaven, to deny me a seat in this body on the most trivial pretext or without offering a pretext for such action. I shall show, and it is the solemn fact established by the record in this case, if Senators will be guided by the testimony, that not one single vote was corruptly cast for me.

Senator KERN, in his remarks on this case, used the following language:

> If the Senate was without power to act, and the committee, its creature, was under the law to be sent forth to combat imaginary windmills and be compelled to report, after seven long, weary months of effort, that its work according to law and precedent was a joke, why did not these gentlemen of the majority declare their views of the law and spare the country the expense of the investigation and spare the members of the committee that very arduous and trying experience during the heated and sultry days of last July and August while this investigation was grinding its weary way along? (KERN'S speech, pamphlet form, middle of p. 10.)

This is no joke. It is a solemn, serious matter, and if the Senate shall adopt the recommendation submitted with the views of the minority of the committee it will be a travesty on civilized jurisprudence and a mockery of justice; it will be a declaration that the Senate of the United States has decided to follow the red flag and that it has adopted the doctrine of anarchy, the recall of judicial decisions, so recently advocated by the archchampion of the destruction of American institutions. There never was a more solemn or deliberate judgment handed down in any court in Christendom than that rendered by the Senate in the third session of the Sixty-first Congress on the validity of my election.

The Senator from Indiana argues that the doctrine of res adjudicata is a technical defense which does not apply in this case, and that the people would not understand it. (KERN'S speech, pamphlet form, last paragraph on p. 10.) The rule of law that a former adjudication is a bar to continued litigation on the same question is understood by the most humble citizen of this country as a guaranty to him against repeated assaults upon his liberty, his property, or his rights.

Mr. President, if the Senate had decided on the 1st day of March, 1911, by a majority vote that I was not entitled to a seat in this body, the result would have been that the Illinois Legislature, then in session, would have elected my successor, and before the term of that Congress expired he would have been here and been sworn in as a Member of this body. Then, suppose that Charles A. White, James Keeley, of the Chicago Tribune, and Gov. Deneen, of Illinois, had submitted affidavits to the Senate that they were parties to a conspiracy, and that there was no truth in the statement made by Charles A. White, does anybody suppose that the Senate would have reopened the case after the testimony in a new hearing had shown that and would have seated LORIMER and turned out a man who had been honestly elected to succeed him by the Legislature of Illinois? If that is to be the rule in this country for the future, then God help the country. I shall not discuss the law features of this case further, Mr. President, than to say that I am entitled to the same protection to which my successor would have been entitled, and that if the former adjudication was a bar to continued assaults upon his title, then it is a bar to continued assaults upon mine. Surely I am entitled to equal protection under the law.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who has just taken his seat, made this statement:

> If it be true that the editors of these great Chicago papers have entered into such a conspiracy, then the press of that great city is in the hands of arrant knaves and consummate criminals who ought to be in the penitentiary.

I shall show before I finish this discussion that if we had a law officer in Cook County who would see to it that those who are criminals were prosecuted for violating the law the owners of the Chicago newspapers the Senator had in mind would today be in the penitentiary.

Mr. President, in order that the Senator from Missouri, who evidently knows nothing about the newspaper owners of Chicago, may know something of the character of those men, and in order that the Senate of the United States may know something of the character of all the men back of this conspiracy, I propose to relate a few circumstances and give some information as to conditions in the city of Chicago.

The Chicago Tribune Building is located on school property, belonging to a school fund for the education of the children of the city of Chicago. That property can not be sold. Up to 1895 the leases provided for a revaluation every five years. Victor Lawson, who owns the Daily News and the Chicago Record-Herald, and the owners of the Chicago Tribune got together and decided to loot the school fund. The Tribune sent word to one of the members of the school board that they wanted the revaluation clause stricken from the lease. I happen to know the circumstances, because the man to whom they sent word sent a friend to me to ask what I thought about striking out that clause. I answered him that any man who would vote to strike out the revaluation clause of the lease would live to see the day that the people of Chicago would rise in their might and drive him out of public life. This friend came back and said the member was glad that I held those views; that he intended to oppose taking the revaluation clause out of the lease.

The editor of the Tribune afterwards sent for the man who called on me and told him to go to this member of the school board and tell him that the Tribune would be his friend if he would stand by the Tribune. He sent back word that he could not do it. Then the messenger was sent back to him again with these orders: "Tell him to take his hands off, and if he does not we will drive him out of public life." The member to whom this command was sent thereupon withdrew his opposition and then the revaluation clause was stricken from the leases of the Chicago Tribune and the Daily News.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to the effect of that act upon the school fund of the city of Chicago. I have here a chart showing the corner of Dearborn and Madison Streets. This lot, 120 feet by 144 feet [indicating on chart], is school property leased to the Chicago Tribune.

The Tribune Building stands on ground leased from the board of education. Their lease, secured in the manner peculiar to the newspaper crowd, places a valuation on the ground at $792,706.40, or $15.88 per square foot. They pay 6 per cent on this valuation for rental, which equals $47,562.38 per year, or $2.75 per square foot per year.

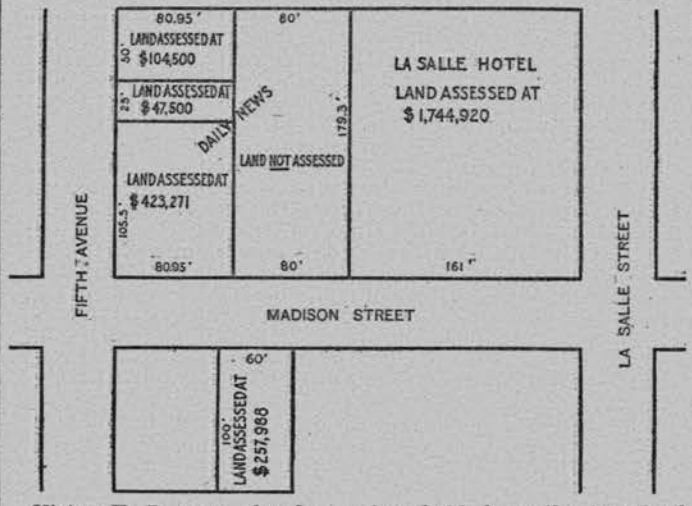
The corner lot just across the street [indicating], occupied by the Hartford Building, is assessed for taxation at $946,251, or at the rate of $103 per square foot.

The difference in the value of the two corners is in favor of the Tribune site, but if the Tribune paid at the same rate as the Hartford Building, it would be paying—

A rental of 5 per cent on $1,779,840, which would be	$88,992
Add to this the taxes	29,901
The total which they should pay for the site	118,893
They are paying under their corrupt lease	47,562
They steal annually from the school and tax fund under this lease	71,331

At the present rate of value of the property, the lease would cover a steal by the Tribune Co. in 90 years of $6,500,000.

Let us see something about the value of the Chicago Tribune. When over two years ago I discussed in this Chamber the value of the Tribune I said, to be conservative, I would place it at $3,000,000. Since that time they have refused six and a half million dollars. The editor of the Tribune stated under oath that it has been estimated that it is worth from seven and a half to ten million dollars.



The annual earnings of the Tribune, $800,000, capitalized at 8 per cent, would be $10,000,000. The tax rate, $5.04 on each $100 value, levied on one-third of $10,000,000, would yield $168,000. The Tribune property is assessed at $432,000, which yields $7,257.60, which, deducted from what it should pay, shows a steal of $160,743.40 each year.

As stated in speech of May 28, 1910, the Tribune Co. is levying tribute on the board of education by charging $17,500 per year more rent for quarters in the Tribune Building than the board paid for quarters better suited to its purpose in the building from which the Tribune Co. moved them.

SUMMARY OF TRIBUNE ANNUAL LOOT.

The steal in taxes on the Tribune Co.	$160,743.40
The steal in rent charged the board	17,500.00
The steal on ground rent under corrupt lease	71,331.00
Total annual loot of this company	249,574.40

Let me call your attention to another chart:

Victor F. Lawson also has a leasehold from the board of education of a very valuable site, just west of the new La Salle Hotel [indicating], on Madison Street. The lot is 80 by 180 feet, and the rental was fixed at $3,000 per front foot, to run 85 years from 1900. The revaluation clause which was written into the lease in the beginning was eliminated by the process which has uniformly marked the dealings of the Chicago plunderbund in school property.

Three thousand dollars multiplied by 80 equals $240,000, the valuation of the property fixed by the Lawson-school board lease, which is at the rate of $16.67 per square foot.

This valuation, with the more valuable franchise produced by striking out the revaluation clause, was coolly and impudently made in the face of a valuation of the property by the Chicago real estate board showing its value in 1895 to be 50 per cent more than the amount fixed in the Lawson lease for a period of 85 years.

I submit a copy of a statement addressed by the valuation committee of the Chicago real estate board to William H. Colvin, a citizen of Chicago, concerning the value of school property occupied by the Chicago Daily News Publishing Co.:

Valuation, $360,000. No. 447.

CHICAGO REAL ESTATE BOARD,
Chicago, April 15, 1895.

WILLIAM H. COLVIN.

The latest real-estate transaction in that neighborhood on which I have been able to secure the figures is a lease just recently made on a piece of property, 60 by 100 feet, directly across the street from the property leased from the school board by Victor Lawson. A graduated, long-term lease was made in this case, in which the average rental for a period similar to the Lawson lease is at the rate of $70.17 per square foot per year, and in addition to this, the lessees will at the expiration of the lease turn over to the lessor valuable improvements which the lessees agree to make.

The value per square foot of the school property leased by Victor F. Lawson is $70.17; the value on which Lawson pays is fixed at $16.67; he cheats the taxpayers on every square foot out of a valuation of $53.50; the property just across the street from the school property yields its owner in rental per square foot every year $3.50; the school-board property leased to Victor F. Lawson, more valuable than the other, will yield to the school children of Chicago per square foot every year $1; which will put in the pocket of Mr. Lawson every year on every foot of school ground he occupies $2.50; and will deprive the school fund every year and place in the pocket of Victor F. Lawson $36,000; adding taxes at the same rate (83 cents per square foot) which Mr. Lawson pays on a piece of adjoining property owned by him, $11,852; making a total annual theft from the school fund and public treasury, which is done under cover of his corrupt lease, $47,852. This robbery, during the life of his lease, would enrich him and those who succeed to his filthy riches, on the basis of present values, $4,067,420.

I am informed that the books of the board of assessors for Cook County show that Victor F. Lawson returns for taxation $124,000 worth of personal property. The rate of $5.19 per $100 of valuation levied upon one-third of $124,000 would yield in taxes $2,145.18, the contribution of this multimillionaire toward the government which protects him and which he in turn robs.

No one familiar with wealth in Chicago will estimate the personal fortune of Victor Lawson below $20,000,000. To be conservative and to allow for overestimates let us say he should be put down at $10,000,000. The rate of $5.19 per $100 of valuation levied on one-third of $10,000,000 would yield in taxes $172,999.83.

Victor Lawson should pay a personal-property tax of $172,999.83. Victor Lawson does pay a personal-property tax of $2,145.18. He filches from the public treasury in this way each year $170,854.65.

The Chicago Daily News is known to be the best newspaper property in the Middle West with a circulation greater than any other two papers in the city combined, making more money than the Tribune. Sure I am that it could not be purchased for $15,000,000.

The net annual income of the Chicago Daily News Publishing Co. is conservatively estimated at $1,000,000, which, capitalized at 5 per cent, would represent a valuation of $20,000,000. In order to be conservative and entirely within reason, let us cut that in two and say that the property is worth $10,000,000, although it is known that it could not be purchased at that price.

In 1911 the rate of taxation in the district in which the Chicago Daily News is located was $5.04 on each $100 of valuation. The value for purposes of taxation is fixed at one-third the actual or real value of the property to be taxed. That rate levied on one-third of $10,000,000 would have yielded in taxes $167,999.98. The board of assessors placed a valuation on the Chicago Daily News for 1911 at $893,105. The rate of $5.04 for each $100 of valuation levied on one-third of $893,105 yielded $15,004.16. It will readily be seen that the difference between what the Chicago Daily News should have paid in taxes and what it did pay in taxes is $151,995.82, which had to be made up by the small and humble taxpayers of our community. This year the board of assessors raised the valuation of most of the property in what is known as the Loop District of Chicago, in which the Chicago Daily News is situated.

I have here an article from the second page of the Chicago Daily News for Wednesday, June 26, 1912, under the headings:

Big firm values rise. Personal-property assessment of most of Loop concerns advance. Total gain is $40,000,000.

It can be seen by a reference to this compilation that the valuation of the Chicago Tribune property remains at the figures $432,000, which it carried in 1911, while the valuation of the Chicago Daily News Co. is fixed at $610,801, or $282,304 less than the previous year, although, as a matter of fact, its value had increased in the meantime.

The rate of $5.04 on each $100 of valuation levied on one-third of $610,801 will yield to the tax fund $10,261.45, which is a reduction of $4,724.71 from the amount it paid last year, made in the face of an increased value of the property and in the face of increased assessment, according to the Daily News itself, on other property in the Loop district. Figured on the same basis on which the man of small or modest means is assessed in that community, it represents a theft from the tax funds on the part of Victor F. Lawson, the owner of the Chicago Daily News, of a sum of $157,738.53 each year, which must be furnished by others who are not fortunate enough to own a powerful and corrupt newspaper through which tax officials can be browbeaten and intimidated. The method by which these daring daylight holdups are conducted is shown in the facts surrounding the taxation of the palatial home of Victor F. Lawson on the Lake Shore Drive, Chicago's most exclusive and aristocratic residence district. I have here a photograph [exhibiting photograph] showing the four-story mansion, said to be constructed from material imported from abroad, and worth, as it stands, not less than $1,000,000. Charles Fay, the managing editor of the Daily News and Lawson's right-hand man, boasts all over Chicago that Victor Lawson's mansion on the Lake Shore Drive is worth $1,500,000. In 1909, while the building was in course of construction, the property was assessed by the board of assessors at $203,185, being the sum of the assessment of $128,185 on the lot alone and $75,000 on the partially constructed building. When the assessment was made in 1910, the building had been finished, and the assessment levied for that year was $128,185 on the lot and $293,000 on the finished building. The rate of taxation for that year in the district in which the residence is located was $4.88 on each $100 of valuation. That rate levied on one-third of $421,185 yielded $6,851.27 in taxes, which, it appears, was paid by Mr. Lawson that year. In 1911 there was a readjustment of the rates of taxation for the city of Chicago, under which the rate for that district was increased to $5.19 on every $100 of valuation. At the increased rate this property should have yielded $7,286.50 in taxes. Imagine, if you can, the consternation and surprise which was occasioned when it was found upon investigation that this magnificent property had been assessed for last year by the board of assessors at $1,000, which yielded the munificent sum of $17.32 in taxes! In order that it could not be said that this is manifestly an error, I have here on exhibit a photographic copy of the receipt issued by the county collector for the payment of these taxes and in which is a description of the property.

Now, let me give you an idea of the power of these men, the control they have over public officials, and the reason for their determination that no man shall hold office anywhere in Illinois except those who are the subservient tools of the trust press of the city of Chicago. When this outrage was uncovered and brought to the attention of the citizens of Chicago, Mr. Lawson and the tax officials owned by him through his paper offered an explanation in the columns of the Daily News, to which was attached the signatures of Walter E. Schmidt, president, and W. H. Weber, secretary, of the board of assessors of Cook County, stating that in 1909 the land and buildings were assessed at $203,185, and that for 1910 the same property was increased to $421,185 through an error and without any notice to the owner.

I have already shown that the assessment on the land was the same for the years 1909 and 1910, and that in 1909 the assessment of the building was placed at $75,000 because it was only partially constructed, and that in 1910 the building had been finished and was assessed at $293,000. On looking over the records in the office of the board of assessors the original estimate of the value of the improvements, made by the architect expert of the board of assessors, was found, and I have here a photographic copy of it [exhibiting photograph]. This shows the value of the completed building, at 50 cents per cubic foot, to be $237,278; the barn, at 20 cents a cubic foot, to be $26,400; and the iron and granite fence is valued at $30,000, the sum of the improvements being $293,678. Down in the left-hand corner in large figures is the sum of $293,000, with the initials of "S. P. Norman, architect expert," immediately below, and below his initials is the initial "K." At the bottom of the sheet appear the letters and figures "O K, 1910, C. H. K.," showing that Charles Krutchkoff, the chief clerk of the board of assessors, approved the assessment of the improvements at $293,000 for the year 1910.

In the statement which Mr. Victor F. Lawson required the president and secretary of the board of assessors to issue it was stated, "No improvements have been made to justify the increase." This statement was made in the face of the fact that had been brought to the attention of these officials by their architect expert and had been approved by the chief clerk of the board of assessors as correct, that a residence had been built on that lot which, at the nominal price of 50 cents per cubic foot, was worth nearly a quarter of a million dollars.

It was further stated by these sworn officials that Mr. Lawson had paid the 1910 assessment "on the condition that the assessment would be reduced by an amount equal to the increase made in 1910 through error." Everybody knows that if Mr. Lawson had a valid claim against the board of assessors of Cook County for overtaxation, his remedy would have been to apply to the courts for an order reimbursing him for the excess paid. Mr. Lawson knew that the assessment of $421,185 did not represent one-half of the value of his residence. He also knew that if he went into court he would have to raise his right hand to his God and state under oath the true value of the property or be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury. So he took a course involving less danger to himself in having the tax officials violate their oaths of office and become liable with him to a term of imprisonment for 12 months in the county jail for their unlawful acts. The laws of Illinois provide:

On or before the 1st day of June in each year, other than the year of the quadrennial assessment, the assessor shall determine the amount, in his opinion, of any change in the value of any tracts or lots of land by reason of any injury to, alteration in, or addition to the improvements thereon since the 1st of April in the preceding year and prior to the 1st of April in the current year, and add to or deduct from the assessment accordingly, setting down the amount of such change in a proper column in the assessment books. The value of lands and improvements shall be separately fixed and shall in any assessment made hereafter be set down in separate columns in said assessor's books. The assessors shall not in any year, except the year of the quadrennial assessment, change the valuation of any real estate or improvements or the division thereof except as above provided in this section: Provided, however, That if at any time before judgment or order of sale therefor, the said assessors shall discover an error or mistake (other than errors of judgment as to the valuation of any real or personal property) in any assessment of any property belonging to any person or corporation, they shall issue to the person or corporation erroneously assessed a certificate setting forth the nature of such error and the cause or causes which operated to produce the same, which said certificate, when properly indorsed by the majority of the board of review, showing their concurrence therein and not otherwise, may be used in evidence in any court of competent jurisdiction; and when so introduced in evidence such certificate shall become a part of the court record and shall not be removed from the files except on an order of the court. (Sec. 308, ch. 120, Revenue Laws of Illinois.)

If two or more persons conspire either to commit any offense against the State of Illinois, or any county, incorporated city, village, town, or township thereof, or to defraud the State of Illinois, or any county, incorporated city, village, town, or township thereof, in any manner or for any purpose, and one or more of such parties do any act to effect the object of the conspiracy, all parties to such conspiracy shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $100 and not more than $5,000, and to be imprisoned either in the penitentiary or county jail for any period not exceeding two years * * *. (Sec. 46a, ch. 28, Criminal Code of Illinois.)

Did he secure the affidavits? Did he go to the board of review? Did he go into any court of record? No; he went to the assessor's office. He went to the place where were the men whom he owned. Then what was the result? That which was more than $6,800 the previous year—and I have a photograph of the receipt—the next year was $17.32. That was the sum of the taxes on the palatial home of Victor Lawson. Would any man think just by one glance at that photograph [exhibiting photograph] that that property is worth only $1,000? Will Senators observe this mansion on which the tax assessors, in violation of the law, changed the records so as to make the taxes not $7,200, but $17.32?

Now, let us follow them just one step further. The Daily News property is worth no less to-day than it was a year ago. Then it was assessed at $893,105. They report in their own paper this year that it has been reduced nearly $283,000, which will save Victor Lawson in cash, when he pays his taxes next year, $4,700. In other words, when they make him pay taxes on his home they take it off his newspaper, and as he is the sole owner of both properties, by that juggling of figures and manipulation of books he will have a saving this year of $1,400 over last year, even though he paid only $17.32 on his residence.

For a number of years Victor F. Lawson, through his Daily News, before each primary and general election has issued instructions to voters a day or two before elections how they should mark their ballots and for whom they should vote. These instructions are given with an air of disinterestedness and a noisy proclamation that the Daily News is acting in behalf of the people. Among other recommendations previous to the primary of April 9, 1912, a reference is found in the issue of April 6 to the candidacy of Charles Krutchkoff and Walter E. Schmidt for nomination as members of the board of assessors for Cook County. Victor F. Lawson gave these instructions in the columns of the Daily News:

Their good services in the assessor's office entitle Charles Krutchkoff and Walter E. Schmidt to the confidence of the Republican voters.

Good services in the assessors office! Victor F. Lawson knew whereof he spoke when he had that recommendation printed in his newspaper. Through the "good services" of these officials he knew that he was confirmed in the possession of $157,738.53 every year they could be kept in office which he should rightfully pay into the public treasury as taxes on the very institution through which he controlled and corrupted these officials.

He also knew that if his Lake Shore residence was assessed at anything like a fair valuation it would go on the assessor's books at not less than $1,000,000 and would, at the rate of $5.19 on the $100 valuation assesssed on property in that district, levied on one-third of $1,000,000, yield $17,299.98 instead of $3,514.08 per year, unlawfully secured through his conspiracy with officials of the board of assessors to defraud the people and loot the public treasury. He also knew that these officials were aiding him to withhold from the tax fund $170,854.65 each year that would be paid into the fund on his personal property if Victor Lawson should be assessed as the humble citizen of ordinary means is assessed in Chicago. A total of $342,379.08 in the pocket of Victor Lawson through the "good services" of his trusted officials on the board of assessors. Why should he not recommend them to the dear people, so they might be kept in office to protect his loot and pelf?

VICTOR F. LAWSON.

According to his own estimate a philanthropist and public-spirited citizen whose slogan is "Common decency."

According to the black record on the tax books of Cook County, a hypocrite and a thief.

He cheats the taxpayers each year in dodging taxes on his Daily News $157,738.53. He filches each year on his home $13,785.90. He withholds from the tax funds each year out of what he should pay on his personal property $170,854.65. He will take from the school children and from his much-talked-about "little red schoolhouse" during the life of his corrupt lease, each year, $47,852. With a sanctimonious air and with hypocritical phrases in his newspaper about good citizenship he is corrupting public officials and stealing annually $390,231.08.

Victor F. Lawson, the little red schoolhouse man, the man who preaches morals and virtue and wants to drive corrupt men out of public life!

And what would be the net result of all this? John Wayman is the State's attorney of Cook County, and if he did his duty as he would do if WILLIAM LORIMER was the transgressor, Krutckoff, the chief clerk in the assessor's office, and Victor Lawson would be—and I want the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to hear this—if John Wayman, the State's attorney in the city of Chicago would treat Victor Lawson as he would treat WILLIAM LORIMER if the latter were the transgressor, Victor Lawson and Krutckoff, the chief clerk in the assessor's office, would be in the penitentiary to-day for conspiracy to commit fraud, and so that man should be where the Senator from Missouri suggests, and he would be if we had a State's attorney who was not owned by the trust press of the city of Chicago.

It may be said that this is an indictment against a public official in my own home town. But it is not idle talk. This is not reckless language. The records are here, and I have photographs of them.

But Victor F. Lawson knows that he is not in danger as long as John E. W. Wayman is State's attorney of Cook County. The newspaper trust of Chicago has owned the State's attorney of our county for the past 20 years, and as long as it continues in this ownership they may continue plundering the public treasury indefinitely and with impunity.

These men are not alone in this conspiracy. We have a governor in our great State who had a hand in this from the beginning. But it is not fair to charge men with entering into a conspiracy of this kind unless it can be shown, and shown by the records, that they are so constituted morally that they are capable of such deeds.

Gov. Deneen was the prosecuting attorney in Cook County from 1896 until 1904. The salary of that office is $7,000 a year; in the full two terms, $56,000. In addition to this he was entitled to $5 for each conviction for a misdemeanor and $20 for each conviction for a felony. The fees should have been turned into the school fund except where they were used to pay for the convictions secured in the office. The law provides that the State's attorney shall render an account annually. Deneen did not render his account until the end of the eight years. At the end of the eight years he notified the school board that all together he had collected in fines and forfeitures $243,775.82, and that he had retained every dollar of it. And how?

When a man was indicted, he was indicted for as many counts as the law would permit; and when he was tried and convicted, the school fund was charged up with a conviction on every count in the indictment. In other words, the counts were 20; the conviction 1; he was entitled to $5, and he took $100.

I will give you a few samples of this, with the numbers of the cases, which can be found in the records of Cook County, in the county clerk's office.

Under general No. 49969 four men jointly indicted pleaded guilty to bookmaking. They were fined for so doing. Charles S. Deneen, in making his report to the county court, had that number appear 80 times in his report of that year and collected $400 for that plea of guilty for four men so jointly indicted. The number should have appeared four times; he should have collected $20—a steal of $380.

Under general No. 49970 six persons were jointly indicted and one had his prosecution abandoned. The others pleaded guilty to bookmaking and were fined. That number appears 100 times in the report of Charles S. Deneen for the year 1897, and he took out of the funds in his hands $500 to pay himself for those five convictions. The number should have been reported five times and collected $25—a steal of $475.

Under general No. 56315 twelve persons pleaded guilty to a conspiracy to throw a concern into the hands of trustees. Deneen, himself, through his assistants, had the case stricken off without judgment ever being entered or punishment inflicted. In his report of the year 1899 that number appears 119 times, and he took out of the funds in his hands $595 to pay himself for that case in which no conviction was had. He should not have taken one dollar in these cases.

Under general No. 56151 several persons were charged with keeping a bucket shop. All of them were let go, but two pleaded guilty, and that number appears in his report 62 times and he collected $310 for those 2 convictions. The number should have been reported only twice and he should have collected $10—a steal of $300.

On these four cases he collected in fees	$1,805
On these four cases he was entitled to	55
On these four cases he robbed the school fund of	1,750

How does this money get into the school fund? The law of our State provides that when a man is convicted of gambling for the first offense he shall be fined, for the second offense he shall be sent to jail, and for the third offense he shall be sent to the penitentiary.

Let me tell you how he worked it. One man was tried on the 2d of April, 1903. The number of his case was 62481. Again, on September 16, 1903, he was tried in case No. 70047. The first time there was a $100 fine. The second time, when he should have gone to jail, there was a $100 fine. Again, on September 22, 1903, he was tried for the same offense, the number of the case being 70379. That time he should have gone to the penitentiary, but again there was a $100 fine. Then there are two other cases against the same individual on two separate occasions, or in all five convictions. After the second conviction he should have served a term in the penitentiary.

Example of two cases against gamblers.

	Plea.	Number.	Fine.	Convictions charged.
Apr. 2, 1903	Nolle	62481	$100	3
Sept. 16, 1903	do	70047	100	12
Sept. 22, 1903	do	70379	100	4
Sept. 20, 1904	do	73958	100	2
Sept. 20, 1904	do	74153	100	2
Apr. 10, 1903	do	66244	100	7
Sept. 16, 1903	do	70084	100	4
Sept. 22, 1903	do	70391	100	4
Sept. 20, 1904	do	73851	100	2
Sept. 20, 1904	do	74160	100	2

This money goes into the school fund, so that in the cases where boys and men are sent to the reformatory at Pontiac and to the penitentiary in Joliet and no costs are paid into court, Mr. Deneen had in his strong box this $500 that belonged to the school fund, and he applied against those convictions as much of each of those $100 fines as was necessary to consume all of the $243,000 at the expiration of his term.

It has been said in our State that the supreme court has passed upon the case, and that the court said he was entitled to the fees. But the question of the fees of Gov. Deneen and his right to retain them has never been questioned in any court in the State of Illinois. No court in the State, no officer in the State, has ever examined into that question, and nobody can truthfully state that under the law he is entitled to that money. If the question is ever taken to the supreme court of my State it will say that he is entitled to $5 for every conviction for a misdemeanor and $20 for a conviction for a felony, and the balance should go to the school fund of Cook County. So that if Gov. Deneen had not padded his reports and had them accepted—and they are now in the vaults of the county clerk's office, never having been examined by anybody except the lawyers who made this investigation for me—and had only his fair share, he would have had less than $40,000 and the school fund would have had more than $200,000.

When will the day come that it will be paid in? I can not tell, and it may never be paid in; but I hope some day the people of my State will come to know the truth. When they do, they will rise up in their might and put a man in the county clerk's office who will go through those records and make Gov. Deneen pay into the school fund $200,000 that he now has, which no more belongs to him than this building belongs to me.

In order that he who runs may read, I present herewith a tabulated statement showing the work of—

Ordinarily I should not have taken up the time of the Senate in discussing these men. It is not a part of this case; that is, it is not evidence as to whether or not I am entitled to a seat in this body. As such evidence it is not worth the snap of a finger; but I felt that the Senate should know something about the character of these men and the motives moving Gov. Deneen, Mr. Lawson, and the McCormicks and the Pattersons of the Tribune, so that you might judge whether men of that type would stoop to destroy a man and drive him out of public life as they have tried to drive men whom they never have succeeded in controlling. These men have controlled every important public office in Cook County and every man in Cook County who held an important public office during the last 25 years except only one. Only one man has dared to stand against them, the late Carter H. Harrison. They followed him as relentlessly as they have followed me until men came to look at him and upon him as one of the vilest characters in the city of Chicago, which resulted ultimately in his assassination by an insane man. They have these public officials as servants.

There is Herman H. Kohlsaat, editor of the Record-Herald. I wish I could feel toward all my fellow men and about them as does the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] toward H. H. Kohlsaat. He was never more mistaken in a character in his life. The only difference between Kohlsaat and the balance of them is that he does not always own the power that he wields, so we have occasional intermissions between the periods in which he may assassinate public characters.

But we now have H. H. Kohlsaat, manager of the Record-Herald. He once managed the Chicago Inter Ocean. At that time he came to Washington and delivered the delegation of the State of Illinois in the Republican national convention to Benjamin Harrison. The people of my State in a large majority were in favor of Blaine. I went to the convention as a delegate and proceeded to work to secure votes for Blaine, whom I had never seen in my life and who did not know who I was. Because Kohlsaat had delivered us body and soul and found me working for Blaine, he sent his messenger, a reporter on the paper, to me with this instruction: "Vote for Blaine if you will yourself, but if you do not stop working for him, when we go back home I will drive you out of public life in the State of Illinois."

That was a little over 20 years ago. When we returned he proceeded to carry out his threat. He sent his men into the neighborhood in which I lived, and they went to the grocers, the butchers, the bakers, and the landlords to find out whether LORIMER cheated anybody out of anything. From that day until this he has never failed to grasp every single opportunity afforded him to destroy LORIMER.

It is this combination of men who from the beginning have been behind this prosecution. This combination of men complain only because they can not own LORIMER. Long, long ago could I have been the white-haired boy if I had climbed the steps of the offices of the Newspaper Trust editors and bent my knee at their bidding, become their subservient tool, and helped them to plunder the public treasury in the State of Illinois.

Their power does not stop there. These are the old partners of Victor Lawson, Melville E. Stone, the manager of the Associated Press, and Frank Noyes, of this city, president of the Associated Press, who once managed the Record-Herald in Chicago for Victor Lawson. This combination of trust newspaper editors, working to destroy and controlling absolutely the fountains of information, have sent broadcast to the world distorted statements even more misleading than have been uttered upon the floor of the Senate, and failed to send out the truth when the truth was learned, in order that they might poison the public mind. In Illinois? Oh, no; not in Illinois. In Illinois whenever the question of the integrity of LORIMER has been raised and fought out among the people they have been vanquished; but from Maine to California, where Senators live, they have been creating an impression that the most vile creature God ever placed upon the face of the earth holds by bribery a seat in the Senate.

These men have not only poisoned the fountain of truth but the minds of the people of the country, and even of Senators of the United States, Senators to-day sitting in this body. One Senator just a few days ago asked the question, Have not the people had an opportunity to know? Have they not read it in the columns of the newspapers? Do they not know the facts? Oh, how much is the Senator in error! How much he is in error is attested by his own speech on the floor of the Senate. I call his attention to his own words, and I place no construction upon them. He said:

I am reminded, too, of the case of Mr. C. F. Wiehe, who I believe the evidence shows was advised by Mr. Edward Hines to get out of the State of Illinois because the grand jury was in session.

Then he said:

The wicked generally flee when the grand jury is in session. There is nothing that hurries them up like a grand jury.

I do not believe the Senator intended to misstate the record, but it is a fact that there is not one line in the record, there is not one word in the record, there is not one syllable in the record which justifies that statement. There is something in the record in which Mr. Wiehe is connected, telling others to go out of the State, but not of Edward Hines instructing Mr. Wiehe to go out of the State. I charge the Senator with nothing except that he secured his information from a source that was not reliable. If that can be stated about a Senator of the United States, a Member of this body to-day, who thinks he knows enough about the case to make a speech on the subject, what can be the opinion of the people of the country?

That is only a sample. But we have another sample of it here, an utterance of the Senator who took his seat just before I rose. Let me read that to you. He said:

I call attention, sir, to his testimony—

Referring to Edward Hines—

In it Mr. Hines declared not that he engaged in this matter as a common Republican, a rank-and-file party man, but that he went from Washington—he went from Washington to Chicago and to Springfield as the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the President of the United States and of Nelson W. Aldrich.

Now, mark this—

The effort of the men prosecuting this case has been for months to prove that Edward Hines had been in Springfield. But every member of the committee, those of the minority as well as those of the majority, will agree that the testimony in the record or that the testimony given before the committee demonstrated the fact that Edward Hines never was in Springfield during the senatorial election. He had not been there for three years prior nor until two years subsequent, when he was subpœnaed as a witness before the Helm committee.

Oh, how far-reaching is this trust press! Oh, how did it poison the minds of Senators—Senators who did not hear the testimony!

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LORIMER. Very gladly.

Mr. REED. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, but it is a question of the record, and I do it in the kindliest manner. I want the Senator to know my authority for my statement. I am reading a copy of the transcript of the testimony of Mr. Hines, and I will be glad to cite the Senator to the page:

That was some time in April. He left in a day or two for Springfield. Then Senator Aldrich came to me and told me that President Taft was very anxious to have Congressman LORIMER become a candidate and do all he could to be elected at the earliest date possible; that the tariff bill—so-called Payne-Aldrich tariff bill—was then up in the Senate, and that it was very necessary to have a Senator from Illinois elected at the earliest possible date. He asked me if I would not immediately get into communication with Congressman LORIMER over the long-distance telephone and impress upon his mind that the President was anxious to have him become a candidate and do all he could to be elected.

He then tells about telephoning to the Senator. Then he adds, further on—I am not reading all the testimony—

I think just a very short time prior to his election Senator Aldrich came to me and stated that the President was very nervous about the situation in Illinois; that he had been notified or had been advised that the legislature would adjourn without electing a United States Senator; that they were very anxious to have a Republican elected from Illinois and wanted me to see Congressman LORIMER and see if he could be elected Senator from the State before the legislature adjourned. They asked me to take the train and go to Springfield and meet him.

A little further on he states:

Then, as I stated, I telegraphed Congressman LORIMER that I was leaving Washington for Springfield or Chicago. I arrived in Chicago in the morning that he was elected. I got off the train and went over to the bank and telephoned him on the long-distance telephone and told him I was going down to Springfield to see him and to carry the message to him from the President to impress upon those in Springfield that the administration wanted him to be elected United States Senator at the earliest possible moment. He told me I could save time and accomplish the same purpose if I would call up Gov. Deneen on the long-distance telephone and acquaint him with the message I had from the President.

Now, it was from that transcript, together with other evidence, that I made the statement that he did not claim to go as an ordinary citizen, but that he went as a special representative to Chicago, and I believe I did use the term "and Springfield." If there was any inaccuracy in saying "and Springfield" I withdraw it, but I want to disabuse the Senator's mind of the idea that I got this from the newspapers. I think on reading that one would naturally infer that Mr. Hines was just what I said he was.

Mr. LORIMER. That is what they have tried to show during this whole controversy, that Hines went to Springfield, and that when he went there he went with a bag of money. I did not charge the Senator with knowingly misstating the record. Even if the record is as the Senator has stated it, the members of the committee will bear out the statement I made that all the testimony goes to show that Edward Hines was not in Springfield.

But that, Mr. President, is not the worst result of the lies printed by these newspapers. Here I have the testimony of a Senator of the United States, one who sat as a judge on the committee. Here is the testimony of his opinion of LORIMER before he came to the United States Senate. This is from the Register and Leader, of Des Moines, Iowa, in its edition of Sunday morning, April 16, 1911. It quotes Senator KENYON under the headline "Would Oust LORIMER." This was after Senator KENYON was elected. At home, in his own town, on April 15, 1911, at a reception given him by his constituents, in addressing them he spoke as follows:

I want to take you into my confidence further on one proposition. I have studied to some extent the record in the investigation of Senator LORIMER. It is my conviction that the investigation shows a general scheme of fraud and corruption sufficient to vitiate his election. Nothing is more essential to the perpetuity of our national life than purity in elections. I say to you that I shall vote, if ever given an opportunity—and it is my judgment that the case should be reopened—to oust from the Senate the gentleman who seems to have profited, whether knowingly or not, by such general scheme of fraud and corruption, and if the people of Iowa do not indorse my vote on the subject I will be glad to resign my position and settle down upon my farm.

A Senator elect of the United States, soon to be a Member of the Senate, announces to the people of his State that if given an opportunity he will drive a Senator from the Chamber! He said he had studied the record to some extent. I blame no Senator for holding that opinion if he has not studied the record, but I do say to Senator KENYON that when he thought the case should be reopened, when he was convinced that he should vote to oust the Senator from Illinois, the part of decency at least should have impelled him to keep his already settled purpose to himself, knowing that he would ultimately occupy the solemn position of a judge.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] says that the people are well informed. Was the Senator from Iowa well informed? Nobody will charge Senator KENYON with illiteracy; no man will say that his mind is not keen enough to distinguish right from wrong; but it appears that he has not yet discovered that it was wrong to make that statement before he walked into this Chamber as a Member of the body.

Mr. President, I desire to invite the attention of the Senate to a miserable lie resorted to on the part of these newspaper owners to destroy LORIMER; and, if it is in order, I will ask the Secretary to read an editorial published a few days ago in the Chicago Inter Ocean, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read, as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Editorial printed in the Chicago Inter Ocean Saturday, July 6, 1912.]

A STATEMENT.

PROGRESSIVE HEADQUARTERS,
CLUBROOM 6, CONGRESS HOTEL,
Chicago, June 27, 1912.

EDITOR.

DEAR SIR: You will note that since the Republican national convention only one Chicago newspaper—Senator LORIMER'S Inter Ocean—has come out in support of Taft. The inclosed clippings indicate the attitude of the press in this city.

Yours, truly, MEDILL MCCORMICK.

Because the foregoing communication has been sent out broadcast for the threefold purpose of depreciating the Inter Ocean, President Taft, and Senator LORIMER, we herewith state that the majority of stock in this newspaper is owned and possessed by George W. Hinman, and George W. Hinman alone, and that Senator LORIMER does not now own and never has owned, directly or indirectly, a single dollar's worth of interest in the Inter Ocean.

We apologize to our readers for dignifying the falsehood in question by this editorial reference, but we take it that some recipients of Medill McCormick's letter might otherwise believe it, not realizing that it came from an alcoholic little cad who haunts sanitariums between debauches and whose pus-fed face for months turned men in disgust from his lunch table and caused them to avoid even the tableware which touched his lips.

The name of a degenerate looks as respectable on paper as that of a gentleman, and therefore we are compelled in this case to treat it, not as it is, but as it appears to be.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, that is a sample of the stories of my ownership of the Chicago Inter-Ocean circulated by the McCormick family. Circulated among whom? Circulated among the very men who are to vote on my case, and for no other purpose than to convey to Senators in this Chamber the impression that the news items and the editorials of that newspaper criticizing their public actions were inspired by LORIMER. A Senator sits in this Chamber who years ago was a warm friend of mine, but who of recent years, and especially since he arrived in the Senate, has been as cold toward me as marble. For a year or two I have realized what was running through his mind.

The Inter-Ocean is a stalwart Republican newspaper; it is a constitutional, representative, anti initiative, referendum, and recall Republican newspaper. In the Central West much sentiment has been built up in favor of destroying the institutions of our country, and that paper has opposed not only those socialistic theories of government but the men who advocate them, and has treated them, to some extent, as other newspapers have treated public men; and Members of this body have held the opinion that I was the owner of that paper and that I was trying in season and out of season to destroy their political influence. This is just a sample of it.

Let me say to you, Senators, that if you think you are protected by the friendliness of the editors of the trust press in driving me from this Chamber and that they will in turn aid you in achieving your political ambitions—you may have my name stricken from yonder roll, you may instruct the door tenders that LORIMER may no longer enter here, but you never can change the solemn judgment of the Senate of the Sixty-first Congress in its decision of my right to a seat in this Chamber—but when you have driven me hence and I am forgotten, and the case of LORIMER is no more talked about, oh, beware, the guillotine will be there for you as it is here for me now, whenever you fail to bend your knees to the trust press of this country. It will not stop with LORIMER, but will go on and on until no man dare say that his life is his own. Drive me hence, and in future years take the consequences of putting absolutely in control of this Government the vile, vicious, venal trust press of the country.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], in his statement of his views of the case a few days ago, referred to an incident that occurred in Illinois a few years ago, and he used this language:

I want to call attention to an incident related in Gov. Yates's testimony, which I think is really pathetic. I will not take the time to read it. I think I can state the substance of it. I have it here. He testifies that the speaker of the Illinois Legislature, whose name was Miller, who was his personal friend, came to him in 1903 and told him he had been offered a bribe of $200,000 to expedite the passage of the notorious Mueller bill; that on the governor's advice he publicly exposed the offer to the legislature, whereupon the house appointed an investigating committee and put Miller on trial and censured him for offending the dignity of that body. (Kern's speech, pamphlet form, p. 17.)

And he held that up as an offense which should be abhorred and denounced by all decent men; but the driving of Miller from the speaker's chair, persecuting him, and driving him to his grave was the result of the effort of the newspaper trust of Chicago to pass the Mueller bill in the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, granting a perpetual franchise to the street railway companies. The Senator from Indiana probably did not know the truth; he did not know the facts. There was a riot in the house that day; the speaker was driven from his chair, and Gov. Deneen was among the men who led the riot.

Senator KERN, it would be well when, in an attempt by inference to cast additional suspicion on the right of LORIMER to a seat in this body, you make statements affecting the reputation of the Illinois Legislature, to look well to the truth before you state your suspicions.

To give you an idea as to how far these trust-press editors have gone, I shall read a letter that I received a few days ago from a friend in Chicago, referring to a conversation he had with Andrew Lawrence, editor of the Chicago Examiner, the Hearst morning paper of that town:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 5, 1912.

Hon. WM. LORIMER,
United States Senator from Illinois, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It occurred to me that at this time I should again repeat to you a conversation which was had between Andrew Lawrence, editor of the Chicago Examiner in Chicago, and myself, aboard the Pennsylvania train en route to Washington, just prior to the time when the Senate passed the resolution ordering a reinvestigation of your election. As you will no doubt remember, when I first repeated this conversation to you, you were impressed with the fact that Mr. Lawrence's remarks clearly showed the attitude of the press toward you.

Mr. Lawrence told me that there was absolutely no hope of your retention of your seat in the Senate; that the newspapers were in absolute control, so far as the vote on your case was concerned, and that they would surely have you thrown out of your seat. He said, further, that Senators would be compelled to vote against you regardless of the evidence or merits of the case, because of the fact that their actions would be controlled by the newspapers. He tried especially to impress me with the fact that, although many Senators personally might believe in the integrity of your election and would therefore naturally desire to vote for you, still on account of the control of the newspapers they would not dare to do so.

When I expressed to him my doubt as to the probability of a second investigation of your election being voted by the Senate, he said that the second investigation was already assured, as the newspapers had enough votes to force it through. I can assure you—

And then he goes on to say what the people of Illinois think about this matter. It is signed David L. Frank.

William Hearst's American and Examiner of Chicago, with all the influence of those papers over this land, declared before the resolution was passed to appoint a new committee that it would be passed and that LORIMER would be driven from the Senate of the United States. For what reason? On the merits of the case? Because Senators understood the testimony? No; the papers said because they themselves had the power to make them vote the way they wanted them to vote. Hearst, Lawrence, Lawson, the Pattersons and McCormicks of the Tribune, Herman Kohlsaat, the hired man of Victor Lawson and the editor of the Record-Herald—these are the men who are responsible for the sentiment in this country to-day, and it is with that sort of prosecution this investigation was approached.

Oh, if it be true, as stated in that letter, what man can escape? If it be true, as stated in that letter, of what consequence is it to prove that LORIMER is not here as a result of corrupt methods and practices?

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] said the other day that that was not so; that the men in this Chamber would vote on their convictions; but in the last Senate a Senator-elect from a great State approached an outgoing Senator and pleaded with him to vote against LORIMER. The Senator asked, "Have you ever read the record?" He said, "No; I have never read the record, but the public sentiment of my State and your State demands it." That Senator will vote to turn me out.

Another Senator elect was here in this Chamber at that time. He expressed a wish that he might be here to vote on the case in order to turn LORIMER out, and he admitted that he had never read the record.

Mr. President, I think that if the case were properly understood, Senators would not vote to turn me out, or at least, not all of them, because of their fear of the trust press, or because they have read the lies daily published in the trust press of the country for the last two and a quarter years. They have not read the record, but they will vote as their constituents back home believe they should. I do not blame the constituents for so believing; but I can justly criticize a Senator for not knowing the record. I can justly criticize a Senator for not knowing the record, but not his constituents; I do not blame them for demanding that LORIMER shall be driven out of this body; but I have a right, as a Senator from a sovereign State, with a title to my seat as clear as the title held by any other Senator in this body to have Senators know the record from a careful study of it before they pass judgment in this case.

I have another letter here—and this is the last one I shall read—adding to the statements I have just read about these newspaper editors. This was written by a man who is secretary of the Illinois Tax Reform Association, Maxwell Edgar. Let me tell you before I read the letter who Maxwell Edgar is. The International Harvester people in Chicago, like the Tribune and the other newspapers to which I have referred, were also robbing the public treasury, and Maxwell Edgar organized an association to see to it that tax dodgers should pay their fair share of the taxes. Among the first against whom he started prosecution was the International Harvester Co.; and at the end of a long drawn-out fight, they were compelled to pay into the public treasury of Cook County $500,000 in back taxes and their taxes for the future were raised from $15,000 a year to $75,000 a year. That is the man whose letter I now intend to read as a portion of my remarks:

CHICAGO, July 1, 1912.

Hon. WILLIAM LORIMER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry of the 27th ultimo, relative to the evasion of the payment of capital-stock taxes by certain newspaper corporations of Chicago, the situation in brief is this:

In 1879 the newspapers of Chicago and other corporations induced the legislature to exempt them from the capital-stock tax levied on all other corporations. This was of course unconstitutional and illegal as everyone knew, but no public official had the moral courage to attack it, since the newspapers were among the chief beneficiaries.

In Hub v. Hanberg (211 Ill., 43) the Supreme Court decided against this exemption and caused the newspapers to repair to the legislature of 1905 for another illegal exemption. This new exemption was allowed to become a law—

Yes; it became a law, he says—

by Gov. Deneen and included six classes of corporations. It would be childish on our part to suppose that tax exemptions worth millions of dollars were given by the governor and the legislature without a valuable consideration.

This unlawful exemption has also been knocked out by the Supreme Court in Consolidated Coal Co. v. Miller (236 Ill., 149), People v. National Box Co. (248 Ill., 141), People v. Lewy Bros. Co. (250 id., 613), et al.

In spite of these decisions no newspaper of Chicago has ever paid a capital-stock tax. These corporations are above the laws, and it has hitherto proven impossible to enforce the tax laws against them. The Supreme Court has done its full duty and has honestly and fearlessly laid down the law, but as long as the newspaper and other corporations own all the executive officials, from the governor down, they care little for the opinion of the Supreme Court.

The Chicago Daily News, the Tribune, and the Hearst papers are the main beneficiaries of this tax graft. It is doubtful if any other of the Chicago newspapers have any capital-stock value.

The News has a capital stock of $150,000 (par value), is credited with annual profits averaging $700,000—

In that I am informed the gentleman is mistaken to the extent of about $300,000 a year—and pays taxes on a personal-property assessment—

That was last year—

and pays taxes on a personal-property assessment of $893,105 for 1911. In the so-called Teachers' case Judge Grosscup capitalized the net earnings of the traction companies for taxing purposes at 6 per cent to determine the capital-stock value; but even on a 10 per cent basis this property would be worth $7,000,000, and should be assessed on this amount less its real and personal tangible property. In round figures this property is evading taxes to the amount of $75,000 per annum, and has evaded such taxes pro rata since 1879, and even the supreme court can not prevail against it.

The Tribune Co. is capitalized at $200,000, 200 shares of $1,000 par. Its personal-property assessment of 1911 was $432,000. Its capital-stock value is from $7,500,000 to $10,000,000, and it should be assessed on this basis less its tangible property.

For three years this association has been pushing these tax suits in the courts, but the writs of mandamus of the circuit court and the mandate of the supreme court secured by us are powerless against these powerful organizations of newspapers, who can—

"Who can," he says, and then he says they "do"— who can and do corrupt legislatures, bulldoze public officials, and terrorize judges and courts.

The Chicago Herald Co., with $3,000,000 capital stock, is understood to have no capital-stock value over and above its tangible property.

Some light on the capital-stock values of these papers might be had by consulting the "net annual income" reports, under the new corporation-tax law, if the Treasury officials will permit it.

One thing is certain: These newspapers have taken advantage of their power to compel the legislature to grant them unlawful tax exemptions and have successfully coerced the taxing officials of Cook County so that they never have been assessed on their capital stock and have paid taxes only on a part of their tangible property.

In addition, the Tribune and the News have their cheap leases from the school fund, and it is a melancholy fact that on the only occasion when the community of Chicago by a lucky chance fell heir to a piece of so-called unearned increment in the shape of school lands the said increment was juggled away from the community to enrich these newspaper proprietors.

The story of Chicago newspaper greed and graft is a long and involved one and can not be told in a letter, but the above may give you some idea of its main outlines as applied to the tax situation.

Respectfully, yours,

MAXWELL EDGAR, Secretary.

There is a letter from a man who has no interest in political parties, and the only interest he takes in public affairs is to see to it that each man pays his just share of the taxes. Maxwell Edgar is his name. He wants the people to know. Therefore he sends the information here, because he knows that no newspaper will publish these facts and he hopes that through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the people of the country may come to know and turn on these men and compel them to do as they would insist that others shall do—obey the law.

More public sentiment, more manufactured public sentiment, more spurious public sentiment, manufactured out of whole cloth; unadulterated falsehoods. I read from an address of the President:

I submit to the people of Massachusetts that, with his intimate knowledge of the facts, Mr. Roosevelt's linking my name with LORIMER'S for the purpose of inducing the people of Illinois to vote against me on account of their feeling against Senator LORIMER was not giving me a square deal.

So spoke the President, and then he went on a little further and stated:

The issues arising out of this contest have colored in every way the politics of Illinois and aroused a strong feeling against Senator LORIMER among the Republicans of the State. In Illinois Mr. LORIMER was conducting a campaign of his own, with his own nominees. * * * Any influence he may have given in my favor was not because he liked me, but because he felt more bitter toward Mr. Roosevelt.

It is not the fact. Never have I announced publicly, so that it might go to the ears of the President, my feeling toward him or toward Theodore Roosevelt; and I did not support the President because I was more bitter toward Theodore Roosevelt.

I shall not discuss whether or not I was bitter toward either of them or felt any animosity toward either. The reason I supported the President was because I believe, as he believes, in constitutional and representative government. I believe, as he believes, that the courts of the land and their decisions should not be subject to review by the mob. It was because he wrote on that subject and submitted to the Senate a message the equal of which, in my opinion, never has been written in the history of this country, not even excepting the Federalist papers; it was because he stands for the perpetuity of the institutions of this Government that I chose him as against Theodore Roosevelt. If he had held the same opinions that Col. Roosevelt does I should not have voted for either of them, nor would I lend what little influence I have to either of them.

But when the President took that letter into Massachusetts and read it, unless I have been misinformed, he was misstating the facts in the case. I hope I have been misinformed. Word came to me that the President had been told that if a law providing for a preferential vote on nominations for President were passed by the Legislature of Illinois, and the people of the State had an opportunity to vote on the question, the only delegates he would get out of the 58 would be those that came from the territory where LORIMER'S friends live. The only delegates he did get were from the district in which I was reared and have lived since I was 10 years old.

Why make that statement to the people of Massachusetts? If he did not know the facts and if I have been misinformed, why did the men who told him, or who told me that they informed him, permit him to go into the State of Massachusetts and misstate the condition in Illinois?

It was known to the men from Illinois who were conducting the campaign; and they permitted the President to go over the country creating false sentiment by misstating facts, again drawing down upon the head of LORIMER the wrath of the people of the Nation in order that he might prove to the people that he is more reckless and more unjust than Col. Roosevelt.

I do not believe the fact that LORIMER supported Taft cost Taft one vote in the primary election in Illinois, much less a delegate in the convention. As a rule, Illinois is a Republican State. We are protectionists. We are a manufacturing State, and we are one of the great agricultural States of the Union. The Canadian reciprocity was not acceptable either to the farmers or to the industrial people of our State, and they did not feel kindly to the President on account of it. They voted for Theodore Roosevelt 2 to 1, but it was not a vote for Roosevelt the man, and I will say it was not a vote against President Taft as a man. It was a vote against Canadian reciprocity or free trade in any form. If Roosevelt had not been a candidate, Senator LA FOLLETTE, who received only a few thousand votes, would have carried the State against President Taft.

If the men with whom I am associated in politics in Illinois, who believe in representative and constitutional government and who would vote for the most violent enemy they have in the world to aid in perpetuating this Government, had not voted for the President, he would not have received many more votes in Illinois than he received in the primary in South Dakota.

That is how the sentiment grows. That is how the sentiment is built up. For who will disbelieve the President of the United States? He is here on the ground. The people of the Nation believe that he would not willfully misstate any case, and they are justified in accepting what he says on account of their opinion and their high appreciation of a man of any political party who can attain that high office. So is it any wonder that not only the people of the country, but the people of the world, believe that LORIMER should be driven from the Senate?

I am not going to read the whole letter, but I will ask permission to have it inserted as part of my remarks:

[Personal.]

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 6, 1911.

Hon. THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
The Outlook, 287 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR THEODORE: It comes to me, perhaps without foundation, that you are going to write a strong article on the Lorimer case and publish it in The Outlook. I have been doing everything I could legitimately to have the closest examination made into the Lorimer case. I have read as much of the evidence as I could get at and am convinced that there was a mess and mass of corruption upon which his election was founded that ought to be stamped with the disapproval of the Senate. But I want the movement to oust him to succeed. I have urged different Senators to read the record carefully, and after a talk with ROOT, and BURTON, and KNUTE NELSON, and CRAWFORD, and some others, I believe we are going to line up a good many of the regular Republicans on the side of what I consider decency and honesty in politics.

It has leaked out that I have been taking some interest in the matter, and I fear that it has not helped the situation generally, because of that strong feeling of clubdom in the Senate and that resentment against outside interference which nobody who is not intimately acquainted with the situation can understand the weight of. I was talking with BORAH this morning. I have consulted a good deal with him on the subject, and he and I agree that it would be unwise either for you or for me to come out now against LORIMER and in favor of his being ousted; that it would enable those who are determined to keep him in, especially, among the Democrats, BAILEY and others, to use an argument against outside interference that would hold a number of Democrats and would deprive us of the strength we should get by a quiet presentation of the full facts on the floor of the Senate, from the Senate itself. ROOT is going to make a speech. So is BURTON, and I believe that LODGE will do the same thing. Now, nothing would have stronger weight than speeches from them; whereas, if either you or I came out with an attack it would enable the friends of LORIMER to shift the subject from the tainted character of his seat to the independence of the Senate in acting as the judge of the qualifications of its own Members.

I suggest, therefore, that if you have an article on this subject, you hold it until after the issues are more plainly made by speeches on the floor of the body in which the contest is to be won. I want to win. So do you. This is my excuse for writing you.

Sincerely, yours,

WILLIAM H. TAFT.

P. S.—Of course, I may be misinformed as to your purpose in this matter.

Since dictating the above I have had the telephone conversation with you, but I let it go.

As to the desirability of decency and honesty in politics, I agree with the President. But before I vote to settle the question of decency and honesty I will not, as a judge, read merely "all the testimony I can get." I will either read it all, or I will give the benefit of the doubt to the accused.

I challenge no Senator for casting his vote against me in the last Congress. I complain about no Senator, nor have I any ill will or bitterness in my heart toward any Senator who cast his vote against me in the last Congress. But it does seem to me that when I was on trial I should have been tried by the Senate and not by President Taft and ex-President Roosevelt.

A little further along he said:

I have talked with BORAH this morning. He thinks it would be unwise for ex-President Roosevelt to write the letter.

He said:

ROOT is to make a speech. So is BURTON, and I believe that LODGE will do the same.

I had no objection to their making speeches. Senator BURTON knew more about this case before I came to the Senate than any other man in the Senate. I served upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the House with him. Every week I visited Washington during that session of Congress I discussed the Illinois conditions with him, and he knows, because I told him, that Gov. Deneen would not be a candidate; that I would try to induce my friends to join with other men to elect Shurtleff to the United States Senate, and had the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] been informed by Members of the Senate who know the facts he never would have stated that LORIMER organized the legislature for the purpose of electing himself to the United States Senate.

I object not to Senator LODGE's vote against me; but surely when a Democrat votes for me for the same reason and for the same consideration that another Democrat votes for Senator LODGE, I am entitled to the same consideration of opinion as to that vote or that class of votes as people give to him. There was a fight in Massachusetts. There were belligerent Republican members of the general assembly. LODGE's friends feared that some of them might vote against him. There were Democrats in that State who believed in Senator LODGE and in the things he stood for. They believed in his ideas concerning the foreign policy of this country, and rather than have another Republican, if it became necessary, enough of them would have voted for him to assure his election to this body.

In the Illinois General Assembly there were 26 Democrats who held the same view toward LORIMER. They knew that LORIMER's ideas of the proper American foreign policy were similar to those of the Senator from Massachusetts, and, if anything, that he would go a little further in the matter of making treaties with foreign governments. Twenty-three of those Democrats voted for me. Two more would have voted for me if we had had a second roll call. One Democrat voted in Massachusetts. That was notice to the belligerent Republicans that the Democrats were not afraid to vote for a Republican who had the courage to stand for what they regarded the historic doctrine of this Government, "no entangling alliance" with any foreign Government upon the face of the earth.

There was no complaint of Senator LODGE or with Senator LODGE. If to-morrow I were a member of the Massachusetts Legislature and a Democrat and he a candidate and his success threatened, though he cast his vote against me, because of what I know of his opinions on our form of government I would cast my vote to retain him in this body.

"ROOT is going to make a speech," said President Taft.

I have no complaint with Senator ROOT's action. I do not criticize him on account of his vote. He had a right to vote that way if in his opinion I was not entitled to a seat in this body.

Senator ROOT, I have only one criticism of your action, and that was when Kohlsaat brought to you the information that they had found the source of the corruption fund, even though you believed I was guilty, even though you believed I should be put out, you should have given me an opportunity to answer the charge. That, I hope, had no influence in making up your opinion; but it was likely to influence any human being.

I should have had an opportunity in the last Congress to answer these charges, and if so I would not be here to-day discussing this subject, taking up the time of Senators, depriving them of the opportunity to go on with the business of the country. I either would have been turned out and the case closed forever or I would have been here with my title to a seat unquestioned.

I will not condemn Senator ROOT even for that action. No man can tell what he will do in a given case until he is put to the test. It may be that I am too harsh when I say that I think he should have given me a hearing, and that the charges should not have been used against me without my knowledge. Surely, I never would have allowed any man to give me information on which I fear I might have based some of my opinion in making up my judgment on the case unless he gave me the privilege of divulging it to the man against whom the charges were alleged.

Mr. Kohlsaat, the man who started the Funk story, said that it was given to him in confidence and he held it as sacred as a Catholic priest would a confession. Then he proceeded to give it to Theodore Roosevelt, to whom he told the name of the man who told the story.

Mr. Roosevelt attended a dinner in Chicago. I will not discuss it except to say that Mr. Roosevelt said that LORIMER was elected by corruption; that a man in whom he had the most implicit confidence told him; and to a large extent the people who believe in Roosevelt believed that story. He said that LORIMER should be turned out of the Senate, and that he intended to do all he could to oust him. He had never read a line of the record in his life.

Roosevelt says that he wants to get rid of the bosses; he wants to get rid of men who are corrupting politics. Oh, yes; he wants to get rid of the corrupt men in politics. He does not want them on his side. No; because it is not right to have corrupt men on his side, and especially is that so if the people know it.

I am a little fatigued, and if there be no objection I will ask the Secretary to read the affidavits I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THREE DELEGATES ON OATH CHARGE BRIBE ATTEMPT—NEGRO REPRESENTATIVES OF MISSISSIPPI SWEAR THAT CHARLES BANKS, THE RECENT ROOSEVELT RECRUIT, OFFERED THEM MONEY TO SUPPORT COLONEL.

SHUMPERT'S AFFIDAVIT.

The following is the affidavit of J. W. Shumpert, D. D., presiding elder in the Meridian (Miss.) Methodist Episcopal Church conference and a delegate to the national Republican convention from the first district of Mississippi:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, city of Chicago, ss:

On Thursday, June 13, 1912, at the Coliseum, in the city of Chicago, Ill., I was met by Charles Banks, of Mississippi, and a delegate from that State to the national Republican convention, who asked me to call at his house, 2959 Wabash Avenue, Chicago. I went to his house at 5 o'clock the same afternoon, and when I entered his room he asked everybody to leave except me. He began the conversation by asking me if I had ever seen a thousand-dollar bill. I replied that I had not. He then put his hand in his pocket and brought out a big roll of bills. The outside bill was one of the denomination of $1,000. It was the first I had ever seen. The roll of bills was nearly all gold certificates.

He then wanted to know how much I would ask to go with him and support Mr. Roosevelt. I told him that I would not be bought; that I had not come to Chicago to sell myself. He then said that all or a majority of the delegates were going to Roosevelt, who would be nominated, and that Mr. Roosevelt would make him the referee in Mississippi in connection with all the Federal offices. I repeated that I would not be a party to such a transaction and then excused myself. There was no further conversation between us.

Dated this 17th day of June, 1912.

BUCKLEY'S AFFIDAVIT.

The affidavit of A. Buckley, of Enterprise, Miss., and a delegate from the fifth congressional district of Mississippi, follows:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, County of Cook, City of Chicago, ss:

A. Buckley, being first duly sworn, makes oath and says that he lives in Enterprise, Miss., in the fifth congressional district, and that he is a delegate to the Republican convention at Chicago, and that he was instructed, both by the congressional convention and by the State convention, for Taft. On Saturday, June 15, 1912, that Dr. S. D. Redman, of Jackson, Miss., at the Coliseum, asked me whether I would go with him for Roosevelt; that he would surely win, and "you want to be on the winning side," and that if I would go for Roosevelt he would make me and Dr. E. E. Howard referees for the fifth congressional district, which means the distribution of patronage, and help me out with $300 or $400. I told him I could not be with him. Then on to-day (Monday) S. D. Redman wanted to know if I was going with him or hold out for Taft, and I told him I could not go with him under any circumstances.

Then, on Friday, June 14, Charles Banks, of Mound Bayou, Miss., who is a delegate at large from Mississippi and who was instructed by the State convention to vote for Taft, told me Mr. Roosevelt would sure win and he did not like the way things were carried on in Mississippi, and if I would go with Roosevelt he would give me $100 cash and $100 on first day of convention and $100 second day of convention. At the same time Mr. Banks pulled out a roll of greenbacks and said: "I have the money and I will give you $100 now." I saw the $100 bill on the outside of the roll. I make this of my own free will, believing in a square deal.

DR. SHERROD'S STATEMENT.

Dr. D. W. Sherrod, a practicing physician of Meridian, Miss., last night made the following affidavit. Dr. Sherrod is an alternate from the fifth congressional district of Mississippi to the Chicago convention.

STATE OF ILLINOIS,
County of Cook, City of Chicago, ss:

I, D. W. Sherrod, being duly sworn, do say:

I met Dr. S. D. Redmond, from Jackson, Miss., to-day in front of the Coliseum and he said he knew I had the influence with A. Buckley, the delegate from my district, the fifth, and to bring A. Buckley over to the Roosevelt side, and that he would make Dr. E. E. Howard, A. Buckley, and me, referees of the fifth congressional district and any other consideration I might desire. I said, Mr. Buckley is instructed for President Taft by our congressional and State conventions, and I can't ask him to do this. Mr. Ed Bond, of Canton, Miss., saw me last Sunday, and wanted me to use my influence to bring the Taft delegates over to the Roosevelt side; that they have arranged to get any amount of money necessary, from $700 to $2,000, or any amount required; that Roosevelt's managers had sent for me; and that Mr. DIXON was out, but would be back in a few moments, but I excused myself when I found out what they wanted, as I wanted the delegates who were instructed for President Taft to stay with him.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, I have two affidavits and a letter of more recent date. It can not be charged that they are used for convention purposes; and, if there be no objection, I will ask the Secretary to read them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF GEORGIA, County of Henry, ss:

On this 27th day of June, 1912, before me, J. A. Fouche, clerk superior court, appeared R. A. Holland, who, after being duly sworn, deposes and says that he was a delegate to the national Republican convention from the State of Georgia; that on the 21st day of June, 1912, while in attendance at said convention in the city of Chicago, he was approached by Dr. L. Brinson at Chicago, Ill., who carried him to the Roosevelt headquarters, where he was met by Senator DIXON, McHarg, and Kincaid. DIXON went out. McHarg introduced Kincaid as a millionaire, who said:

"We are here to represent Mr. Roosevelt; are ready to do business; and whatever you boys want we are ready to give it to you. If you will vote with us to-morrow for the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt, whatever you want I will see that you get it."

I refused to name any amount or to accept one cent from him.

On this 27th day of June, 1912, before me, T. J. Culpepper, deputy clerk superior court, appeared R. B. Butts, who, after being duly sworn, deposes and says he was a delegate to the national Republican convention from the State of Georgia; that on the 19th day of June, 1912, while in attendance at said convention in the city of Chicago, he was sent for by Dr. L. Brinson, and went to his room at Chicago, Ill., who said to him, "We want you to vote with us to-day, to-morrow, and the next day, and if you will there will be $500 in it for you for each day, and if the convention lasts another day there will be another $500 for you." Deponent further says that he spurned the offer and turned and left the room, when he was accosted by Mr. Clark Grier, who said to him, "You are a damnder fool than I thought you were."

STATESBORO INDUSTRIAL HIGH SCHOOL FOR THE TRAINING OF THE COLORED YOUTH,
Statesboro, Bulloch County, Ga., July 4, 1912.

I was a delegate to the Republican national convention from the first district of Georgia, and that I was approached and requested to bolt my instruction and vote for certain proposition with the Roosevelt faction, for which I was offered money.

WM. JAMES.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, I do not introduce those affidavits as proof that I am in any way entitled to a seat in the Senate. They have no bearing at all on this case, and should have no influence on anybody's mind; they should have no controlling influence over any United States Senator; but I merely introduce them so that the people of the country may have an opportunity to observe the hypocrisy which is running rampant throughout this land. The man who will have no political boss around him, the man who would destroy every political corruptionist, has naught on which to base anything that he may say regarding my case one-hundredth part as much as those affidavits tend to show that he would have won a Republican presidential nomination if his friends could have secured it by the corrupt use of money.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Illinois has been speaking now for about three hours in this heated Chamber. He is almost exhausted, and it is impossible for him to conclude his remarks to-day. It is for that reason that I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. BAILEY. Make it 11 o'clock. We will get through anyway to-morrow.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Ten o'clock is too early.

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason for fixing the hour of 10 o'clock is that there are a number of Senators who desire to leave the city to-morrow, and they want to remain here to vote. They are afraid they may not have an opportunity to do so unless an early hour is fixed for meeting to-morrow.

Mr. BACON. I suggest that the hour be fixed to suit the convenience of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Illinois was perfectly willing that the hour should be at 10 o'clock, but if he desires to change it——

Mr. LORIMER. My preference would be to suit the convenience of Senators who have to leave the city to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m., Thursday, July 11) the Senate took a recess until Friday, July 12, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 11, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite and eternal Spirit, above all, through all, and in us all, make us susceptible to Thy holy influence that under the trying weather conditions and untoward circumstances which may arise, we may subdue our passions, control our will, and exercise all patience and forbearance; that we may do our work with credit to ourselves and reflect glory and honor upon our Maker. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

STEAMER "DAMARA."

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Speaker lay before the House the bill (S. 7015) to provide American registry for the steamer Damara.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 7015, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 7015) to provide American registry for the steamer Damara.

The SPEAKER. Is it a Senate bill?

Mr. POST. It is a Senate bill which has passed the Senate, and a like bill has been reported by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] states that this is a Senate bill, and that a bill exactly like it has been reported from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House. The Chair makes that statement so that the Members can understand. What motion has the gentleman to make?

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Under the rule, of course, it is laid before the House for consideration and does not require unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The bill is laid before the House for consideration.

Mr. MANN. I suppose it will have to be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I suppose this will not displace the bill that was to be considered at this time to-day.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. POST] is ill, and has been ill, and he wanted to get the matter disposed of.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no disposition to object.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 7015) to provide American registry for the steamer Damara.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Navigation is hereby authorized and directed to cause the steamer Damara, rebuilt at San Francisco, Cal., from the wreck of the British steamer Damara, wrecked in the harbor of San Francisco and abandoned by her owners as a total wreck, to be registered as a vessel of the United States, whenever it shall be shown to the Commissioner of Navigation that the cost of rebuilding said vessel in the United States amounted to three times the actual cost of said wreck and that the vessel is wholly owned by citizens of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to consume the time of the House with this bill owing to the other matters that are coming up. Personally, I favor the passage of the bill. I telephoned to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], who have heretofore objected to unanimous consent for the consideration of the House bill, but forgot to telephone to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], who favors the passage of the bill. As none of them is present, I do not see what I can do except to call the attention of the House to that situation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was read a third time.

Mr. MANN. I see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is here, and I would like to call his attention to the fact that the Speaker has placed before the House for consideration, in accordance with the rules of the House, Senate bill 7015, to provide American registry for the steamer Damara, being the same as the bill H. R. 22907, now on the House Calendar and pending before the House. If the gentleman desires to be heard on it, doubtless he can be heard now.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I objected to the bill when it came up for unanimous consent, because I thought there ought to be some consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that it had passed the stage of objection, and the next thing to do with the bill is to vote on it.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

Mr. POST. Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the bill H. R. 22907, of similar import, on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. UNDERWOOD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PROCEDURE IN CONTEMPT CASES.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON] is recognized. The Clerk will report by title the bill in relation to procedure in contempt cases.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 22591) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that when the bill was under consideration on Tuesday a substitute was pending under the rule.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is correct. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], my associate on the committee, had a substitute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire to offer the substitute?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. I think I offered it the other day. I offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER. Has it already been read?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; it has been read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-three Members are present—not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. On this roll call those in favor of passing this bill will answer "yea" and those opposed "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 234, nays 18, answered "present" 10, not voting 127, as follows:

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. DYER, and therefore I desire to withdraw my affirmative vote and to vote present.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. BARTLETT, which I always keep faithfully, but the gentleman has instructed me on this vote and therefore I have voted. If the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] were here he would have voted for this bill, as I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I have a general pair with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. HARDWICK. He informs me that upon this bill he would vote aye. I therefore will permit my affirmative vote to stand, knowing that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] would also have voted in the affirmative if he were here.

On this vote the yeas are 234, nays 18, present 10. The bill is passed. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the contempt bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Committee on the Judiciary may be allowed to extend their remarks on the contempt bill, and also I include in that request such Members as made speeches on the bill, as well as the members of the committee who did not make speeches on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the members of the Judiciary Committee, as well as all gentlemen who spoke on the contempt bill, be permitted to extend remarks in the RECORD on that bill.

Mr. MANN. For five days.

The SPEAKER. For five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the concurrent resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House concurrent resolution.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk be directed, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 23515) entitled "An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors," to strike out the word "of," where it first appears in the fourth line of the title to said bill, and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I know what this case is. This is the bill we recalled from the President the other day. Has the signature of the Speaker to the enrolled bill been canceled or has there been any authorization to that effect?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the signature of the Speaker and the signature of the President pro tempore of the Senate have not been canceled on that bill, and the Chair knows of no authorization to do it.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that in a case of that sort there is a resolution authorizing the cancellation of the signatures and the enrollment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is to allow the Clerk to insert the word "and" instead of the word "of."

Mr. MANN. I understand the purpose, but the bill has already been enrolled and that enrollment ought to be canceled, I think.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, too, and after this resolution is passed the Chair will entertain a motion.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether it would require a resolution or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he remembers whether or not the resolution recalling this bill authorized the Speaker and the President pro tempore of the Senate to cancel their signatures?

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that it does not.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It does not.

The SPEAKER. If it does not, it will take a concurrent resolution to do it, in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. MANN. I think perhaps the gentleman from Alabama had better withhold his resolution until the engrossing clerk can look the matter up.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will do so, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. If the old bill stands with the signature of the Speaker and the President pro tempore of the Senate, and the President of the United States does not sign it, and there is nothing done about it, it becomes a law within 10 days.

PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. QUEZON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the preface of a book on the Philippine Islands, written by Judge Blount.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from the Philippine Islands asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the document to which he refers.

Mr. MANN. How long is it?

Mr. QUEZON. About 2,000 words.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reference of the bill H. R. 25689, a bill declaring that persons, firms, or corporations in any manner engaged in the interstate-commerce business who shall become engaged or concerned in the fixing of prices of any foodstuffs contrary to the rules of competition shall be guilty of a felony, and providing for their punishment, may be changed from the Committee on Agriculture to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to change the reference of the bill H. R. 25689 from the Committee on Agriculture to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I did not catch the reading of the full title of the bill, but only partially. It seems to me that it ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk reported the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. On what ground does the gentleman from Alabama base his claim?

Mr. CLAYTON. It seems to me to be in the nature of an amendment of statutory law.

Mr. LAMB. I examined it pretty carefully this morning, and I thought it ought to go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, it relates to the Sherman antitrust law that the House has already sent to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama objects to the request.

Mr. LAMB. Then, Mr. Speaker, I renew my request to transfer it from the Committee on Agriculture to the Committee on the Judiciary. All I want to do is to get rid of it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to change the reference of this bill from the Committee on Agriculture to the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object. I believe that it ought to go to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Virginia proposed to have it changed from the Committee on Agriculture to the committee where it belongs, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Alabama objected.

Mr. LAMB. Very well, Mr. Speaker, I will send it some where else.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am willing for the Speaker to decide the question, now or hereafter, and let it go where he may determine.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the House for its own guidance that sometimes there is a bill that looks like it might be referred to two committees, and in this case and a few other cases it looks as if it might be referred to any one of three committees. The Chair will determine the matter hereafter.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RUSSELL, indefinitely, on account of illness.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the resolution referred to in the privileged report, No. 946, in the matter of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, judge of the United States Commerce Court, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 622.

Resolved, That Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 36, 540), and having duly qualified and having been duly commissioned and designated on the 31st day of January, 1911, to serve for four years in the Commerce Court, be impeached for misbehavior and for high crimes and misdemeanors; and that the evidence heretofore taken by the Committee on the Judiciary under House resolution 524 sustains 13 articles of impeachment which are hereinafter set out; and that said articles be, and they are hereby, adopted by the House of Representatives, and that the same shall be exhibited to the Senate in the following words and figures, to wit:

Articles of impeachment of the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the name of themselves and of all of the people of the United States of America against Robert W. Archbald, additional circuit judge of the United States from the third judicial circuit, appointed pursuant to the act of June 18, 1910 (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 36, 540), and having duly qualified and having been duly commissioned and designated on the 31st day of January, 1911, to serve for four years in the Commerce Court:

ARTICLE 1.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, being a United States circuit judge, and having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and being then and there a judge of the said court, on March 31, 1911, entered into an agreement with one Edward J. Williams whereby the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams agreed to become partners in the purchase of a certain culm dump, commonly known as the Katydid culm dump, near Moosic, Pa., owned by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a corporation, and one John M. Robertson, for the purpose of disposing of said property at a profit. That pursuant to said agreement, and in furtherance thereof, the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake, by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise, to induce and influence, and did induce and influence, the officers of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and of the Erie Railroad Co., a corporation, which owned all of the stock of said coal company, to enter into an agreement with the said Robert W. Archbald and the said Edward J. Williams to sell the interest of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in the Katydid culm dump for a consideration of $4,500. That during the period covering the several negotiations and transactions leading up to the aforesaid agreement the said Robert W. Archbald was a judge of the United States Commerce Court, duly designated and acting as such judge; and at the time aforesaid and during the time the aforesaid negotiations were in progress the said Erie Railroad Co. was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce and was a party litigant in certain suits, to wit, the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38, and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 39, then pending in the United States Commerce Court; and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing these facts, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly took advantage of his official position as such judge to induce and influence the officials of the said Erie Railroad Co. and the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary corporation thereof, to enter into a contract with him and the said Edward J. Williams as aforesaid, for profit to themselves, and that the said Robert W. Archbald, then and there, through the influence exerted by reason of his position as such judge, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did induce the officers of said Erie Railroad Co. and of the said Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to enter into said contract for the consideration aforesaid.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 2.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, on the 1st day of August, 1911, was a United States circuit judge, and, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, was then and there a judge of said court.

That at the time aforesaid the Marian Coal Co., a corporation, was the owner of a certain culm bank at Taylor, Pa., and was then and there engaged in the business of washing and shipping coal; that prior to that time the said Marian Coal Co. had filed before the Interstate Commerce Commission a complaint against the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. and five other railroad companies as defendants, charging said defendants with discrimination in rates and with excessive charges for the transportation of coal shipped by the said

Marian Coal Co. over their respective lines of road; that all of the said defendant companies were common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. That the decision of the said case by the Interstate Commerce Commission at the instance of either party thereto was subject to a review, under the law, by the United States Commerce Court; that one Christopher G. Boland and one William P. Boland were then the principal stockholders of the said Marian Coal Co. and controlled the operation of the same, and they, the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, employed one George M. Watson as an attorney to settle the case then pending as aforesaid in the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co.; and at the time aforesaid there was pending in the United States Commerce Court a certain suit entitled "The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 38," to which suit the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. was a party litigant.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being judge as aforesaid and well knowing these facts, did then and there engage for a consideration to assist the said George M. Watson to settle the aforesaid case then pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission and to sell to the said Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. the said two-thirds of the stock of the said Marian Coal Co., and in pursuance of said engagement the said Robert W. Archbald, on or about the 10th day of August, 1911, and at divers other times and at different places, did undertake, by correspondence, by personal conferences, and otherwise, to induce and influence the officers of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. to enter into an agreement with the said George M. Watson for the settlement of the aforesaid case and the sale of said stock of the Marian Coal Co.; and the said Robert W. Archbald thereby willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as such judge in the attempt to settle said case and to sell said stock of the said Marian Coal Co. to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a high crime and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 3.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about October 1, 1911, did secure from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., a corporation, which coal company was then and there owned by the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and which railroad company was at that time a party litigant in certain suits then pending in the United States Commerce Court, to wit, The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. et al. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 38, and The Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission et al., No. 49, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald, an agreement which permitted said Robert W. Archbald and his associates to lease a culm dump, known as Packer No. 3, near Shenandoah, in the State of Pennsylvania, which said culm dump contained a large amount of coal, to wit, 472,670 tons, and which said culm dump the said Robert W. Archbald and his associates agreed to operate and to ship the product of the same exclusively over the lines of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; and that the said Robert W. Archbald unlawfully and corruptly did use his official position and influence as such judge to secure from the said coal company the said agreement.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of a misdemeanor in such office.

ARTICLE 4.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States circuit judge and being a member of the United States Commerce Court, was and is guilty of gross and improper conduct, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor as said circuit judge and as a member of said Commerce Court in manner and form as follows, to wit: Prior to and on the 4th day of April, 1911, there was pending in said United States Commerce Court the suit of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. Said suit was argued and submitted to said United States Commerce Court on the 4th day of April, 1911; that afterwards, to wit, on the 22d day of August, 1911, while said suit was still pending in said court, and before the same had been decided, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully did write a letter to the attorney for the said Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co. requesting said attorney to see one of the witnesses who had testified in said suit on behalf of said company and to get his explanation and interpretation of certain testimony that the said witness had given in said suit, and communicate the same to the said Robert W. Archbald, which request was complied with by said attorney; that afterwards, to wit, on the 10th day of January, 1912, while said suit was still pending, and before the same had been decided by said court, the said Robert W. Archbald, as judge of said court, secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully again did write to the said attorney that other members of said United States Commerce Court had discovered evidence on file in said suit detrimental to the said railroad company and contrary to the statements and contentions made by the said attorney, and the said Robert W. Archbald, judge of said United States Commerce Court as aforesaid, in said letter requested the said attorney to make to him, the said Robert W. Archbald, an explanation and an answer thereto; and he, the said Robert W. Archbald, as a member of said United States Commerce Court aforesaid, did then and there request and solicit the said attorney for the said railroad company to make and deliver to the said Robert W. Archbald a further argument in support of the contentions of the said attorney so representing the said railroad company, which request was complied with by said attorney, all of which on the part of said Robert W. Archbald was done secretly, wrongfully, and unlawfully, and which was without the knowledge or consent of the said Interstate Commerce Commission or its attorneys.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 5.

That in the year 1904 one Frederick Warnke, of Scranton, Pa., purchased a two-thirds interest in a lease on certain coal lands owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., located near Lorberry Junction, in said State, and put up a number of improvements thereon and operated a culm dump located on said property for several years thereafter; that operations were carried on at a loss; that said Frederick Warnke thereupon applied to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. for the mining maps of the said land covered by the said lease, and was informed that the lease under which he claimed had been forfeited two years before it was assigned to him, and his application for said maps was therefore denied; that said Frederick Warnke then made a proposition to George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and president of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to relinquish any claim that he might have in this property under the said lease, provided that the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. would give him an operating lease on what was known as the Lincoln culm bank located near Lorberry; that said George F. Baer referred said proposition to one W. J. Richards, vice president and general manager of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., for consideration and action; that the general policy of the said coal company being adverse to the lease of any of its culm banks, the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards declined to make the lease, and the said Frederick Warnke was so advised; that the said Frederick Warnke then made several attempts, through his attorneys and friends, to have the said George F. Baer and the said W. J. Richards reconsider their decision in the premises, but without avail; that on or about November 1, 1911, the said Frederick Warnke called upon Robert W. Archbald, who was then and now is a United States circuit judge, having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and asked him, the said Robert W. Archbald, to intercede in his behalf with the said W. J. Richards; that on November 24, 1911, the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, pursuant to said request, did write a letter to the said W. J. Richards requesting an appointment with the said W. J. Richards; that several days thereafter the said Robert W. Archbald called at the office of the said W. J. Richards to intercede for the said Frederick Warnke; that the said W. J. Richards then and there informed the said Robert W. Archbald that the decision which he had given to the said Warnke must be considered as final, and the said Archbald so informed the said Warnke; that the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. is owned by the Reading Co., which also owns the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., which last-named company is a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, well knowing all the aforesaid facts, did wrongfully attempt to use his influence as such judge to aid and assist the said Frederick Warnke to secure an operating lease of the said Lincoln culm dump owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., as aforesaid, which lease the officials of the said Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had theretofore refused to grant, which said fact was also well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, shortly after the conclusion of his attempted negotiations with the officers of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., aforesaid, in behalf of the said Frederick Warnke, and on or about the 31st day of March, 1912, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did accept, as a gift, reward, or present, from the said Frederick Warnke, tendered in consideration of favors shown him by said judge in his efforts to secure a settlement and agreement with the said railroad company and the said coal company, and for other favors shown by said judge to the said Frederick Warnke, a certain promissory note for $500 executed by the firm of Warnke & Co., of which the said Frederick Warnke was a member.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as a judge and high crimes and misdemeanor in office.

ARTICLE 6.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being a United States circuit judge and a judge of the United States Commerce Court, on or about the 1st day of December, 1911, did unlawfully, improperly, and corruptly attempt to use his influence as such judge with the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. and the Lehigh Valley Railway Co. to induce the officers of said companies to purchase a certain interest in a tract of coal land containing 800 acres, which interest at said time belonged to certain persons known as the Everhardt heirs.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 7.

That during the months of October and November, A. D. 1908, there was pending in the United States district court, in the city of Scranton, State of Pennsylvania, over which court Robert W. Archbald was then presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a suit or action at law, wherein the old Plymouth Coal Co. was plaintiff and the Equitable Fire & Marine Insurance Co. was defendant. That the said coal company was principally owned and entirely controlled by one W. W. Rissinger, which fact was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; that on or about November 1, 1908, and while said suit was pending, the said Robert W. Archbald and the said W. W. Rissinger wrongfully and corruptly agreed together to purchase stock in a gold-mining scheme in Honduras, Central America, for the purpose of speculation and profit; that in order to secure the money with which to purchase said stock, the said Rissinger executed his promissory note in the sum of $2,500, payable to Robert W. Archbald and Sophia J. Hutchison, which said note was indorsed then and there by the said Robert W. Archbald, for the purpose of having same discounted for cash; that one of the attorneys for said Rissinger in the trial of said suit was one John T. Lenahan; that on the 23d day of November, 1908, said suit came on for trial before said Robert W. Archbald, judge presiding, and a jury, and after the plaintiff's evidence was presented, the defendant insurance company demurred to the sufficiency of said evidence and moved for a nonsuit, and after extended argument by attorneys for both plaintiff and defendant, the said Robert W. Archbald ruled against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff, and thereupon the defendant proceeded to introduce evidence before the conclusion of which the jury was dismissed and a consent judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $2,500, to be discharged upon the payment of $2,129.63 if paid within 15 days from November 23, 1908, and on the same day judgments were entered in a number of other like suits against different insurance companies, which resulted in the recovery of about $28,000 by the Old Plymouth Coal Co.; that before the expiration of said 15 days the said Rissinger, with the knowledge and consent of said Robert W. Archbald, presented said note to the said John T. Lenahan for discount, which was refused and which was later discounted by a bank and has never been paid.

All of which acts on the part of the said Robert W. Archbald were improper, unbecoming, and constituted misbehavior in his said office as judge, and render him guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 8.

That during the summer and fall of the year 1909 there was pending in the United States District Court for the Middle District of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton, over which court the said Robert W. Archbald was then and there presiding as the duly appointed judge thereof, a civil action wherein the Marian Coal Co. was defendant, which action involved a large sum of money, and which defendant coal company was principally owned and controlled by one Christopher G.

Boland and one William P. Boland, all of which was well known to said Robert W. Archbald; and while said suit was so pending the said Robert W. Archbald drew a note for $500, payable to himself, and which note was signed by one John Henry Jones and indorsed by the said Robert W. Archbald, and then and there during the pendency of said suit as aforesaid the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully agreed and consented that the said note should be presented to the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, for the purpose of having the said note discounted, corruptly intending that his name on said note would coerce and induce the said Christopher G. Boland and the said William P. Boland, or one of them, to discount the same because of the said Robert W. Archbald's position as judge and because the said Bolands were at that time litigants in his said court.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his office as judge, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

ARTICLE 9.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, of the city of Scranton and State of Pennsylvania, on or about November 1, 1909, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, in the city of Scranton and State aforesaid, did draw a note in his own proper handwriting, payable to himself, in the sum of $500, which said note was signed by one John Henry Jones, which said note the said Robert W. Archbald indorsed for the purpose of securing the sum of $500, and the said Robert W. Archbald, well knowing that his indorsement would not secure money in the usual commercial channels, then and there wrongfully did permit the said John Henry Jones to present said note for discount, at his law office, to one C. H. Von Storch, attorney at law and practitioner in said district court, which said Von Storch, a short time prior thereto, was a party defendant in a suit in the said district court presided over by the said Robert W. Archbald, which said suit was decided in favor of the said Von Storch upon a ruling by the said Robert W. Archbald; and when the said note was presented to the said Von Storch for discount, as aforesaid, the said Robert W. Archbald wrongfully and improperly used his influence as such judge to induce the said Von Storch to discount same; that the said note was then and there discounted by the said Von Storch, and the same has never been paid, but is still due and owing.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of gross misconduct in his said office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor in his said office as judge.

ARTICLE 1.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge, in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully did accept and receive a large sum of money, the exact amount of which is unknown to the House of Representatives, from one Henry W. Cannon; that said money so given by the said Henry W. Cannon and so unlawfully and wrongfully received and accepted by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, was for the purpose of defraying the expenses of a pleasure trip of the said Robert W. Archbald to Europe; that the said Henry W. Cannon, at the time of the giving of said money and the receipt thereof by the said Robert W. Archbald, was a stockholder and officer in various and divers interstate railway corporations, to wit: A director in the Great Northern Railway, a director in the Lake Erie & Western Railroad Co., and a director in the Fort Wayne, Cincinnati & Louisville Railroad Co.; that the said Henry W. Cannon was president and chairman of the board of directors of the Pacific Coast Co., a corporation which owned the entire capital stock of the Columbia & Puget Sound Railroad Co., the Pacific Coast Railway Co., the Pacific Coast Steamship Co., and various other corporations engaged in the mining of coal and in the development of agricultural and timber land in various parts of the United States; that the acceptance by the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding said office of United States district judge, of said favors from an officer and official of the said corporations, any of which in the due course of business was liable to be interested in litigation pending in the said court over which he presided as such judge, was improper and had a tendency to and did bring his said office of district judge into disrepute.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 11.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, while holding the office of United States district judge in and for the middle district of the State of Pennsylvania, did, on or about the 1st day of May, 1910, wrongfully and unlawfully accept and receive a sum of money in excess of $500, which sum of money was contributed and given to the said Robert W. Archbald by various attorneys who were practitioners in the said court presided over by the said Robert W. Archbald; that said money was raised by subscription and solicitation from said attorneys by two of the officers of said court, to wit, Edward R. W. Searle, clerk of said court, and J. B. Woodward, jury commissioner of said court, both the said Edward R. W. Searle and the said J. B. Woodward having been appointed to the said positions by the said Robert W. Archbald, judge aforesaid.

Wherefore said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 12.

That on the 9th day of April, 1901, and for a long time prior thereto, one J. B. Woodward was a general attorney for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a corporation and common carrier doing a general railroad business; that on said day the said Robert W. Archbald, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and while acting as such judge, did appoint the said J. B. Woodward as a jury commissioner in and for said judicial district, and the said J. B. Woodward, by virtue of said appointment and with the continued consent and approval of the said Robert W. Archbald, held such office and performed all the duties pertaining thereto during all the time that the said Robert W. Archbald held said office of United States district judge, and that during all of said time the said J. B. Woodward continued to act as a general attorney for the said Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; all of which was at all times well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior in office, and was and is guilty of a misdemeanor.

ARTICLE 13.

That Robert W. Archbald, on the 29th day of March, 1901, was duly appointed United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania and held such office until the 31st day of January, 1911, on which last-named date he was duly appointed a United States circuit judge and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court. That during the time in which the said Robert W. Archbald has acted as such United States district judge and judge of the United States Commerce Court he, the said Robert W. Archbald, at divers times and places, has sought wrongfully to obtain credit from and through certain persons who were interested in the result of suits then pending and suits that had been pending in the court over which he presided as judge of the district court, and in suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, of which the said Robert W. Archbald is a member.

That the said Robert W. Archbald, being United States circuit judge and being then and there a judge of the United States Commerce Court, at Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, on the 31st day of March, 1911, and at divers other times and places, did undertake to carry on a general business for speculation and profit in the purchase and sale of culm dumps, coal lands, and other coal properties, and for a valuable consideration to compromise litigation pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and in the furtherance of his efforts to compromise such litigation and of his speculations in coal properties, willfully, unlawfully, and corruptly did use his influence as a judge of the said United States Commerce Court to induce the officers of the Erie Railroad Co., the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., the Lackawanna & Wyoming Valley Railroad Co., and other railroad companies engaged in interstate commerce, respectively, to enter into various and divers contracts and agreements in which he was then and there financially interested with divers persons, to wit, Edward J. Williams, John Henry Jones, Thomas H. Jones, George M. Watson, and others, without disclosing his said interest therein on the face of the contract, but which interest was well known to the officers and agents of said railroad companies.

That the said Robert W. Archbald did not invest any money or other thing of value in consideration of any interest acquired or sought to be acquired by him in securing or in attempting to secure such contracts or agreements or properties as aforesaid, but used his influence as such judge with the contracting parties thereto, and received an interest in said contracts, agreements, and properties in consideration of such influence in aiding and assisting in securing same.

That the said several railroad companies were and are engaged in interstate commerce, and at the time of the execution of the several contracts and agreements aforesaid and of entering into negotiations looking to such agreements had divers suits pending in the United States Commerce Court, and that the conduct and efforts of the said Robert W. Archbald in endeavoring to secure and in securing such contracts and agreements from said railroad companies was continuous and persistent from the said 31st day of March, 1911, to about the 15th day of April, 1912.

Wherefore the said Robert W. Archbald was and is guilty of misbehavior as such judge and of misdemeanors in office.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, when the report was made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CLAYTON], it was stated by him, and properly so, that the resolution would be printed separately as any other resolution. The Clerk has read the resolution from the report. The resolution was not printed separately, through some misunderstanding, probably, on the part of the clerk in charge, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be numbered and printed and reported from the committee as of July 8, 1912, in the ordinary form. It seems to me that that is due to the proper procedure in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this resolution be printed in the usual form, as in the nature of nunc pro tunc proceeding.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois, as I understand it, does not contemplate in that request that this matter shall be postponed for another day?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. It is a privileged matter, and this would not postpone it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that this resolution be printed as the House ordered it to be printed, separately from the report, and that it be numbered properly, as of date July 8, 1912. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose—certainly not at this time—to make any argument or any extended remarks upon the subject matter of the impeachment of Judge Archbald. The committee gave this question the most careful and fullest consideration.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman proceeds with his statement, will he permit me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman able to make a guess as to how long it will be before the resolution comes to a vote in the House?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I think I can. I am sometimes a pretty good guesser, and I might make a fair guess in this case. It is my purpose to consume at this time a few minutes only, unless I shall be interrupted by questions which I may feel compelled to answer. Then it is my purpose to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, my associate on the committee, Mr. STERLING, to make such statement as he may wish—probably an hour. It may be after that that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], a member of the committee; then the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], another member; and then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND], another member, may want to speak for 5 or 10 minutes each. I think that none of them, except possibly the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], will want to speak over 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is desirable that a reasonable statement be made to the House, and I asked the question, because I think, when the resolution comes to a vote, it is due to the dignity of the House that there be a roll call on the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. I agree with the gentleman upon that. In a proceeding of this sort I think we ought to have a roll call.

Mr. FARR. Does not the gentleman from Alabama think that we ought to have a quorum present now, to hear the discussion of so important a case as this?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman stays in the House as long as I have, he will find that even with his eloquent tongue he can not always persuade a quorum to remain here when that quorum understands the question before the House and has pretty well made up their minds as to how they are going to vote. Of course I will feel gratified if there shall remain a full attendance here to listen to what my associates on the committee have to say, but I am sure that whatever may be lacking in the number of this audience will be compensated for by the intelligence of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and others who may be present.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is very fulsome with his compliments, but I want to ask him fairly, with a man's life at stake, such as is the case now with Judge Archbald before this Congress, if we ought not to have a quorum present?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will tell me how to have that quorum present I will be very glad to aid him. It was disclosed by roll call a few minutes ago that there is a quorum present, and I may say to the gentleman that the attendance in the House at this time, I think, averages larger than it has when many other important matters have been discussed.

The important point will be the presence of a quorum when the matter is voted upon. And, lest the gentleman intends by what he has said to let the newspaper press convey a wrong impression, I will say that on the 8th day of this month the report in full and the conclusions of the committee, together with a brief statement by the chairman of the committee, were presented to the House, printed in the RECORD, and every Member of the House who has cared to inform himself on this important matter has all the necessary information from the RECORD, and the gentleman, I believe, ought to get from that report and from what has heretofore been said, all the necessary information, if he has not already obtained it. Now, there has been no disposition on the part of the committee, there has been no disposition on the part of the House to do anything with any indecent haste. The committee gave the amplest time for the examination into the facts and into the law involved in the case. The committee gave ample time for this House to consider this report and this matter before asking the House to act upon it. Seventy-two hours, I believe, or longer, have intervened since this matter was printed and made accessible to every Member of the House, and I think that the House quite well understands the subject.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the conduct of this impeachment proceeding has conformed to the conduct of impeachment proceedings in other cases as near as practicable and has conformed in its details to the precedents in like cases in every essential particular. The evidence taken by the committee was printed, all of it, more than a month ago, and has been accessible to every Member of this House, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows. The committee was clothed by the House with authority to subpœna witnesses and to administer oaths to those witnesses and to examine them. This was done. Every witness that the committee was informed who knew about these various transactions was required to attend the sessions of the committee, was put under oath, and subjected to examination by the committee and to cross-examination by counsel for Judge Archbald. In the very beginning of this investigation, Mr. Speaker, before a witness was examined, the committee agreed to the following, and I now quote from the minutes of the committee:

That for the present the committee will hold public hearings, under the authority given by House resolution 524, for the purposes of examining the witnesses in regard to the matters and things mentioned in House resolution 511, which involve the conduct of Hon. Robert W. Archbald, and that in these public hearings where witnesses are examined Judge Archbald may be represented by counsel, if he desires, and that after the chairman of the committee shall have conducted the principal examination of witnesses and asked the members of the committee to ask such questions as their judgment may dictate to be proper, then, with the permission of the committee, counsel for Judge Archbald, if Judge Archbald is desirous to have counsel present, may ask such questions of the witnesses as the committee may deem proper to be asked of the witnesses in such investigation.

That was May 8 when that action was had, and the examination of witnesses was begun afterwards.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has read the resolution under which the committee proceeded to make this inquiry?

Mr. CLAYTON. No; the gentleman is mistaken. The resolution under which the committee acted in making the investigation is made part of the report which was read into the RECORD on July 8. What I have just read to the House is a part of the proceedings of the committee, being in its nature an invitation to Judge Archbald to be present at the hearings of the committee, and to have counsel present and to cross-examine the witnesses.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the very point——

Mr. CLAYTON. That is what I read.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to have that very point clearly understood at this time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was proceeding to make it clear, and if the gentleman will indulge me a few minutes more I think I will make it perfectly clear.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The point I had in mind, if the gentleman will answer as I am sure he will, is to have it known publicly that thus far the proceedings before the committee have been ex parte; that is to say, but one side has been heard, with the exception that Judge Archbald was invited to be present in person, and he was represented by counsel; but no witnesses were called on behalf of Judge Archbald, nor has any testimony been taken in his behalf or in denial of the charges made.

Mr. CLAYTON. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman, to state just exactly what occurred. The gentleman, in his statement, which seems to be in the nature of a question, has said some things to which I assent and other things to which I can not give a categorical answer, and therefore I must proceed with my statement and give a full account of what did occur, and I think that will satisfy the gentleman and afford him the information which he desires.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman wants to be fair, and I shall be content by asking that in his statement the gentleman from Alabama tell the House and the country whether any witnesses were called in behalf of Judge Archbald?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will answer that in the progress of the statement which I am going to make. I might say right here that the proceedings were ex parte; that no witnesses were subpœnaed on the part of Judge Archbald; and I will state the reason for it, and state it was the customary procedure to follow the line of conduct which the committee pursued.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That will be entirely fair. The facts should be known.

Mr. CLAYTON. That is what I was going to do, and I think I can make my statement certainly more satisfactory to myself and perhaps more satisfactory to the House if I be allowed to complete it. I could have made this statement, I think, perfectly luminous within the time I intended to consume, but with these interruptions it may be, Mr. Speaker, that I will have to occupy more time than I intended.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was proceeding to give the history of this matter, and if I may do so, I will give it to you briefly.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] introduced a resolution calling on the President for papers and information in regard to the conduct of Judge Archbald. In other words, that resolution asked the President, in substance, if he had had the conduct of Judge Archbald investigated, and what was the result of such investigation, and called for any report that may have been made under the order of the President in respect to the conduct of Judge Archbald. That resolution was reported to the House favorably and was adopted here, calling upon the President for that report, and then, following that, resolution No. 524 was introduced, empowering the Committee on the Judiciary to subpœna, and to swear, and to examine witnesses. And after the adoption of that empowering resolution, to which I have referred, the committee did proceed to subpœna and examine witnesses just as has been the custom in cases of this kind heretofore in the like proceedings of the House. There was no departure from the practice of the House and nothing unusual in this case which differentiated it in its method of procedure from other impeachment cases. Now, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, my good friend Mr. MOORE, must know that an impeachment proceeding in the House is in its nature an ex parte proceeding. The gentleman knows that, does he not?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know that. But the country does not always know it, and I thought it fair only to make the statement.

Mr. CLAYTON. I felt sure that the gentleman was too intelligent himself not to know that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did know it, but I wanted the country to know it.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, this matter has come before the House in the way which I have told you. Of course, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] knows, and other gentlemen here know, that there are various ways of inaugurating an impeachment trial. A Member can rise on the floor, as was done in the Swayne case and as was done by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BERGER] at this session of Congress in the Hanford case, and impeach a judge from the floor and offer the appropriate resolution. But in this case a resolution calling for information from the President in regard to the official conduct of Judge Archbald was the genesis of the impeachment, and following that was the resolution authorizing the committee to make the investigation, and following that authority the committee had its meetings from time to time and examined the witnesses touching the matters affecting the conduct of Judge Archbald.

Now, following the precedent of the Swayne case and perhaps other cases, the committee accorded to Judge Archbald the right to be present and to be represented by counsel. On May 8, before any witness had been examined, the printed proceedings will show that Judge Archbald was present and Hon. A. S. Worthington, his counsel, was present. The chairman at that time said:

The committee will be in order.

And then, further:

At a meeting this morning the committee took a recess until this hour, and, pursuant to the determination of the committee had at that time, the witness, Mr. Williams, will be examined. Before proceeding with the examination of Mr. Williams, however, I will ask the clerk to read the proceedings of the committee had on yesterday.

And I have just quoted that, which was in the nature of an invitation to Judge Archbald to be present and to be represented by counsel, and authorizing the judge and his counsel to cross-examine witnesses if they so desired.

Then the chairman said:

Call Mr. Williams.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Chairman, while the witness is coming may I make a statement?

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Worthington.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I would like to have the committee advised that Judge Archbald is present, and that he has asked me to appear with him as his counsel, which I do. I would like to state in his behalf that in the investigation that has just been referred to in the papers that have been read by the clerk, Judge Archbald was not given any opportunity, as I understand, to answer or meet any of the charges against him. He retained me this morning to advise him in regard to this matter, and I suggested to him that he ask the opportunity of being represented here, and of being afforded an opportunity, by his counsel, of cross-examining witnesses, if he chose so to do. I communicated with the chairman on the telephone in regard to that, not having time for correspondence, and was advised by the chairman a little while ago that the opportunity asked would be afforded us; and we are here pursuant to that suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Perhaps the clerk should have read the minutes of the meeting had this morning respecting a part of the statement which you have just made, and I will ask him to read the minutes of this morning showing that fact.

And here the clerk read that part of the proceedings of the committee which I have read this afternoon, and which was in the nature of an invitation to Judge Archbald to be present and to be represented by counsel, and authorizing him to cross-examine witnesses.

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is the way this investigation was begun, and at each and every meeting of that committee during that entire examination of witnesses Judge Archbald was present in his own proper person, and was represented by Mr. Worthington, one of the ablest lawyers of the bar of the District of Columbia, and he was also represented and had in constant attendance upon the sessions of the committee not only Mr. Worthington, but his son, R. W. Archbald, jr., as counsel; also M. J. Martin as counsel and Samuel B. Price as counsel. And, Mr. Speaker, the testimony taken in this case will show that the witnesses were examined and then cross-examined fully by the counsel for Judge Archbald.

And, more than that, the counsel for Judge Archbald were not restricted in the cross-examination to inquiries of the witnesses about matters which had been brought out on the direct examination. They were frequently allowed, and always allowed when they so desired, to go outside of the matters brought out in the direct examination and to question witnesses on collateral matters favorable to the judge.

The judge was furnished with a transcript daily, made by the stenographers, of the testimony and the proceedings of the committee. It was furnished to him at the Government's expense, for his counsel suggested that to have the stenographer make at the judge's expense from day to day and from time to time a transcript of the testimony of the witnesses would, on account of the volume of that testimony, entail a very heavy expense upon the judge. The committee directed the stenographer to furnish to the judge and his counsel each and every day the typewritten report founded on the stenographic report made of the proceedings of the committee and the examination of the witnesses. The committee did this in order that the judge and his counsel might at each step in the proceedings know what the witnesses said and have an opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses. On several occasions the counsel for the judge suggested to the committee that he would like the committee not to proceed with the conclusion of the examination of a particular witness on that particular day, but to allow the cross-examination of the witness to go over until another day, to suit the convenience of the judge and his counsel, in order to give them an opportunity the better to cross-examine the witnesses. No such request was ever denied by the committee, but was always with alacrity and cheerfulness accorded.

Mr. Speaker, before the conclusion of the examination of the witnesses the chairman of the committee was approached by one of the counsel of Judge Archbald, Mr. Martin, and asked the question in the committee room if the judge would be allowed to testify in his own behalf. The chairman replied to him, in substance, that the judge would be accorded the opportunity to testify if he wished it; that the committee in the Swayne case had given Judge Swayne permission to testify in his own behalf; and that there was no doubt that this committee would grant that same privilege or right to Judge Archbald; but the chairman of the committee said to this counsel, in substance, it would, however, subject Judge Archbald to cross-examination, and that if he made a witness of himself of course he must expect to be cross-examined like any other witness.

These learned lawyers, knowing that the precedent which had been followed in the Swayne case to give the judge an opportunity to speak in his own behalf and having obtained this definite information from the chairman of the committee, made no other suggestion on the subject; and although Judge Archbald was there when the last sentence was pronounced by the last witness in the case, neither he nor his counsel ever asked that he go upon the stand to testify in his own behalf. The committee would not have denied him the right to do so, but when the suggestion was made that the judge would be subjected to cross-examination he was not put upon the stand to tell about these matters.

I have endeavored and the committee have endeavored, so far as we could, to keep this matter from being tried in the newspapers. The committee could not deny a public hearing, did not undertake to do so, and everything about the matter has been public and open to the world except that when we came to consider what our report should be, then, like a petit jury, like a grand jury, like every committee of this House or of any other body, we went into executive session and considered as to what our conclusion should be. Other than that everything has been open.

On June 5 one of the counsel for Judge Archbald, Mr. A. S. Worthington, of this city, addressed to me a letter on behalf of Judge Archbald. And I may say that Mr. Worthington conducted himself before the committee at all times as an able, upright, and conscientious lawyer and gentleman. I knew him before and had the highest respect for him, and those of the committee who did not know him before formed the same opinion of him.

On June 5 Mr. Worthington addressed to me the following letter:

Hon. HENRY D. CLAYTON,
Chairman Judiciary Committee,
House of Representatives, City.

DEAR SIR: On behalf of Judge Archbald and his counsel, Messrs. Martin, Price, and myself, I wish to thank you and the committee of which you are chairman for giving us the privilege of being present during the examination of witnesses in Judge Archbald's case and cross-examining the witnesses.

In view of the fact that the testimony taken in the case covers some 1,400 printed pages, it occurs to us that we might aid the committee in its consideration of the evidence by submitting to the committee a short statement of the testimony on the various charges, with such suggestions in regard thereto as may seem to be pertinent.

If this meets with the approval of the committee we will begin the preparation of such a paper at once and place printed copies of it in the hands of the members of the committee within a very few days.

Very respectfully,

A. S. WORTHINGTON.

The committee waited until this printed brief, argument, paper, or whatever counsel deemed proper to call it, was placed in our hands. We did not go into executive session and reach a conclusion or even to consider as to what our report should be until we had received that argument in behalf of the judge, and had read and considered it.

In reply to the letter which I have just read I, as chairman of the committee, addressed to Mr. Worthington a letter on June 5, the same day I received his, saying:

I have yours of June 5. I have no doubt that the committee will be very glad to have such a paper as that mentioned in your letter.

On June 12 Mr. Worthington addressed the chairman this letter:

I send herewith, for the use of the committee, 35 copies of a printed memorandum submitted by the counsel for Judge Archbald on his behalf. If there should be any special point or points in the case upon which the committee would like to have a fuller digest or reference to the evidence, we shall be very glad to give the committee further aid in that regard.

Now, I do not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] to have questioned the propriety of what the committee has done in the matter of proceeding. I do not understand him to have pronounced any criticism on the conduct had by the committee in this case.

Mr. FARR. I certainly have not intended to cast any reflection on the committee. The committee has used the fullest courtesy toward Judge Archbald.

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes; and to everybody interested in his behalf, including the gentleman himself.

Mr. FARR. Yes; I desire to say in every instance.

Mr. CLAYTON. Now, Mr. Speaker, the committee heard these gentlemen and reached the conclusions embodied in the resolution which has just been read; and the facts upon which these articles of impeachment are predicated are stated in a brief form in the report which was printed in the RECORD on day before yesterday. The facts in full upon which this report and resolution are predicated are printed in extenso in the committee hearings, which have been, as I have said, available to every Member of this House for more than a month.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have had to consume more time than I intended, and I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING]. [Applause.]

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of deep responsibility that I undertake to do my part in the presentation of this case to the House. There is no power conferred upon Congress by the Constitution that carries with it graver responsibility than the power of impeachment. There is no power that should be exercised with greater fidelity to duty than that power. When this matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee, I am sure that I entered upon the task of investigation with a fair and open mind. I believe that every member of the Judiciary Committee occupied the same attitude toward Judge Archbald on the one side and the interests of the people on the other.

If I did entertain any feeling, one way or the other, which I am not willing to admit, it was a suspicion that perhaps the rumors and the newspaper articles that had been published with reference to Judge Archbald might have originated with dissatisfied litigants or disappointed lawyers.

Every attorney who has been engaged in the active practice of the law knows that a judge is liable to be criticized unjustly. Defeated parties in lawsuits and lawyers who have been disappointed in the rulings of the court are very liable to say unkind and harsh things about the judge. I may have felt when we approached the hearings in the case that something of that sort might constitute the foundation of the charges that had been made. But as the hearings progressed and as the evidence developed the facts connected with the various charges which are set forth in the resolution, I was impelled to the conviction that Judge Archbald was not a proper person to serve as judge in the Federal courts.

In this case Members of the House, and, if it goes to the Senate, I think, Senators will have no intricate questions of law to determine. We are all familiar with what the Constitution provides with reference to the impeachment of officers of the United States. This body has the sole power of impeachment. The Constitution provides that officers of the United States may be impeached for treason, bribery, and high crimes and misdemeanors. It also provides that Federal judges, judges of those courts provided for in the Constitution, shall be appointed and serve during good behavior.

There may be a question in the minds of some whether some of these charges are tenable, for the reason that the acts constituting the offense were committed before Judge Archbald was appointed to the circuit court and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court. But none of them were committed prior to the time that he was appointed United States district judge.

Some of the acts relate back to the time when he was serving on the district bench of the middle district of Pennsylvania. Some of them relate to the time since he was appointed to the circuit bench and designated as a judge of the United States Court of Commerce. The only other question that may arise is whether the offenses in the resolution are impeachable offenses. There was a time when it was a mooted question as to what constituted impeachable offenses.

It was contended, on the one hand, that a judge or other officer could be impeached only for offenses that were indictable, while it was maintained on the other side that many offenses not of an indictable nature were impeachable offenses. I shall not burden the House with reading what I deem to be the well-settled law on that question. I would refer Members who have any question in their minds as to whether or not any or all of these charges in this resolution are impeachable to Hinds' Precedents, where he devotes almost one whole volume to the question of impeachment. In that volume gentlemen will find a discussion of the question of what constitutes impeachable offenses. As recently as the Swayne case, tried only a few years ago, that question was discussed by Judge De Armond, then a Member of the House; by Mr. OLMSTED, now a Member of the House; by Mr. CLAYTON, the present chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary; and by Mr. Perkins, a Member from New York at that time, and I am sure that all will find in that discussion by those gentlemen entirely satisfactory reasons for holding that the charges made against Judge Archbald in this resolution are each and all impeachable cases.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. CLAYTON. For the purpose of having the statement of the gentleman complete, I would remind him that Judge Henry W. Palmer, of Pennsylvania, former attorney general of that State, prepared the articles of impeachment in the Swayne case and was the principal manager in the case. He wrote the brief in the case and made several very able arguments. Everything that he said on the subject was a real contribution to the discussion of the law of impeachment.

Mr. STERLING. That is true; and Hinds' Precedents also quotes from the argument of Judge Palmer at that time. In fact, in the discussion in the Swayne case all of the law, I think, is set forth, so that Members who are interested in determining the question for themselves can find the law there in very brief space.

I call the attention of the House to the brief that was prepared by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, which constitutes a part of the report which the committee made to the House. This brief quotes, I think, from all of the prominent writers on constitutional law relating to impeachment. To give the House some idea as to what these writers say, I desire to quote very briefly from that report. Foster, in his work on the Constitution, section 93, among other things, says:

An impeachable offense may consist of treason, bribery, or a breach of official duty by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness, when habitual or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, and profanity, obscenity, or other language, used in the discharge of an official function, which tends to bring the office into disrepute, or an abuse or reckless exercise of a discretionary power, as well as a breach or omission of an official duty imposed by statute or common law; or a public speech when off duty which encourages insurrection. It does not consist in an error in judgment made in good faith in the decision of a doubtful question of law, except perhaps in the case of a violation of the Constitution.

I think the doctrine as laid down by Foster there and as it is quoted in the report which the committee presents to the House is the doctrine held by practically all of the constitutional writers in this country upon that subject. I will read, however, from one other. I read from the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, volume 15, which has a résumé of all of the law on the subject. Among other things it says:

In one case, however, counsel for the defendant insisted that impeachment would not lie for any but an indictable offense; but after exhaustive argument on both sides this defense was practically abandoned. The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes; that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to be taken not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense, and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought, but grave political offenses, corruption, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties, by judges and high officers of State, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute. Additional weight is added to this interpretation of the Constitution by the opinions of eminent writers on constitutional and parliamentary law and by the fact that some of the most distinguished members of the convention that framed it have thus interpreted it.

I am sure that I am justified in saying that the House is not limited to indictable offenses when they come to determine whether a judge or other official has committed offenses for which he may be impeached.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I have read carefully all of the articles presented against this judge. There is no indictable offense charged against the judge, is there?

Mr. STERLING. I think that some of these counts charge indictable offenses. I will not say that they charge indictable offenses under the Federal statute, but I believe if they had been committed by a judge of a State some of them would constitute maladministration in office, for which he could be indicted. The gentleman will remember that if we are limited to indictable offenses under the Federal statutes there would be very few cases for which a judge or other officer could be impeached. There are no common-law offenses against the Federal Government, and all the offenses against the Federal Government that can be punished must come under some Federal statute. Our criminal code covers but few offenses.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I think in the presentation of the Swayne case it is well settled here, and well agreed by all, that it was not necessary to charge the judge with an indictable offense in order to prefer articles of impeachment against him.

Mr. STERLING. I think that is so well settled that I shall not devote any further time to it. I have said what I have simply to remove from the mind of any Member who had not given the matter consideration, any doubt he might entertain on that subject.

I presume that the important matter and the thing in which the Members of the House are mostly interested in at this time is to know something of the facts which go to constitute the charges which the committee present in this resolution. I assume that no Member wants to vote blindly on the proposition, and that they would like to know at least some of the facts which go to prove the offenses with which we charge him. I shall not undertake to give to the House the facts on which all of these charges are predicated. I shall limit myself to three or four. Other gentlemen, members of the Committee on the Judiciary, are better qualified to state to the House the facts and the evidence of the other charges than I am.

I ask the attention of the House to the first case in article 1 of the resolution. Without reading the resolution I will state briefly the facts charged in that article. At that time Robert W. Archbald was a United States circuit judge.

He was appointed United States district judge in March, 1901, for the middle district of Pennsylvania. He served as district judge from that time until the 31st day of January, 1911, when he was appointed United States circuit judge under the act passed by Congress establishing the United States Commerce Court, and at the same time and in the same commission was designated a judge of the United States Commerce Court. So that at the time of events alleged in article 1 he was an active member of the United States Commerce Court.

In March of last year he and one Edward J. Williams, of Scranton, Pa., entered into an agreement to buy together or in partnership what was known as the Katydid culm dump; that their purpose was to buy it and sell again for profit. It is charged further that the Katydid culm dump belonged to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania. We charge that the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. was a subsidiary corporation of the Erie Railroad Co. and that that railroad company owned all the stock of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. Also that at the time this transaction took place the Erie Railroad Co. had pending in the United States Commerce Court two suits involving questions of rates with the United States Commerce Commission; and we charge further in the count that Judge Archbald, as a partner of Williams, undertook to influence the officers and officials of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and the Erie Railroad Co. by the fact that he was a judge, to sell to him and Williams this coal dump, and that he succeeded by reason of the fact that he was judge and by reason of the fact that this railroad company had litigation pending in his court in buying this dump from the Erie Railroad Co. or from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. A coal dump is the refuse——

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Would the gentleman object to citing the cases in the evidence to prove the statements he has made?

Mr. BUTLER. When he gets beyond this step I presume he will do so.

Mr. STERLING. I am going to do that. Of course I will not undertake to refer to the page in all instances, but I will refer to the material evidence which, in my opinion, proves the charge that is contained in the article.

A coal dump or culm dump is the refuse or waste that has been thrown out in the operation of an anthracite coal mine. They were at one time considered to be pure waste. They are made up of the finer particles of coal that comes from the mine and mixed with that is a certain amount of dirt and slack, and perhaps slate and other refuse that is found in the mine. Of recent years these culm banks have proved of considerable value by reason of the high price of coal and by reason of the fact they have been able to use machinery for the purpose of washing this refuse from the coal and separating the dirt and clay from it, and they have been able to handle the coal in these dumps at a very considerable profit. The Katydid culm dump was formed by the operation of an anthracite coal mine. That coal mine was owned and operated by a firm known as Robertson & Law. Some of the land under which the coal lay was owned by some persons and some by other persons, some by the Erie Railroad or the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and some by the heirs of the Everhart estate. In March of last year a gentleman by the name of Boland said to this man Williams that he knew where there was a pretty good culm dump that he might buy. This man Williams is an important witness in this case, and a very unwilling witness—one who seems to be decidedly in favor of Judge Archbald—and I will say to the House now that we are not dependent to any great extent upon the testimony of Mr. Williams to sustain the charge contained in the first article. Some of the things he testified to I believe are true, because he testified to them unwillingly for the reason that they were adverse to the interests of Judge Archbald. Other things that he testified to were corroborated by correspondence and perhaps by oral testimony of other witnesses.

Williams went to see this culm dump and ascertained that it belonged to Robertson & Law and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. Capt. May was the manager of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. He lived at Scranton. Immediately after Williams's attention had been called to this dump he called upon Judge Archbald and told him he was thinking of buying that dump, and that he wanted a letter of recommendation to Capt. May. He said he knew Capt. May only casually, but he knew that Capt. May was not acquainted with him. He said also that he proposed to Judge Archbald at that time that he would give him a half interest in the profits of this culm dump if he would help him to get it. Judge Archbald did not give him a letter of recommendation, but gave him a letter which indicates on its face, although it does not say it in so many words, that Judge Archbald himself was to be interested in this property if they bought it. I want to call the committee's attention to that letter. It is dated March 31, 1911, and is found on page 8, Serial No. 3, of the hearings.

It is as follows:

> I write to inquire whether your company will dispose of your interest in the Katydid culm dump belonging to the old Robertson & Law operation at Brownsville? And if so, will you kindly put a price upon it.
> Yours, very truly, R. W. ARCHBALD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was that written on private paper?

Mr. STERLING. I think I am right in saying that it was written on Commerce Court paper. If I am mistaken about that some member of the committee will correct me. I will say now that nearly all the letters which Archbald wrote in reference to nearly all the transactions set out in the resolution were written on the paper of the United States Commerce Court, and I believe this one was.

He gave this letter to this man Williams and he took it personally to Capt. May. Capt. May did not give Williams any encouragement. By his action, and probably by his language, he indicated to Williams that he did not want to have anything to do with the proposition. And it is true, and I think abundantly proven, that at that time it was not the policy of the Erie Railroad Co. to sell any of its coal dumps or sell any of its coal property as coal property.

Williams thereupon went back to see Judge Archbald and told him that May had refused to consider the proposition at all, and indicated to Judge Archbald that May had not treated him very courteously. Archbald said, "I will see Mr. Brownell." Now, Mr. Brownell was general counsel for the Erie Railroad Co., which owned the stock of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., the owner of this culm dump, or owner of a part interest in it. He said, "I will see Mr. Brownell. I have some cases on my desk here now for that railroad company," and he called Williams's attention to the brief in two cases known as the "lighterage cases" that were then pending in the United States Commerce Court, and evidently, from what Williams says, Judge Archbald then, as a judge of that court, had the briefs and arguments of attorneys in those cases on his desk for his consideration as a judge of the court.

Mr. BUTLER. That fact was proven by Williams?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. And he was the unwilling witness of whom the gentleman spoke?

Mr. STERLING. Yes. Williams testified that Archbald said, "I have some cases here now for the Erie Railroad Co.," and he explained to him what these lighterage cases were, and Williams said that he saw the briefs himself on the desk and the judge directed his attention to them. That was only a few days after the 31st day of March, and the matter dragged along for some time. In July Judge Archbald was in New York. I do not think he went there for the sole purpose of seeing Brownell. He had been designated by the Chief Justice to go there and try some cases as circuit judge.

And when he was there he dropped Brownell a note. It seems that Brownell was the only person high in rank connected with the Erie Railroad Co. in New York with whom he was acquainted. He knew Brownell in this way. He, as a member of the Commerce Court, had been sitting in that court on a hearing of some cases in which the Erie Railroad Co. was interested and in which Mr. Brownell appeared as counsel for the railroad company. He knew at that time and in that way that Brownell was the general counsel of this company, and, of course, Brownell knew when he got this letter from R. W. Archbald that the latter was the judge of the Commerce Court who had under consideration these cases that he had argued. He wrote a letter to Brownell asking him if he could fix the date when he could call upon him.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] has called my attention to the statement that you have just made, that he had just become acquainted with Brownell at that time.

Mr. STERLING. A short time previous to that.

Mr. BOWMAN. I think I am safe in saying they had been acquainted for many years.

Mr. STERLING. The point is, he did know Brownell, and Brownell was the only officer of high rank connected with that railroad company in New York with whom he was acquainted.

Mr. BOWMAN. I can say further that he was well acquainted with most of the principal officials of the Erie Railroad.

Mr. STERLING. I am satisfied that the gentleman is mistaken about that, and, if he will wait a bit, I will show from the evidence that he certainly did not know the vice president of the Erie Railroad Co. at that time.

I think some of these gentlemen themselves testified that they had no personal acquaintance with Archbald prior to that time. Anyway, while he was trying these cases in New York he dropped a letter to Mr. Brownell asking him to fix a time when he could see him. Brownell replied that he could see him on the 4th of August, and Archbald went to Brownell's office at that time. He stated to Brownell briefly that he was there to inquire about the Katydid culm dump, and Brownell said—and Brownell's testimony is all we have of what occurred at that meeting—that he replied to Archbald that he did not know very much about that, and he would have to introduce him to Mr. Richardson, the vice president of the railroad company.

He took him into Mr. Richardson's office and there introduced him to Mr. Richardson, the vice president of the company, and they talked over the matter of the Katydid culm dump at that time. Richardson says he does not remember whether Archbald told him he wanted to buy the culm dump for himself or whether he was there in the interest of some other party, but he knows that Archbald was there at that time to purchase the Katydid culm bank, and he told him that he would take the matter up with Capt. May and let him know a little later.

Now, that was on the 4th day of August. Richardson did take the matter up with Capt. May. He went to Scranton and had some conversation with Capt. May about it, and wrote some letters in connection with it, and a few days later May met Archbald on the streets of Scranton and told him to tell Williams to come up and he would let him have the Katydid culm dump, and Capt. May also told Williams he could have it. He also wrote a letter to Williams, and stated the terms on which he could have it.

If I can find it without too much trouble, I will read that letter to the House. You will find the letter in Serial No. 1 of the hearings, page 26. It reads as follows:

SCRANTON, PA., August 30, 1911.

Mr. E. J. WILLIAMS,
626 South Blakely Street, Dunmore, Pa.

DEAR SIR: As stated to you to-day, verbally, I shall recommend the sale of whatever interest the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. has in what is known as the Katydid culm dump, made by Messrs. Robertson & Law in the operation of the Katydid breaker, for $4,500.

In order that it may not be lost sight of, I will mention that any coal above the size of pea coal will be subject to a royalty to the owners of lot 46, upon the surface of which the bank is located.

It is also understood that the bank will not be conveyed to anyone else without the consent of the H. C. & I. Co., and that if the offer is accepted articles of agreement will be drawn to cover the transaction.

Yours, very truly,

W. A. MAY, General Manager.

That was signed by W. A. May, general manager, and was written on the 30th day of August, after the 4th day of August, when Archbald had had this conversation with Richardson and Brownell.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. FARR. Was the lighterage case determined before or after Judge Archbald's visit to Mr. Brownell?

Mr. STERLING. I would not say with reference to that, but the cases were not determined at the time that Williams reported back to Archbald that May had refused to consider the proposition to sell the Katydid culm dump.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman permit me to say that the evidence shows that it was before that?

Mr. STERLING. That may be. I do not know what the evidence discloses as to that.

Mr. FARR. I do not think it is important.

Mr. STERLING. I think it is. They say they proposed to sell this coal dump to Williams for less than what it was worth, but I do not consider that question of importance.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there to a question as to the value of that coal dump?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. I know something about the value of that bank, and also about the value of some other banks in that section. It is a very problematical matter, the value of any bank, and, I say, basing my statement on the opinion of Capt. May in comparison with others, that his opinion was that it was of very much less value than that stated by another engineer who was brought there. I believe his opinion is to be depended upon. It is stated here that his opinion might be prejudiced, but I know him very well, and I do not think you could get from him in any case an opinion that he did not think was based on the facts.

Mr. STERLING. Well, that is as far as I care to yield to the gentleman. He can make a further statement in his own time, if he so desires.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman permit me to inject something here in regard to Mr. Brownell and the consideration of the lighterage cases?

Mr. STERLING. I can not yield for any statement. If the gentleman has any question to ask, I will yield.

Mr. FARR. I will ask the gentleman when were the proceedings in the lighterage cases begun?

Mr. STERLING. They were begun long before this deal was considered by Williams and Archbald, and the briefs were on Judge Archbald's desk on the very day that Williams went to May and on the very day that he returned to see Judge Archbald.

Mr. FARR. Does the gentleman think, after hearing the testimony and after having viewed Mr. Williams, that he had knowledge enough to know what a brief was?

Mr. STERLING. If he did not know, then the very fact of his ignorance as to what a brief is is the most convincing evidence, to my mind, that Judge Archbald then and there said to him just what he says Judge Archbald said—that is, "I have got some cases now on my desk for the Erie Railroad Co." And I believe that Williams was telling the truth then, because he would not have known what they were otherwise.

Mr. FARR. I will ask the gentleman what was the inference he drew from this remark?

Mr. STERLING. The usual inference that would be drawn.

Mr. FARR. Now, when was the case argued?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know when it was argued. I know that the printed brief had been made at the time of this visit by Williams to May. I think all that is material is the evidence which connects Judge Archbald with this transaction at the particular time when these cases were pending in his court.

It makes no difference whether Judge Archbald was influenced in his decisions or not by those transactions with the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and the officers of the Erie Railroad. His conduct in those transactions with people who had litigations in his court at the time condemns him as a judge, and he ought to be impeached for such impropriety. This question of influencing a judge's mind is one that we can not determine from direct proof. There is none. We have to draw our conclusions from the circumstances surrounding these transactions, and no judge ought to bring his office into disrepute and into public scandal by dealing in that way with persons who have litigation in his court.

Mr. FARR. The gentleman stated that when Judge Archbald visited Mr. Brownell he sought to use his judicial influence in favor of getting this option on the Katydid culm bank when the Erie people had litigation before him.

Mr. STERLING. That is what the charge says.

Mr. FARR. That is what the charge says, but the facts do not sustain that.

Mr. STERLING. The gentleman will have to draw his own conclusions from the record.

Mr. FARR. I think this is a very important matter, and this ought to be cleared up at this time.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois——

Mr. FARR. I think the gentleman from Illinois is capable of taking care of himself.

Mr. CLAYTON. I know he is quite well able, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has not observed one fact, and that is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] is not reading from the testimony, but is reading from the brief furnished to the committee which was prepared either by Judge Archbald or by his counsel.

Mr. FARR. Referring to the pages in the record, I want to ask the gentleman when that lighterage case was determined?

Mr. STERLING. I told the gentleman I did not know.

Mr. MANN. Does not the brief show?

Mr. FARR. May I read for the gentleman's benefit——

Mr. STERLING. I can not yield for the gentleman to read.

Mr. FARR. I do not think the gentleman ought to decline on a point so vital as that.

Mr. STERLING. If there is any pertinent question the gentleman wishes to ask, I will answer it if I can.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has declined to yield.

Mr. FARR. The gentleman said he would answer any pertinent question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield for a question, but not to let the gentleman read.

Mr. FARR. When was this lighterage case determined?

Mr. STERLING. I have said I did not know.

Mr. FARR. When did Judge Archbald visit Brownell?

Mr. STERLING. On August 4, 1911.

Mr. FARR. And the appeal to the Supreme Court was taken June 13, 1911, in that very case.

Mr. STERLING. I can not see the materiality of that. My position is that it had not been appealed to the Supreme Court, but was still in the Commerce Court, and was then and there being considered personally by Judge Archbald at the time he sent Williams to May to buy this dump.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman, of course, heard the testimony of Mr. Williams throughout?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. I also heard considerable of it. Would the gentleman undertake to say that he would be influenced by a man in the mental condition of Mr. Williams in voting on this bill? Does the gentleman think Williams was mentally competent to give any testimony that should influence any intelligent, sane man?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the gentleman frankly that I do not consider Mr. Williams a very reliable witness.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman think Williams is sane?

Mr. STERLING. I think he is sane.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman think Williams is mentally competent?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; I think he is mentally competent.

Mr. FOCHT. Does the gentleman think Williams was sober all the time?

Mr. STERLING. I think he was sober before the committee.

Mr. FOCHT. I do not think so.

Mr. STERLING. That is your opinion. I will say frankly that I do not regard Mr. Williams as a high type of man, but I do say he was the kind of man that Judge Archbald seems to have used as his rounder to hunt up these transactions and was Judge Archbald's associate in that transaction for the Katydid culm. Judge Archbald selected his associates and not the Judiciary Committee, and he was the kind of man, and the only man, the committee could go to to get the facts. We did get some facts from Mr. Williams, as I said, and I think we are justified in relying on everything Mr. Williams testified to that was adverse to Judge Archbald, for the reason that he was an unfriendly witness to the prosecution, if I may call it so, but was a very friendly witness to Judge Archbald.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Does the testimony disclose how long Judge Archbald had been acquainted with Mr. Williams prior to these transactions?

Mr. STERLING. I do not think it does, but I think he had known him for many years.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; long before he went on the Federal bench.

Mr. COOPER. At any rate, for many years.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Had they been intimate?

Mr. STERLING. I think they had had transactions together before—perhaps not as partners, but I think Judge Archbald had assisted Williams in other transactions before. Anyhow, they were thoroughly well acquainted, and had been for a long time.

Mr. COOPER. It occurred to me, on the question of Williams's mental capacity, that if the judge, knowing him for many years, selected him as his agent, engaged in many important business transactions, that he regarded him as mentally competent.

Mr. STERLING. Oh, he was mentally competent. The chairman, Mr. CLAYTON, suggests that the evidence disclosed that Williams testified that he had been a long time acquainted with Judge Archbald.

Mr. CLAYTON. And had been his political supporter long before he had been on the bench.

Mr. COOPER. Then the judge knew him well, and thought him mentally competent?

Mr. CLAYTON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois one question.

Mr. STERLING. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MANN. I notice the resolution says that Mr. Williams and Judge Archbald agreed to become partners. Is there any controversy about that?

Mr. STERLING. There is no testimony to the contrary.

Mr. MANN. If Judge Archbald agreed to go into a partnership with Williams, either without knowing him or knowing him, and Williams was an imbecile, as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. FARR. Which gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. All three.

Mr. FARR. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. FOCHT. As I say, if Judge Archbald went into partnership with Williams, either without knowing him or knowing him, and Williams was an imbecile, is not that almost a sufficient reason for removing him from the bench on the ground of imbecility himself?

Mr. FOCHT. He was indiscreet; that is all.

Mr. STERLING. If he was an imbecile, it is no defense to Judge Archbald.

Now, I have read the letter that May wrote to Williams after Archbald had been to New York and seen the general counsel and the vice president of the railroad company. You remember in the letter he says that articles will be drawn up. Judge Archbald and Williams never put a dollar into the transaction. It was not their intention to do so. They were simply buying an option, and they took the chances of selling it at a profit. After they got the letter from May, Williams proceeded to find a purchaser for the culm dump. He first went to a gentleman named Conn, the manager of the Laurel Electric Railroad Co., which railroad company was the most nearly located to this culm dump, except the Erie. He made a deal to sell it for $20,000.

To go back a minute, before Williams and Archbald had succeeded in buying the interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in this dump, Williams went to Robertson and got an oral agreement to purchase their interest for $3,500, and then after getting the letter he went back to Robertson and he gave a written agreement whereby he was to give him an option on Robertson's interest in the culm dump for $3,500. Then the letter of May to Williams fixes their price on their interest in the dump at $4,500, making a total of $8,000 that they were to pay for the dump. They were to pay for it only in case they sold it; then they were to pay these parties the several sums, and whatever they sold it for above $8,000 was their profit in the transaction.

He made an agreement with Mr. Conn to sell for the sum of $20,000, subject to approval of title. A little later it turned out that Mr. Conn's lawyers advised him there was some doubt about the title. I think the doubt rose from the fact that the Eberhart heirs were claiming an interest in it, as Mr. Mays suggests in his letter to Mr. Williams, where he says that they have an interest there and the purchaser must pay Eberhart the royalty which comes from the dump the same as the royalty which came from the original mine when the dump was being formed. So Mr. Conn refused to take it. Then Mr. Williams went to Mr. Bradley. Mr. Williams had an agreement with Mr. Bradley to sell it, I think, at 27½ cents per ton—that is, per ton of all the matter that was contained in the dump, amounting, as differently estimated, to from $27,000 to $35,000. As the gentleman indicated a few moments ago, there was some difference of opinion as to the value of this culm dump.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. FARR. Does the gentleman not confound the price in the Bradley case with that of the Conn or Laurel Line case? The Bradley price is $20,000. It did not go through.

Mr. STERLING. It did not go through because the whole thing was exposed before it was closed up.

Mr. FARR. And the price with which Mr. Conn was to pay was not $20,000, but $12,943.60.

Mr. STERLING. No; there is no such evidence as that. If the gentleman will read the testimony, he will find that it was not offered for any such price.

As to the value of the dump, it is immaterial whether Archbald and Williams were getting the culm dump for less than it was worth, for what it was worth, or for more than it was worth. It was their purpose in buying the dump to make money out of it, and when they bought it for $8,000 they thought they got it at a price at which they could make money. The essence of the charge in this article is simply this, that Judge Archbald used his influence as a judge to induce these litigants in his court to sell this dump at that price. He hoped to make a profit. Personally I think the dump was worth a great deal more money than that, and I desire to call the attention of the House to what I consider the most reliable testimony on the subject. There were different estimates. My recollection of the testimony is that the engineers of the Erie Railroad estimated that there were 42,000 tons of pure coal; but, not relying on that, I will call the attention of the House to the testimony of Mr. Rittenhouse, who seemed to be a very fair witness, who very recently measured this dump at the request of Mr. Brown, of the Department of Justice, and who testified before the committee on that point. His testimony begins on page 176 of Serial No. 2, and on the second page of that testimony the acting chairman, Mr. WEBB, at that time said [reads from record]:

I wish you would state the amount of coal of various sizes which you estimate this bank contains, based on your test.

Mr. RITTENHOUSE. Yes; I will give it in percentages.

Then he gives in percentages the coal of chestnut size, pea coal, No. 1 buck, No. 2 buck, and No. 3 buck, making a total of 51.893 per cent of the entire dump as coal made up of those various sizes. He testified that the total culm dump contained 90,000 tons.

Mr. STERLING. That is, 51 per cent of the culm bank was coal.

Mr. RITTENHOUSE. Fifty-one per cent was coal; yes. Forty-eight and one-tenth per cent was waste. Taking the bank as containing 90,000 tons, round numbers—its exact figure is 90,186 tons—but taking it at 90,000 tons, we have the various sizes according to the above percentages.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman want more time?

Mr. STERLING. I would like to have more time.

The SPEAKER. Each gentleman who gets recognition is entitled to an hour in his own right.

Mr. STERLING. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will take the floor in my own right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has had an hour in his own right.

Mr. CLAYTON. How much time did I consume?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 20 minutes left.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague may be extended for 25 minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not a fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING] has simply used up the balance of the hour that the gentleman from Alabama had?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the situation is very simple. Each gentleman who gets recognition is entitled to an hour. The gentleman from Alabama obtained recognition for an hour and he used 40 minutes of his time. Then the gentleman from Illinois was recognized for an hour in his own right. The request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] straightens the matter out.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope that there will be no objection to that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that his colleague [Mr. STERLING] may have 30 minutes more?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING. Taking up the testimony of Mr. Rittenhouse again, he says:

Chestnut and above, 5,477 tons, at $3.25 a ton, average price, $17,800.25.
Pea coal, 937 tons, at $1.78 a ton, $1,667.86.
No. 1 buck, 11,177 tons, at $1.41, makes $15,759.57.
No. 2 buck, 8,904 tons, at $0.70 a ton, $6,232.80.
No. 3 buck, 20,209 tons, at $0.30 a ton, $6,062.70.
Making a total of 46,704 tons, or a value of $47,533.18. If the line price were obtained instead of the 65 per cent basis, then the amount would be increased to some little extent. If what passes through a three thirty-seconds inch mesh and over a one-sixteenth is saved, or 12,678 tons at 30 cents, an increment of $3,803.40 would be added to the above, making a total of $51,336.51.

A little later on in the examination, Mr. WEBB, then chairman, asked him what would be the net profit on this coal on the estimated amount on his estimated price after paying for the washing of it, after preparing it for market there at the bank, and he testified that the net profit would be about $35,000, but that in his opinion the Erie Railroad Co. could handle it and realize that profit. Now, gentlemen, that culm bank was evidently worth, according to this testimony, a great deal more than $8,000; so even if they were willing to give Williams and Archbald a decent and a respectable profit, they could have had a great deal more money for it than the amount for which they sold it. They had a bid from some one of $20,000 in one case and more, I think, in another case within a very short time after this proposition had been made to them, which indicates conclusively that they got this culm bank much below a fair market value.

Mr. BUTLER. Would it annoy the gentleman if I interrupted him there?

Mr. STERLING. I will yield in a moment. But we insist now that no Member ought to be misled by any argument as to the value of this culm dump. I care not, so far as my personal convictions go, whether they were buying it for less or whether they were paying more for it than it was worth, the same offense exists in this case, that Judge Archbald undertook to use his influence as a judge to induce the sale of this property to him and his associate for the purpose of making money, and the question of what it is worth simply goes to the matter of judgment between the parties connected with the transaction. Now I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER. Appreciating, as I do most thoroughly, the position the gentleman has taken, I will be very much pleased if he will answer me just this one question: Is there any evidence to show any relation of any kind which this Federal judge had with the other persons interested in this culm dump, one-half of the interest was owned by the railroad company? I recall all the gentleman said relative to the Federal judge's association with the company, but did he have any association with the other owners, the owners of one-half of this coal?

Mr. STERLING. I am glad the gentleman asked me that question, for if he had not I would have omitted one element of the testimony in this case which I think is important. Robertson was quite willing to sell. He wanted to sell his interest in the dump, and Williams did not need any influence from any source to get that interest, but it was against the policy of the Erie Railroad Co. and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to sell coal properties. They were not willing to sell their interest. They did not want to sell. Hence Williams needed assistance, needed influence from some source greater than himself, to prevail on them to part with the property.

Mr. BUTLER. What is the explanation why Robertson should sell for $3,500?

Mr. STERLING. The interest in this dump was not each a half share. I do not think they claimed a half interest in it. He sold just such interest as he had.

Mr. BUTLER. And it was not fully ascertained, was it?

Mr. STERLING. Not fully ascertained; and the railroad company, I think, claimed it owned a greater interest than Robertson——

Mr. FARR. Was not Mr. Robertson able to purchase an interest of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. for $2,000 a year previous to that?

Mr. STERLING. There was some evidence that it was offered some time before this for $2,000. That is in the record. It is only within a very recent time that these culm dumps have become valuable.

Mr. FARR. May I ask if the Bradley testimony does not show it could be bought for $20,000?

Mr. STERLING. Yes; and that is a profit of $12,000; and if the gentleman is going to rely on that as an essential part of the proof of guilt in this case, it seems to me a profit of $12,000 to these gentlemen, $6,000 to each of them, without having invested a single cent in the transaction, is fairly good.

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman permit me to say that he said this dump was worth $50,000 or more?

Mr. STERLING. No.

Mr. FARR. Yes; you did.

Mr. STERLING. I stated what this record states right here, and I say I believe that testimony is reliable, and that puts it at $47,000.

Mr. FARR. That is ridiculous.

Mr. STERLING. To show that Judge Archbald considered he had an interest in this culm dump when they came to sell it Mr. Williams wanted a letter of introduction to Mr. Conn, superintendent of the Laurel Lines, and he wrote this letter on September 20, 1911. It is written on the letterhead of the United States Commerce Court, Washington, and reads as follows:

[R. W. Archbald, judge, United States Commerce Court, Washington.]

SCRANTON, PA., September 20, 1911.

MY DEAR MR. CONN: This will introduce Mr. Edward Williams, who is interested with me in the culm dump about which I spoke to you the other day. We have options on it both from the Hillside Coal Co. and from Mr. Robertson, representing Robertson & Law, these options covering the whole interest in the dump. This dump was produced in the operation of the Katydid colliery by Robertson & Law, and extends to the whole of the dump so produced. I have not seen it myself, but as I understand it this dump consists of two dumps a little separate from each other, but all making up one general culm or refuse pile made at that colliery. Mr. Williams will explain further with regard to it if there is anything which you want to know.

Yours, very truly,

R. W. ARCHBALD.

You will note the letter says, "Mr. Edward Williams, who is interested with me."

Now, that transaction failed, as I have said, because Conn's attorney expressed some doubt as to the title.

Then, you will find, according to the record, that a little later May prepares articles of agreement and sends them to Mr. Bradley with a letter, asking him to examine them, submit them to Mr. Williams, and, if Mr. Williams is satisfied, to return the articles, and he will submit them to the company for approval, and if satisfactory, they will sign up.

That was sent to Bradley on one day, and the next day Archbald sees Bradley at the depot and asks him to call that off, that some complications have arisen, and they had better stop the negotiations, and also writes him a letter to the same effect, in which he tells him the transaction will be withdrawn on account of certain complications. No one knows what complications were referred to, excepting there had appeared in the newspapers in the meantime this scandal about Judge Archbald's relations with persons who had litigation in his court. And I think it was concluded by the committee that the reason the transaction was withdrawn was because it had become public.

Mr. FARR. Was the gentleman basing that statement on the evidence of Capt. May?

Mr. STERLING. I stated I concluded from the evidence that it was withdrawn because the scandal had become public. Now, that is my conclusion. There is not anything in the record stating that was why it was withdrawn.

Mr. FARR. Is there not a statement in opposition to that by Capt. May himself?

Mr. STERLING. I think there is, but I do not believe it. No complications had arisen in the meantime at all. The only reason was that the scandal had become public.

I want to call attention briefly to article 2. That charges that Judge Archbald for a consideration joined with George M. Watson, an attorney at Scranton, Pa., to settle certain litigation that was then pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and to also sell the stock of a certain washery at Scranton to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. The Marian Coal Co. was a corporation operating a washery near Scranton. They had become involved in litigation, and they desired to sell their property. They had also, previous to that time, filed a suit in the Interstate Commerce Commission, claiming a large sum of money from the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. for overcharges in rates. That litigation, as I have said, was pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission. They desired to settle it with the railroad company and wanted to sell out their washery, or their two-thirds interest in the stock of the corporation, and get out of the business. One day this same Williams came to William Boland, who was the man who had charge of the washery, and said to him, "George Watson can settle your lawsuit and sell your property." William Boland is a brother of Christy Boland, who was a banker and real estate man. Williams talked it over with him also. The conversation resulted in Christy Boland going to see George M. Watson and talking the matter over with him.

Watson said, and Boland also said, that he stated to Watson that he would take $100,000 for their claim in the court and for their two-thirds interest in the stock of the Marian Coal Co. They also talked of the fee they were to pay Watson, and it was agreed that Watson was to have $5,000. Christy Boland said to Watson, "I will go and see my brother, and, if satisfactory to him, I will agree that you shall have $5,000." The Bolands agreed between them that Christy should go back and make a definite arrangement with Watson that they would pay him $5,000 if he would settle that suit and sell the property to the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. for $100,000.

But they said further to Watson, "We will take less, but you can put the price at $100,000." Watson said he would undertake it. The very next day Christy Boland received a call from Judge Archbald's office by telephone.

He went immediately to the office of Judge Archbald in the Government building. Archbald and Watson were there together. They talked over the arrangement the Bolands had made with Watson. Archbald said to Boland, "Now, I understand you have agreed to pay Watson $5,000?" and Boland said he had. He says, "There ought to be some evidence of that agreement in writing. It would be better now if you would give Mr. Watson an agreement in writing to the effect that he is to have $5,000 for his services in making this settlement and selling this property." Christie went to see his brother and got an agreement to pay $5,000 and took it back and delivered it to Watson.

Now, I conclude, and I believe every member of the committee concludes, from the evidence in this case and the circumstances surrounding the transaction and from events that followed that meeting in the judge's office, that Watson and Judge Archbald had agreed then and there to take it upon themselves to settle this case, and that Judge Archbald was to have a share in the fees. Of course the absolute truth of that is in the bosoms of Watson and Archbald and nowhere else. But I will cite the circumstances surrounding the case, and I believe you will conclude from all the evidence that Judge Archbald, just as ardent, just as earnest, even more eager, apparently, to produce results in this proposed deal with the railroad company than Watson, was, in consideration of such services, to have at least some of the pay that it was agreed should go to Watson.

Within a week—I believe sooner than that—Judge Archbald met Mr. Loomis on the streets of Scranton. Mr. Loomis is the vice president of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., and Mr. Reese A. Phillips is the superintendent of the coal-mining department of that company. Mr. Truesdale is the president. Archbald met Loomis on the street and had a talk with him about this matter and told him he ought to settle; that "now is a good time to settle with the Bolands that lawsuit that was pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission" and to buy the controlling interest in the Marian Coal Co.

Now, mark, gentlemen; at that time the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co. had suits pending in the Commerce Court, of which Judge Archbald was one of the judges. This Boland case that had been brought against that railroad company was then pending in the Interstate Commerce Commission. However it was decided, it had not been decided at that time; but whatever the result in the Interstate Commerce Commission, it was almost certain to go to the United States Commerce Court. This railroad company knew it. This railroad company and these officials knew that they had litigation pending at that time in the Commerce Court, and they knew that they would probably very soon have another, the Boland suit for excessive rate charges, in that same court, of which Judge Archbald was a judge.

Judge Archbald, knowing all those facts and circumstances, proceeds ardently and eagerly to see Mr. Loomis, the vice president of the company, and urges the company to settle the case. That is not all. He telephones for Mr. Phillips, the superintendent of the coal mining department of the railroad company, to come to his house. Phillips forgets to come at the appointed time and Archbald calls him up again, and then Phillips goes over to his house and they talk over a settlement of this case and the sale of this stock to that railroad company.

But that is not all. I want to refer you to some of the letters. Before doing that I will state that Loomis, after he had a talk with Archbald, went to the headquarters of the coal mining department of the railroad company, at Scranton, to see Mr. Phillips, who was not there; but he left word for Phillips to take the matter up with Watson. You see, Archbald had told Loomis, when he met him on the street, that Watson had the matter in charge.

In a few days Phillips came back, and the man in charge of the office in his absence told Phillips that Mr. Loomis, the vice president, had left orders there for them to take the matter up with Watson, and Mr. Phillips did so, and then wrote to Loomis.

The report of Phillips was adverse. That is, in his estimate the property was not worth nearly $100,000.

But let me not overlook another fact. This man Watson did not price the property to the railroad company at $100,000. He priced it at $160,000, although the Bolands had told him to price it at $100,000, and told him they would take even less than that.

I want to call attention to another sort of testimony, on which I myself do not rely and on which I do not ask anybody in this House to rely. Christy Boland testified that when he found out that Watson had asked $161,000 for the property he asked Watson why he had priced it at that high sum, and Watson said to him "There are some other gentlemen who will have to be taken care of. I have got to divide this surplus up among four persons." He said, "Who are they?" Watson reluctantly told him, and he said Judge Archbald, Mr. Loomis, Mr. Phillips, and himself. Now, Christy Boland testified that Watson told him that. I believe that Watson told it, but I have not very much faith in the testimony of this man Watson, and I myself do not base any conviction that I have on that fact, and I would not ask any Member of the House to base any conviction on that. It only illustrates the kind of a man Watson is.

Mr. BUTLER. He wanted to divide his crime with some one else.

Mr. STERLING. Although I am sure this man—Christy Boland—was telling the exact truth when he testified to the conversation which he had had with Watson.

Now, let me call your attention to the letter which Judge Archbald wrote. Loomis's home was in New York. Phillips's report to Loomis was adverse, and after they had had some correspondence, which you will find on page 1134 of series 9, Mr. Loomis writes this letter to Judge Archbald:

SEPTEMBER 27, 1911.

MY DEAR JUDGE: As per our recent interview, I instructed our people to call on Attorney Watson in connection with the Boland case, and I find there is little, if any, prospect of our reaching any settlement of this case, owing to the very great difference of opinion as to the merits of Mr. Boland's claims and the value of his properties.

Thanking you, however, for your good efforts in this direction, I am,

Very truly, yours,

———— ————.

That was signed "E. E. Loomis" and addressed to "R. W. Archbald, Scranton, Pa."

Judge Archbald and Watson were not to be put down by that proposition, and so Judge Archbald on September 28 replied to Loomis in this way:

SCRANTON, PA., September 28, 1911.

MY DEAR MR. LOOMIS: I am very sorry to have your letter stating that you have not been able to effect a settlement with Mr. Boland. I trust, however, that the matter is still not beyond remedy. And if I thought that it would help to secure an adjustment I would offer my direct services. I have no interest except to try and do away with an unpleasant situation for both parties, and I hope that this still may be possible.

Yours, very truly, R. W. ARCHBALD.

That was written on paper of the United States Commerce Court.

Now, evidently after Archbald had received the letter of the 27th from Loomis, Watson and Archbald had a conference, because Watson on October 2, 1911, writes this letter to Loomis, in which he says:

OCTOBER 2, 1911.

Mr. E. E. LOOMIS,
Vice President Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.,
90 West Street, New York City.

DEAR SIR: In relation to a matter existing between the Marian Coal Co. and your road and coal department, and also a claim against the traffic department of your road which I have had under consideration here and with which I presume you are more or less familiar, I decided after a conference with your Mr. Phillips, of the coal department, to ask for a meeting with you and the president of your road, Mr. Truesdale, if convenient, at the earliest time you could find your way clear to meet me either in New York or Scranton. If you will kindly advise me either by wire or letter, I will hold myself in readiness to meet you on a few hours' notice.

I am, very truly, yours, G. M. WATSON.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. How much time would the gentleman from Illinois like to have?

Mr. STERLING. I think I could finish in 15 minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended 15 minutes, is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, after these letters were written by Watson and Archbald to Loomis, they succeeded in arranging an interview with the president and vice president of this railroad company. Watson was to meet them at Scranton and lay his proposition before them and state to them the basis of their claim. Watson says in anticipation of that meeting he wired Judge Archbald here at Washington to know when and where he could meet him, and he says that the only purpose he had in coming to Washington was to get certain papers in what was known as the Meeker case, and which had been decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission a short time before. Watson evidently is not telling the truth about that. We know that from the date of a telegram which he sent to Judge Archbald on the 6th. This conference with Truesdale, Loomis, Phillips, and Watson was on the 5th of October at Scranton. I believe that is true because Mr. Loomis produces a letter in which he has a memorandum saying "Met Watson at Scranton, October 5." This telegram which Watson sent to Archbald is dated on the 6th. So that as a matter of fact Watson met these gentleman there as they agreed on and he proceeded to lay his case before them. He did not get any encouragement or any indication that they were going to accept his exorbitant price. Then the next day desiring another conference with his associate in the transaction, Judge Archbald, he sent the telegram. He wanted to come down and tell him what had occurred, and advise with him as to the next step. Anyhow, that is the order of events as we get it from the evidence, and as I believe all the committee understand it.

Now, let us see about this visit of Judge Archbald coming to Washington. I think he testified falsely when he said he came down here to get these papers to have them present at the conference so that he would be fortified in his claim about overcharges for rates. The conference had occurred before that and he wired Judge Archbald the next day, and then on his way down here he wired again asking him to meet him at the Raleigh Hotel.

He came down here, I think getting here on the 7th. When he got to the Raleigh Hotel, Judge Archbald was waiting for him on the outside. They went together up to the rooms of the Commerce Court and talked the matter over there for some time. Mr. Watson says he simply was here to get the papers, which was not true, because he had had the conference the day before. He gives no reason, except this false reason, why he made that hasty trip here to see Archbald. Watson is worthy of belief in those instances where he testified adversely to Judge Archbald, because he is an adverse witness. Evidently from his testimony and his manner he did all that he could in favor of Judge Archbald, and said just as little as he could against him.

With these telegrams and this correspondence fortifying certain things that Mr. Watson said—he is an important witness, although I say frankly that I believe he was not altogether a truthful witness—taking into consideration the fact that Mr. Watson when he got in this deal went to Judge Archbald's office and called Christy Boland in to confer with him about it, Archbald being the man who insisted upon the contract for fees being in writing, and then taking into consideration the fact that he took it up and urgently pursued the settlement and sale day after day and week after week by correspondence and personal interviews with the officers of the railroad company, who then at that time had litigation in his court, who then at that time had litigation before the Interstate Commerce Commission which was almost certain to come to his court, we concluded that Judge Archbald used the influence which accompanies him by virtue of being a judge of that court in which these cases were pending to induce this railroad company to settle this suit and to buy this stock.

Mr. FARR. Did the railroad company buy it?

Mr. STERLING. No; it did not buy it; and it makes no difference whether it bought it or not. That simply proved, not that he did not use his influence, but that his influence was futile. That is all.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. BOWMAN. The gentleman has heard all of the testimony. Does he think that this man was the guilty party, using these others or that they were using him? I have a purpose in the question. This man has borne a good reputation and he comes from one of the very best families in that district. I have always thought well of him, and I have had no time to examine the matter until now. I ask the gentleman's opinion as a lawyer and judge.

Mr. STERLING. My opinion is indicated by the fact that I agree with this report which the committee made in this case. I want to say frankly to the gentleman that it is no more of a task for him to vote Judge Archbald guilty than it is for me. It is no more of a task to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR], who represents Judge Archbald as one of his constituents in this House, than it is for me. As I said to him in the beginning, I was impelled by the force of the testimony in this case to find that he ought to be impeached, and I believe that this House would be derelict in its duty if it did not impeach. Bear in mind that even though some of these transactions, or all of them, were transactions that you and I as private citizens or any person as a private citizen could have carried out with perfect propriety, yet, when done by a judge, by a high judge of a high court, who had at the time litigation pending in his court over which he had control and power to decide, even though these things did not influence his judgment, I say to you that it was such impropriety, such an utter disregard for judicial ethics and the duties of the position which he occupies, that he is not fit to be a judge.

Mr. Speaker, there are other counts equally important with these. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HOWLAND], and other gentlemen of the committee are better qualified to detail the facts than I am. The thirteenth article, the last one, is a general omnibus count in which we have sought to cover by a general statement all of the facts, all of the charges, contained in the other 12 counts. It is a general statement of all these transactions which extend over the whole history of this man's life since he went on the bench. His desire to mingle with the class of men with whom he did mingle, to take as his associates the rounders of Scranton, who seem to have no fixed business, and who were simply looking here and there for easy money wherever they could find it, take into consideration the fact that he took into partnership with him that class of men and carried on business with them, thus permitting them to use his high office and the influences which go with it for commercial purposes, and you will agree with me that it disqualifies him for the high office which he holds.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman as to the procedure under which the House now acts? The resolution which we are considering is House resolution 524, which provides that the Committee on the Judiciary shall have power to send for witnesses and papers, and so forth. Do I understand——

Mr. MANN. That is not the resolution that we are considering. We passed that a long time ago. That is one of the unfortunate errors of the clerk.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to know as a layman whether we vote now upon the guilt or innocence of Judge Archbald, or whether we vote to send him to trial.

Mr. STERLING. We do not determine the innocence or guilt of Judge Archbald. We determine whether or not there is a reasonable ground to believe he is guilty of these charges. It requires the degree of proof that justifies an indictment before a grand jury. This is simply a proceeding to determine whether or not Judge Archbald should be committed to trial to determine the question of his innocence or guilt. Whatever this House may do, if it votes to carry this resolution, it does not prove at all that Judge Archbald is guilty. It just says that the House is of the opinion that he ought to be tried, and that the evidence is sufficient to justify such trial.

Mr. BUTLER. In other words, presents him for trial.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then we are in this position, that charges have been made against a member of the judiciary and witnesses against him have been heard by the Committee on the Judiciary and that committee now reports that he ought to be tried for the offenses charged against him.

Mr. STERLING. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then a vote to-day in favor of the resolution now before the House means that we do not determine his guilt or innocence, but merely send him to the Senate for trial.

Mr. STERLING. That is true.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And that one side having been heard an opportunity is now given to the judge to be heard, so a defense may be entered if he desires to be so heard?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. Speaker, in conclusion permit me to say that the course which Judge Archbald pursued disqualifies him from holding that high office. He has repeatedly used his influence as a judge to induce litigants in his court to enter into business transactions for profit to himself. He has sought to commercialize that power which came to him by virtue of his high office. He has obtained credit and made profits from those who have received favorable consideration in his court and from those who hoped, in pending suits, to obtain favorable consideration at his hands. He has brought the office of judge into disrepute and public scandal. The best safeguard to governmental institutions is a wholesome and well-deserved public confidence in men in high places. If that can not be maintained, then those institutions must fail. No other office is held in such reverence in the public mind as that of the judiciary. It is the fountain source of justice. If it be polluted, it will sooner or later be destroyed. It is made the duty of this House to impeach and the duty of the Senate to convict a judge who has brought disrepute upon the office he holds. There is no other means provided by the Constitution by which the people can be relieved from an unjust or a corrupt judge. The people have no other recourse for relief but through this House. I submit it is our duty to vote this resolution. We do not ask you to measure Judge Archbald by the standard of your highest ideals. Measure him only by the average judge and you will find that he falls far short of the requirement. He seems to have lost a proper sense of the duties and responsibilities of the office which he holds. He has failed to appreciate the proprieties which attach to his position and has brought discredit on and destroyed confidence in himself as a judge.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to occupy some time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, some complaint has been made, at least by one Member, that the Judiciary Committee and the House itself have not acted quite fairly toward this judge in that an effort has been made to press and carry through rapidly these proceedings and not give the judge a chance to be heard. In all fairness I want to say that is not a just criticism. The Judiciary Commiftee for five or six——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me—of course I am unable to determine to whom the gentleman refers—I have listened with very great care to everything that has been said up to date and have certainly not heard any Member of the Pennsylvania delegation offer any criticism whatever in regard to the action of the Committee on the Judiciary. We understand that a full and fair hearing of one side of the case was had. There has been no criticism either as to the fairness or courtesy of the Committee on the Judiciary, and I would like to disabuse the gentleman's mind of that thought.

Mr. WEBB. In answer to my friend, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that a part of his statement is not correct. A full and fair opportunity was given to Judge Archbald by our committee to present his side of the case, and, in addition to that, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary examined every friend as a witness that the judge had in these transactions. In fact, in my opinion, every witness that we examined during six long, patient weeks was biased in favor of the judge, except one or two, who were more or less immaterial. We had to go into the camp of the judge's friends to get the testimony in this proceeding, and every person whom we heard who might know something to throw material light upon these charges we subpœnaed regardless of his biased feelings toward the judge. We also gave the judge himself the privilege of being present at all the hearings, with four lawyers, to cross-examine to the fullest extent every witness who was put upon the stand. At the conclusion of the testimony the judge himself was offered the opportunity to go upon the stand and explain, if he saw fit, these transactions and these charges that were made against him, but for some reason best known to himself he declined to go upon the stand in his own behalf and be examined and cross-examined.

I want to say to the House that there never has been, in my opinion, in the history of judicial investigations a fairer and, I might say, a more kindly investigation than this investigation of these charges against this judge. More, we felt sympathy for him. I do myself, and regret that charges have been preferred, and regret that I had to be one of the examiners in the case. We did not enter into the investigation as prosecutors; we went into it as investigators determined not to seek one iota of testimony that was unfair to this judge, but anxious that all the facts, from whatever source they might come, should be put in the record, and that this House might have them and the committee might get the advantage of them. This is what the House instructed us to do, and we have performed our task fairly, impartially, and as fully as possible under all the circumstances.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL]?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. KENDALL. Did the gentleman make the statement to the House that the committee invited Judge Archbald to appear before it and he declined to do so?

Mr. WEBB. Judge Archbald, by courtesy of the committee, did appear before the committee from the first taking of testimony to the last; and at the conclusion of all testimony, which testimony was heard by the judge and the four lawyers representing him, the judge was given an opportunity to become a witness in his own behalf, which invitation he declined. So, I say again there has been absolutely no unfairness toward Judge Archbald. We have tried to take no advantage of this judge in his judicial position, but sought to do him justice at every step in the case. We have gone into the case as investigators and not as prosecutors.

Now, as to the law upon the question, I shall discuss it but briefly. Some one has suggested that there are no crimes punishable under the criminal law alleged in these 13 articles. For my part I believe that is correct. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] asked the question. I doubt very much if you could sustain a criminal indictment under the common law or under the law of the United States against this judge on the charges set out in these articles. But gentlemen well know that that is not necessary in an impeachment trial. It has been held over and over again that it is not necessary to charge an officer with a criminal offense in order to impeach him. Impeachment is in the nature of a political trial and covers all those acts of improper conduct or misdemeanor not covered by the criminal law as well as those offenses denounced by the criminal law. If that were so, if we had to charge a man with a crime punishable under the criminal law of State or Nation, it would be very rare that the Senate of the United States would impeach an officer.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Have you any authority on that question?

Mr. WEBB. I will say to the gentleman that every constitutional writer from Blackstone down to Tucker states that.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Are you going to read from them?

Mr. WEBB. I am not going to take the time to read the authorities fully, but will cite two or three briefly, viz:

Woodlesson in 1777 said:

It is certain that magistrates and officers intrusted with the administration of public affairs may abuse their delegated powers to the extensive detriment of the community and at the same time in a manner not properly cognizable before the ordinary tribunals. On this policy is founded the origin of impeachments, which began soon after the Constitution assumed its present form (p. 355).

Rawle, in his work on the Constitution, said:

The fondness frequently felt for the inordinate extension of power, the influence of party and of prejudice, the seductions of foreign States, or the baser appetite for illegitimate emoluments, are sometimes productions of what are not unaptly termed "political offenses" (Federalist, No. 65), which is would be difficult to take cognizance of in the ordinary course of judicial proceeding.

The involutions and varieties of vice are too many and too artful to be anticipated by positive law.

Judge Story says on this subject:

In examining the parliamentary history of impeachments, it will be found that many offenses not easily definable by law and many of a purely political character have been deemed high crimes and misdemeanors worthy of this extraordinary remedy.

Tucker says:

These two cases, therefore, show that the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" can not be confined to crimes created and defined by a statute of the United States.

In a footnote to Fourth Blackstone (p. 5, Lewis's Ed.), Christian says:

The word "crime" has no technical meaning in the law of England. It seems, when it has a reference to positive law, to comprehend those acts which subject the offender to punishment. When the words "high crimes and misdemeanors" are used in prosecutions by impeachment, the words "high crimes" have no definite signification, but are used merely to give greater solemnity to the charge.

In Cooley's Principles of Constitutional Law it is said (p. 178):

The offenses for which the President or any other officer may be impeached are any such as in the opinion of the House are deserving of punishment under that process. They are not necessarily offenses against the general laws.

In his work on the Constitutional History of the United States, George Ticknor Curtis says (vol. 1, pp. 481–482):

But a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law has been committed, as where the individual has, from immorality or imbecility or maladministration, become unfit to exercise the office. The rules by which an impeachment is to be determined are therefore peculiar and are not fully embraced by those principles or provisions of law which courts of ordinary jurisdiction are required to administer.

In Watson on the Constitution (vol. 2, p. 1034) it is said:

Congress has unhesitatingly adopted the conclusion that no previous statute is necessary to authorize an impeachment for any official misconduct. In the few cases of impeachment which have hitherto been tried, no one of the charges has rested upon any statutable misdemeanors. An examination of the English precedents will show that, although private citizens as well as public officers have been impeached, no article has been presented or sustained which did not charge either misconduct in office or some offense which was injurious to the welfare of the State at large.

The American and English Encyclopedia of Law says:

In each of the only two cases of impeachment tried by the Senate in which a conviction resulted the defendant was found guilty of offenses not indictable either at common law or under any Federal statute, and in almost every case brought offenses were charged in the articles of impeachment which were not indictable under any Federal statute and in several cases they were such as constituted neither a statutory nor a common-law crime. The impeachability of the offense charged in the articles was in most of the cases not denied.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] will pardon me, the gentleman from Georgia will find, beginning at page 17 of the report No. 946 in this case, printed in the RECORD of July 8, 1912, a comprehensive review of the law on the subject of impeachment, quoting from every commentator on this subject and from other law writers. I think it will give him all the information he desires.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will ask the chairman of the committee if he agrees with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] that there was no criminal offense committed by Judge Archbald?

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it is not necessary to determine.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I did not ask you that question; but do you agree with him on that point?

Mr. CLAYTON. I do not, if I understand the question. I think an impeachable offense is such conduct on the part of the judge as to be the antithesis of good behavior.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I agree with you on that proposition, and I expect to vote for the impeachment trial. I want to be sure I am right in so doing, and I want to bring out all the facts.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the gentleman let me answer his question?

Mr. TRIBBLE. But you are not answering mine.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I misunderstood you. I think an impeachable offense, on the part of a judge, is bad behavior, for the tenure of the office of a Federal judge is fixed at "during good behavior," and I think the judge need not necessarily be guilty of either a criminal offense by statute or under common law, and there are no common-law offenses against the United States. If he is guilty of such misbehavior as constitutes the antithesis of good behavior, he may be impeached, and if you will read Watson on the Constitution, and all these authorities I have cited, you will find that he and others say that high crimes and misdemeanors mean misbehavior and the like in office. Watson says:

Synonymous with the term "misdemeanor" are the terms "misdeed," "misconduct," "misbehavior," "fault," "transgression."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I repeat that it is absolutely not necessary that we should allege that a civil officer of the United States has been guilty of a violation of the criminal law before he can be impeached. If we should hold such view, what criminal law do you mean? High crimes and misdemeanors against what sovereignty, what Commonwealth, what nation? In some States public drunkenness would be a misdemeanor, punishable by imprisonment or fine; in other States it would not be. In one State an act might be a crime or a misdemeanor; in another State it might not be so. So you would get into a maze of legal questions from which we could never extricate ourselves if you were to hold that before you could impeach a civil officer of the United States he must be guilty of a crime, punishable by the criminal law of a State or nation. The House and Senate are the sole judges of the sufficiency of impeachment charges, whatever may be the nature of such charges.

Every impeachment trial from the beginning of the Government to the present involved acts on the part of the officer impeached which were not violations of any criminal law, and no man has ever been impeached except upon charges which did not involve a violation of the criminal laws of the country. So that I shall not give further time to the discussion of that phase of the question.

Some gentlemen think that we have alleged in these 13 articles facts which make this judge guilty of a criminal offense, if those facts are proven. But that is not an important consideration with respect to this case so far as the legal side is concerned. What I want to discuss is the charges in three or four of these articles. The report of the committee covers the ground generally and pretty thoroughly. Judge STERLING has argued two or three of the articles carefully and in detail, and I will take up three or four that he has not mentioned.

In the first place, gentlemen of the House, this judge, with his other human frailties, seems to have been consumed as soon as he went on the bench with a desire to make money. To start with, he is insolvent. He has nothing but his salary. The evidence shows that he has a home in Scranton, Pa., but it is mortgaged to its full value, and therefore he has nothing but the salary which he draws, and he has a large and, I suspect, expensive family. The evidence in this case, if you will read it carefully, convinces any fair-minded man that the judge, through all of his official career, from the time he was put on the district court bench in 1901 until now, has used, not openly and not with that purpose written on his requests, but has used his position from all the evidence and all the facts, as judge both of the district court and of the Commerce Court, in order to drive good bargains and to make money.

It is true that he has not made much. He had many wires set, but he was "flushed" by this investigation just before the money began to come in. These charges were investigated by the Department of Justice last spring, and many of his well-laid schemes were frustrated when he and his associates got wind of the quiet investigation. I say this because the conclusion is irresistible from the testimony that the judge has used his official position as a judge to aid him in his efforts to make money. All through this testimony you will find that every letter that he wrote, trying to make these bargains with the railroads that had at the time cases in his court and which were at his mercy, was always written on the official paper of the United States Commerce Court.

Mr. BOWMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WEBB. I will yield for a question.

Mr. BOWMAN. I had not seen the evidence until this morning, but I notice the communications run for over eight years. Is not the gentleman satisfied from the evidence that really the judge was imposed upon by these men, rather than that he was using them as his servants?

Mr. WEBB. Now, the gentleman has asked me a frank question, and I am going to answer him frankly. If Judge Archbald can be imposed upon by an old man who came from Wales and has lived in this country for only 20 years, a veritable handmaid and go-between for the judge; if he can be imposed upon by another witness by the name of John Henry Jones, a man of the most meager ability and also from Wales; if the judge can be imposed upon by two such characters as that, he is not fit to sit on the Commerce Court bench.

If my friend had been present at the trial, and had taken a careful look at these two star witnesses, both of them close personal and business associates of the judge, he never would have believed for a moment that these two financial adventurers could have decoyed the judge into any such unbecoming and ugly situations as shown by the evidence.

The contrary is true. The judge used these two handy men, putty in his hand, to do his—I started to say skullduggery work, but I will not use that word exactly—to carry out his schemes by which he expected to make much money for himself by use of his high position.

To illustrate: The gentleman says that these transactions cover eight or nine years. They do. This judge was put upon the district court bench, probably the last appointment which that great man, Mr. McKinley, ever made, in the spring of 1901. It was a recess appointment. Between the time the appointment was made in recess and the following meeting of Congress Mr. McKinley was assassinated and Mr. Roosevelt became President. In December, 1901, Mr. Roosevelt reappointed Judge Archbald.

We have not gone further back than 1908. From 1908 to the present we have shown that he has been acting improperly and violating good judicial ethics by prostituting his official position for personal profit and otherwise.

Remember that the Constitution does not require that we must find this man guilty of crimes and misdemeanors. Our forefathers knew what they were doing when they framed this great instrument, and they used this language:

> The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors.

The word "misdemeanors" there, as you will find from the authorities, has not the meaning of criminal offense. "Misdemeanor" is none other than misbehavior, misconduct; and for any misbehavior, any misconduct, the House may impeach and the Senate may remove any judge from office, because a little further on in the Constitution, section 1 of Article III says:

> The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior.

Good demeanor. And if the Senate and House think this judge's conduct has violated the injunction that he shall hold his office during good behavior and good demeanor, then he is removable from office, and should be removed.

I take up now the impeachment Articles VIII and IX. In 1908 a man by the name of Peale sued the Marian Coal Co. in Judge Archbald's court at Scranton, Pa. During the pendency of that case before this particular judge, John Henry Jones and Edward J. Williams called upon the judge to make with him a deal. Now, mark you, Jones and Williams told the judge that they were interested in the purchase of a large tract of timberland down in Venezuela and that it looked like a very good proposition. The judge eventually went into the deal with John Henry Jones and Edward J. Williams, two very ordinary men, who I know Judge Archbald would not permit to go into his house on social terms. I doubt if they ever went into Judge Archbald's house, either socially or otherwise. In December, 1908, he drew a note for his part of the stock in this scheme in Venezuela, a note for $500. Drawing notes by Judge Archbald did not mean at that time—and does not mean at this time—that he could get the money on them, because I assert again that the judge is insolvent, in my opinion, and I formed this opinion from the evidence.

The evidence shows that if you sued him to-day your judgment could not be collected from him in the courts of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KENDALL. How much stock was he to get for this $500 note?

Mr. WEBB. He was to get $500 worth of stock in the scheme, Mr. Williams testified. Jones testified that he made the note as an accommodation for him and as a friendly act. At that time the judge's note was valueless in the common commercial channels. I mean by that that if the judge's note went to any bank whose business it was to loan money the bank would turn it down and would not regard it as good commercial paper.

So on the very day that the note was drawn by Judge Archbald, made payable to himself, signed by John Henry Jones, also an insolvent, and indorsed by Jones and Williams and Judge Archbald, all three being insolvent, they started out to get the money on it. Whom did they go to? Old man E. J. Williams says that he knew the Bolands owned the Marian Coal Co., which was at that time a defendant in Judge Archbald's court. John W. Peale was plaintiff and the Marian Coal Co., owned by the Bolands, was defendant. Williams says that he knew the Bolands were defendants in Judge Archbald's court the day that he went to them to get the money on the note. He says that he never went to the Bolands before in his life to get them to cash or discount a note. At any rate, he went to them knowing they were defendants in Judge Archbald's court. More than that, the very day the note was drawn in the judge's chambers in the Federal Building in Scranton, Pa., old man Williams said to the judge, "I am going to take this note to the Bolands." Mark you, this man Williams, if there ever was a biased witness in favor of a man it was he in favor of Judge Archbald. He said everything upon the stand to shield this judge. Why, the judge paid his expenses here to Washington when he came to testify, supposedly, against the judge.

Mr. FARR. He did that out of the kindness of his heart.

Mr. WEBB. Ah, I do not know whether it was out of the kindness of his heart or not. Williams could have asked the marshal who subpœnaed him to pay his fare. On the very morning after he was subpœnaed we find Williams sitting in the judge's office at his chambers in the Federal building at Scranton, Pa., discussing this investigation, and in less than two hours after that the judge starts to Washington and meets Williams at the depot and buys Williams's ticket to Washington. Is not that right?

Mr. FARR. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Williams had no means to get to Washington and Judge Archbald gave him money out of his pocket that he could not afford to give him and paid his fare to Washington.

Mr. WEBB. Old man Williams is smart. If he had not made that excuse his conduct and the Judge's would have smacked of bribery. He had to make some excuse, and that was it.

Mr. FARR. One of the great troubles in this case is that you gentlemen do not know Judge Archbald and that the personal element can not be recognized and put in this case. If it were, the findings would have been entirely different.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania had proposed to make himself a witness, we would have heard him patiently as to what he knew of the judge and these transactions. We heard for five weeks the character of the man from the witnesses we had before us, and if the gentleman thought differently he could have come before the committee and given his side of the case. I do not know what manner of man Judge Archbald is, except from the testimony before the committee.

I have absolutely no unkind feeling against him. I do not profess to be any better than anybody else, but I know that if I had been indicted before a high committee of the Congress of the United States and knew that certain witnesses with whom I had been in close relations were coming to testify against me, I would have sacrificed my right arm before I would have bought the witness's railroad ticket on which he was to come to my trial. The judge was in conference with old man Williams and with John Henry Jones on the day after they were subpœnaed to come here; the judge paid old man Williams's fare here; and old man Williams was the most partial witness for the judge you ever heard on the stand. I therefore affirm again what I said in the beginning, that we examined anybody and everybody connected with these charges, and all were the judge's friends.

Getting back to the $500 note which was drawn by Judge Archbald in the judge's chambers in Scranton, Pa., the judge knew that the Bolands were defendants in the suit at that time and old man Williams knew it, too. The judge had made some preliminary orders in the case prior thereto.

Mr. FARR. Does the gentleman say that the judge drew up the note or signed the note?

Mr. WEBB. I assert that the judge drew the note.

Mr. FARR. But he was not the signer.

Mr. WEBB. No; the note was signed by John Henry Jones, payable to Archbald, but the judge drew the note in his own handwriting. After it was drawn the judge indorsed it, and so did Williams, and so did John Henry Jones, and then the note started out on its doubtful course to become discounted.

Mr. FARR. Is there anything in the evidence to indicate that Judge Archbald did that for other than a kindly feeling?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; old man Williams swore that he put $500 into this Venezuelan transaction, hoping it would yield him big returns upon his speculation.

Mr. FARR. Is it not the evidence that it was to pay John Henry Jones's expenses on his trip to England in connection with the Venezuela proposition?

Mr. WEBB. I asserted in the beginning that John Henry Jones said that he signed the note, fixed it up as an accommodation, but it makes no difference what was his object. He was going to use his influence as a judge to get it cashed, because he had no financial standing which would have secured the discount. So we have a note indorsed by three insolvent men upon which they expect to get $500 in cash. Who was the first man the note was carried to? Old man Williams said to the judge, "I am going to take this note to the Bolands." The judge knew that he had the Bolands in his power and old man Williams knew that also. What did the judge say? He said to take it to whomsoever he pleased. That is as far as we can get Williams to go, but he did go that far. He said that the judge said to take it to whomsoever he pleased. Straightway old man Williams went to see C. G. Boland and W. P. Boland on the very day the note was made, because the offices of the Bolands are very close to the judge's office. W. P. Boland said no, that he could not discount the note, because he had a case in the judge's court. His ideas of judicial ethics were higher than the judge's. Although this man Boland had made his living digging coal I assert that he had higher ideas of judicial ethics than did Judge Archbald when the judge permitted this old man Williams, a mere handmaid, a henchman, to go to a defendant in his court and ask him to cash a note which was worthless. It was worthless. This note was made four years ago, and it has never yet been paid. It is now in one of the banks in Scranton, and I will tell you soon how they did get it cashed. I have a right to argue that the judge is insolvent, because there is a note for $500 which has been outstanding for nearly four years, upon which payment has been demanded.

The judge has simply asked to be allowed to renew it, and it has been renewed every three months for four years and has not been paid. Yes; Mr. Boland declined to discount it. Both of the Bolands did. Then where did it go? Williams went to a bank to get it cashed. The bank said no; they did not want the paper, and they would not cash it. That is one reason why I tell you that it was worthless commercial paper. All three of them were insolvent. There is no other possible reason why that note would ever be cashed, except through the influence of this United States judge. Old man Williams took it to a bank, and they turned it down. Then he turns it over to this other star witness, John Henry Jones, the signer of the note. John Henry Jones goes wandering around in Scranton from bank to bank, I presume, and finally he is directed to a man named Von Storch, who happened to be the vice president of the Merchants & Mechanics' Bank, a little bank in the suburbs of Scranton, who had no active connection with the bank, whose law office was probably 2 miles from the bank, and who rarely ever visited the bank. Somehow or other this man John Henry Jones gets mysterious wind of the possibility of getting this man C. H. Von Storch to discount this worthless paper. He called on him at his law office, for he was a lawyer. He presented the note, but Von Storch did not know Jones and Williams, and Jones did not know Von Storch. Von Storch did know Judge Archbald, and I will tell you how and why. He swears that he had had cases in the judge's court; and not only that, just a few months before that he had been a defendant in the judge's court, in a case wherein he was sued for $10,000.

The judge, on a question of law, ruled that Von Storch was not liable, and put the case out of court, and in less than a year, I believe it was, we find this worthless note turning up in the presence of Von Storch, begging to be discounted.

John Henry Jones was asked, "Why did you go to von Storch?" He replied, "I do not know." "Who told you to go there?" "I do not know." Well, he did know. Taking all the circumstances and observing the conduct of the man on the stand, you will conclude that he found out some way or other—most likely from the judge himself—that this man von Storch felt that he was under obligation to the judge, and that he, in payment for past favors and possible future ones as attorney, would be willing to discount this worthless piece of paper signed by Judge Archbald; so John Henry Jones immediately rushes into von Storch's office and presents it for discount. Von Storch picked up the telephone when Jones left his office and called the judge and said to him, "Judge Archbald, I have a note indorsed by you and a man named Williams and a man named Jones. What about it?" The judge replied, "You will do me a great favor if you will cash it." Williams, Jones, and Archbald had never had a piece of paper discounted before in this little bank, had never had an account there before, and von Storch said it was a violation of their custom to discount paper of any kind for men who did not have accounts in their bank. Von Storch felt that he was under obligation to the judge or feared to incur his displeasure by turning down his note. He was a lawyer who appeared in the judge's court, and so he told him that he would discount it. Then von Storch phoned down to the bank to the cashier and told him to cash the note. Von Storch swore that he only did it on account of the judge. Williams went down to get the money, and the cashier of the bank swore he paid the money to E. J. Williams. And ever since, nearly four years, that note has been renewed every three months; and we asked the bank why they did not collect it, and the reply was that it was generally understood in the bank that it would be paid some time. Gentlemen, if you will take the testimony of the witnesses you can not resist the conclusion that the judge had no power in the world to use except his official position to get money on this worthless paper, and he knew it and so used it. Now, there is another transaction—and I am talking too long; I realize that.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Go ahead.

Mr. WEBB. There is another transaction right in line with this one. That is Article VIII. In 1908 an insurance company was sued by the Old Plymouth Coal Co., which company was owned entrely by one W. W. Rissinger. There were several suits involving $28,000, transferred from the State courts to Judge Archbald's court; and in November, 1908, the cases were ready for trial. Some time during this month—we never could get Rissinger to testify just what time, because he was another very partial witness in favor of the judge—but some time during the month of November, 1908, right while this suit was pending involving the payment of $28,000 to Rissinger who had sued the insurance company, right while that suit was pending in Scranton before Judge Archbald, Rissinger concludes he can make a good deal with and for Judge Archbald. Now, Rissinger is a man of ordinary character; he is not a man whom you would think the judge would take in his family to associate with socially—and I doubt if Rissinger ever called upon the judge's home, certainly not socially. He is a man of ordinary intelligence, but pretty smart and shrewd. He goes down to the judge's office and says, "Judge, I have a fine scheme down in Honduras, Central America. I have some papers which give me an option on both sides of a little river for about a mile, and I am informed that gold can be picked up and mined just as you mine coal in these culm dumps here. Now, if you want to get in on this deal I will let you in." Now, the judge knew Rissinger was plaintiff in these $28,000 suits before his court. Rissinger wanted to testify, because it was material, he thought, and came near testifying, that the very first time he presented the matter to the judge he "bit," because Rissinger wanted to put the transaction after the 23d day of November, because on the 23d day of November the suits were terminated and judgment was entered providing that the whole amount should be paid if it was not paid in 15 days, but only a certain amount should be paid if it was paid within 15 days. So Rissinger was anxious to put the transaction beyond the date of the final judgment so as to show that the negotiations were not going on during the actual trial of the case. Either Rissinger told something that was not so or the judge was a simpleton and ought not to stay upon the bench. Here is a man of ordinary intelligence going into a judge's office and wanting him to sign a note to get $2,500 in payment for stock in a scheme way off in Honduras, and he says he thinks the judge "bit" the first time the thing was presented to him.

Now, that is what Rissinger says, substantially. He says the judge entered into the scheme, a pure venture, the very first time it was presented to him. The facts are, and you can deduce them from the testimony, that during the pendency of this trial this negotiation was going on with this judge. In the open he is sitting on the bench as an impartial arbiter between Rissinger and the insurance company, while in his private chambers he is secretly making a deal for gold-mining stock with this man Rissinger, a plaintiff in his court. Anyway, on the 28th day of November, 1908, the judge dated a note payable to himself and this man Rissinger's mother-in-law, signed by Rissinger himself, and on the back of it R. W. Archbald's, W. W. Rissinger's, and Sophia J. Hutchinson's names appear as indorsers. Now, they start that note out to have it cashed somewhere or anywhere. There is another piece of insolvent paper. And, by the way, I want to say that Mr. Von Storch testified that the only man whose name he considered in cashing the $500 note was Judge Archbald's, and on his account and nobody's else. During the pendency of this trial we have the judge privately negotiating with the plaintiff in the case in a scheme down in Honduras, Central America. And Rissinger very generously offered him, if he would come in on the deal, to give him one-third, saying: "You make the note to yourself and my mother-in-law, and I will go out and get the $2,500, and you shall have a third of this amount in gold-mine stock." It turned out to be a gold brick. So they fix up the note while the case was pending, and when the case comes on for trial, and after Rissinger's evidence was put up, the insurance company demurred, saying that a case had not been made out, and they had arguments by counsel on both sides, and thereupon the judge promptly ruled that Rissinger, his copartner in the deal, had made out a good case and overruled the demurrer. Thereupon the insurance company introduced some testimony.

Mr. FARR. The insurance case referred to had been decided by the court before the Rissinger note was negotiated. Is not that true?

Mr. WEBB. Is the gentleman going to testify?

Mr. FARR. I am asking a question.

Mr. WEBB. No; it was not. I suppose you are reading from counsel's brief in the case and not from the evidence. There are 2,000 pages of evidence. The evidence shows that Rissinger knew the crux of this charge. He wanted to get this transaction beyond the 23d of November, 1908. But it is certain that the negotiations were going on between Rissinger and the judge days or weeks before the note was dated. The note was dated five days after the judgment was entered. Still, it was pending to a degree, because the judgment provided that unless $2,500 was paid within 15 days, which carried it beyond the 1st of December, then the full amount of the judgments should be paid.

Now, they start out with this note to get cash on it. I do not know how many banks it went to. I know this, that Rissinger himself knew the power of the judge's influence, and after he had tried numerous banks in Scranton, Pa., which declined to take the note, before John T. Lenehan came to Washington—and he came before the 1st of December, 1908, and the note was made the 28th of November, 1908—Rissinger presented the note to Lenehan, who had been his successful counsel in his case, and Lenehan promptly declined to cash it. Finally they ran across a bank in Scranton that, after thoroughly investigating the value of Mrs. Sophia J. Hutchinson's property—and she lived up at Pottsville, 25 miles away—and found it was worth $25,000, discounted the note. But before they did it they took a judgment against Mrs. Hutchinson, showing that they did not rely on the responsibility of Judge Archbald in discounting the note; and that note, too, is still unpaid, signed by a United States judge who now sits upon the Commerce Court of the United States. There his note lies in the Bank of Scranton for $2,500, executed nearly four years ago, and not a dollar of it has ever been paid. Rissinger says that he pays $37.50 interest every quarter on the note, and the judge has his stock in the Honduras venture, although he has never paid a dollar for it, though he drew and signed the note for it himself. Now, these are the salient facts on which these three articles are based.

Just one more. In 1911, I believe it was—the 31st of January—Judge Archbald became a judge of the Commerce Court of the United States.

The Commerce Court, as you gentlemen know, passes upon the rights of the people on the one hand and the railroads and their freight rates and passenger rates on the other. That is where railroad cases are tried; and, my friends, it was not 60 days after the judge became a member of this powerful Commerce Court, which has been overriding the Interstate Commerce Commission so often—it was not 60 days after he was appointed upon that bench before he began to dicker for good deals in coal mines and culm banks with railroad litigants in his court.

One of these dickers and deals was an effort to lease from the Lehigh Railroad Packer No. 3, in Schuylkill County, near Shenandoah. Judge STERLING has spoken of some of these deals, and I shall speak of this one. The Girard estate, about which you gentlemen probably know, is an estate controlled by a board of trustees in Philadelphia, and is now worth something like $30,000,000.

That estate owns vast coal fields in Schuylkill County, Pa., and about 13 years ago, or a little over, the Girard estate leased to the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. most of its coal land holdings in Schuylkill County. The truth of it is that the railroad company had been mining this property for 30 or 40 years under shorter-term leases from this estate. At one time they renewed the leases every 5 years, but by an act of the Pennsylvania Legislature they subsequently were allowed to be renewed every 15 years. A lease was made by the Girard estate to the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. or Coal Co. about 13 years ago. In this lease was included culm bank or Packer No. 3, containing 472,000 tons of coal.

Judge Archbald, as you will see from the testimony, has been making deals and dickers for other coal banks and coal pits. This deal was only one among many. Now, in this Packer No. 3 deal he had two parties to reckon with. He had first to get the consent of the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. The Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. owned the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., and the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. made Packer No. 3 bank. I think Judge STERLING has explained what a culm bank is, and therefore I do not care to go into that. Suffice it to say that these banks are very, very valuable. These culm banks contain small pieces of anthracite coal, and, as you know, the anthracite coal supply in the United States is limited, and consequently these banks are becoming more and more valuable every day.

So, the judge's eye coveted Packer No. 3, containing 472,000 tons of valuable coal. He wanted to get hold of it in some way or other, and he knew that the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. had it leased, and he knew also that the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. was a party defendant in his court at that very hour in what is known as the Lighterage case and the Joint Rate cases.

And I may say this to my friend who wants to know about the Lighterage case, that the Lighterage case was appealed or taken from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Commerce Court on the 12th day of April, 1911, and the Commerce Court, in which the judge sat, issued an injunction restraining the Interstate Commerce Commission from putting into effect its orders with reference to these lighterage charges in New York Harbor.

On the 26th day of May, 1911, the Commerce Court adjourned until the following October. In the meantime, to wit, June, 1911, the United States and the Interstate Commerce Commission appealed the Lighterage case to the Supreme Court of the United States purely on the question as to whether or not the Commerce Court had the right and power arbitrarily to upset and restrain the operation of the Interstate Commerce Commission's order.

The case did not go to the Supreme Court on its merits, because, if you will take the stenographer's notes, you will find that during the interegnum a motion was made before Judge Archbald and the rest of the members of the court, some time in October or November, asking that testimony be taken in the case, and all through the proceedings Judge Archbald made suggestions that testimony ought to be taken, that they must hear it on the merits, showing that he understood that the case was still before his court on the merits and had only gone to the Supreme Court on a question of law, and none other.

To show you that the judge was right and that he was not "reckoning without his host," the Supreme Court in the last few months decided that very thing, and it went off on a point of law, or was remanded by the Supreme Court of the United States to the Commerce Court to take testimony and hear the case on its merits, and the case is now pending in the Commerce Court, and the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co. is a party to that suit.

Judge Archbald had been present when the case was heard, and he knew that the Lehigh Co. was intimately and closely interested financially in this lighterage case, which was then pending before his court and numbered 39 on the docket of that court, entitled "The B. & O. R. R. v. The Interstate Commerce Commission."

Now, while all those things were fresh in the mind of the judge, while he knew that he had this railroad company in his court, he called on their vice president and general manager, one S. V. Warriner, and said: "Mr. Warriner, you have a culm bank out here that I want to lease from your railroad company."

Mark you, my friends, it has never been the policy of railroad companies owning coal lands to give them up or lease them to anybody, because they who are engaged in that kind of business can make more profit out of them, because they are equipped for working them, and because they ship the coal over their own roads, and one-half or one-third of the profit in coal is in the freight rates.

But what do we find? For the first time in the history of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, so far as we know, and certainly for the first time in its dealings with the Girard estate, Mr. Warriner said, "All right, you can have it."

Mr. Warriner knew that his coal company and railroad company were parties defendant in the judge's court in Washington.

Warriner received letters from Judge Archbald, some written in Washington, some in Scranton, but always written on United States Commerce Court paper, a perpetual reminder to every railroad employee and official who received one of those letters that "I am your master, and your road is now a party defendant in my court, and I have the power to decide one way or another in your case."

So Mr. Warriner, without demur, agreed to lease this valuable bank to the judge. The judge stated in his application to the Girard estate that he was going to form a corporation to be called the Jones Coal Co. We find a man by the name of Thomas Hart Jones, who swore that, although these papers were prepared by the judge and presented to the Girard estate with his name signed to them, he never did know what became of this proposition to incorporate the Jones Coal Co. Jones and the other names attached to the application were mere dummies. Neither of them could have secured the consent of the railroad.

Judge Archbald wrote to the Girard estate and to Warriner that they wanted to incorporate with a capital of $25,000, the corporation to be known as the Jones Coal Co. Thomas Hart Jones is sometimes called Thomas "Star" Jones, because he at one time owned a drug store in Scranton, and they called it the "Star" drug store.

The judge made application in his own name, R. W. Archbald, in company with James F. Bell, V. L. Petersen, and T. H. Jones, for this sublease from the Girard estate, and in that application he says:

> We understand that these dumps are now subject to a lease to the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., which expires December 31, 1913, and which possibly will be renewed. But we have the assurance of that company that on certain terms and conditions, which have practically been agreed upon between us, it will be satisfactory to them to have us lease from you to the extent suggested.

Now, the terms were these: Judge Archbald agreed that all the coal taken out of this culm bank—472,000 tons—should be shipped exclusively over the Lehigh Valley Railroad, and that he would give them 2 cents a ton extra royalty. He says, further, in his statement to the Girard estate that "care has been taken to make this such a combination as will insure success."

Mark you, the royalty on this kind of coal has nearly doubled in 13 years, yet the railway company agreed to let this powerful Commerce Court judge have this huge dump at only 2 cents a ton extra royalty above the royalty they agreed to pay 13 years ago.

The judge in his letter says that the names of all the parties interested do not appear in the application. He says one of them, Mr. Howell Harris, is a well-known coal man in Scranton, and Mr. Hulbet, of New York, is associated with the coal men there who are going to take the product, and that Mr. T. M. Farrell, a retail coal dealer of New York City, is going to put up the money, and that care has been exercised in these selections so as to make a combination that will insure success. The judge never puts up money; he puts up influence instead.

In all these transactions you will find that Judge Archbald has never invested one dollar in money. All his investments have been made by reason of his powerful name as a judge of the United States district court and of the Commerce Court.

Now, the Girard estate did not happen to have any case in Judge Archbald's court nor is it engaged in interstate commerce. After some talk with the president of the Lehigh Valley Railroad, the Girard estate very promptly turned the proposition down. My opinion is that the president of the railroad company put it into the ear of Mr. Smith, who is a director of the estate and also a director of the Lehigh Co., that, while the railroad company had agreed to make the lease, they did not care anything about it and had rather not make it, but they could not resist the Archbald proposition, coming from a judge in their case, and therefore agreed to let him have the 472,000 tons of coal, but hoping the Girard estate would not sanction the lease, and so it was killed by the Girard trustees, and the deal did not go through.

Now, if you read the testimony you will find the judge used all his personal and all his official influence with the railroad officials in order to make this unusual deal. Mr. Kirkpatrick, the superintendent of the Girard estate, swore that never before during his 30 years of experience with the estate had the Lehigh Railroad Co. agreed to such a proposition as that, and I tell you that the only reason why they did it in this case—and the judge knew the reason—was that he was a United States judge of the Commerce Court and had in his power the defendant—the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.—with whom he was contracting.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have talked much longer than I intended. I thank the Members of the House, and I am obliged to them for their splendid attention on this hot day. [Applause.]

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he will now answer a question.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FARR. The gentleman made the statement that the Rissinger note was negotiated before the settlement of the insurance case before Judge Archbald.

Mr. WEBB. No; I said negotiations were in progress between Rissinger and Judge Archbald while the case was pending.

Mr. FARR. Was it not dated after the judge had held that Rissinger had made out his case, and if that is so, how could that influence Judge Archbald wrongfully?

Mr. WEBB. Whether it influenced him wrongfully or not, it was bad judicial ethics and gross misconduct for a United States judge to sit on the bench, in a public judicial office, an arbiter between two litigants, and in private during such time to enter into a speculative deal with one of the parties, as he did.

Mr. FARR. The gentleman has said that the Rissinger note was negotiated afterwards.

Mr. WEBB. What does the gentleman call "negotiating"? It was dated the 28th of November, 1908, but the speculative deal and agreements were all made while this case was pending and before the date of the note.

Mr. FARR. The unfortunate thing about this case is that there are numerous little things like that injected into it to create prejudice against Judge Archbald.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman were a United States judge passing on the rights of plaintiff and defendant in a case involving $25,000, would he during the trial of that case go off into his private chambers and enter into a speculative deal with the plaintiff in the case, letting the plaintiff give him stock in a gold-mine scheme, just for the use of his name on a $2,500 note, when his name on the note did not add a farthing in value to the note, for the judge was insolvent and could not borrow money in the usual channels on his commercial paper?

Mr. FARR. He did not do any such thing.

Mr. WEBB. I charge that he did do it, and the evidence bears out the charge.

Mr. FARR. There is no evidence to prove such a thing.

Mr. WEBB. I heard the 2,000 pages of testimony from beginning to end, and my friend does not know the evidence, because he has not read it. He says he has not. He has only read the partisan brief of the judge's lawyer, and is reading from it now.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States are now demanding, as they never demanded before, the strictest official rectitude on the part of their public officials, and especially of their judges. No district or State would elect Judge Archbald to his present position with the testimony against him before them. The judges belong to the people and are their servants, and the people have a right to demand the recall or removal from office of a judge who is guilty of all the acts charged in these 13 articles. His reputation for impartiality is gone and therefore his usefulness as a judge is at an end. Hence we, the Representatives of the people, for them and in their name, demand his removal from office.

Mr. FARR. I have read the evidence and the conclusions of the committee. Judge Archbald is in a most unfortunate position in this case.

Mr. CLAYTON. I agree to that.

Mr. FARR. A most unfortunate position, and he was unfortunate in some of the witnesses. The suggestion that these gentlemen were trying to shield Judge Archbald has some truth in it, but the very fact that they were shielding him added to the suspicion that surrounded this poor judge, and he did not have an opportunity to show his connection with it. I regret very much that the judge did not take the witness stand.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FARR. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. The gentleman says that the judge did not have an opportunity?

Mr. FARR. I will explain that. His attorneys did not put him in the witness chair to testify.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee could not do that.

Mr. FARR. I realize that. If the gentleman will permit me, I have said repeatedly here that this committee was courteous and kind and fair in its investigation of this case.

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the statement made that these witnesses were trying to shield Judge Archbald had some truth in it.

Mr. FARR. That is, it had the appearance of it.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the gentleman made the statement that it had some truth in it.

Mr. FARR. Had the appearance of it, because I talked with Judge Archbald's son at that time and he said—

I wish to God that these men would talk frankly before this committee. There is nothing to conceal. My father does not want anything covered up and the more frankly they talk about this the better it will be for him.

Mr. CLAYTON. The first culm contract introduced into this case had the judge concealed, and it was afterwards disclosed that Judge Archbald was the third party.

Mr. FARR. The evidence does not show that Judge Archbald was a party to that concealment. I have known Judge Archbald for many years, and the reputation that he has in my county is as good as that of the best man in that county. He is a poor man to-day. If he were the dishonest, mercenary man that he is charged with being he would have a great deal more to show for it. Ten years was his first term on the common-pleas bench. He was reelected to a second term and he served a number of years since in other courts. I regard him as an honest, faithful, and capable judge, unfortunate, it is true, in some of his associations, and these associations made through the kindliness of his heart and his desire to help other people.

Mr. CLAYTON. And to make money.

Mr. FARR. Not a dollar has he made, and the evidence does not indicate where he made one dollar.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; he got $250 from this note.

Mr. FARR. I am going to present Judge Archbald's side of this from a statement his attorney published within a day or two, in which he vigorously denies every one of these charges. Judge Archbald, through his counsel, states that he emphatically denies that in any of the transactions referred to in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary which are embraced in the articles of impeachment which the committee submitted to the House he used or attempted to use his influence as a judge improperly.

Conscious of his own integrity, it never occurred to him in any of the transactions referred to that others might suspect that he was acting otherwise than uprightly.

When the original charges against him were presented to the President and the Attorney General he was given no notice and had no hearing. In the proceedings before the House Judiciary Committee he was permitted to cross-examine witnesses, but it was explicitly stated by the chairman that the proceeding was a hearing and not a trial. In the hearings before the committee the principal charges which had led the President and the Attorney General to take action were shown to be utterly unfounded. When the evidence was closed what charges the committee might make could not be known to Judge Archbald or his counsel until they were presented to the House.

Judge Archbald therefore will have no opportunity to present his defense until he is summoned before the Senate, and until he has a hearing there he asks that public opinion in his case may be suspended.

Mr. WEBB. May I ask the gentleman what he is reading from? Is it Col. Worthington's statement as counsel?

Mr. FARR. Yes. I believe it to be true that he has not used his influence improperly in any of these cases, and in the case of this poor man Watson who, because of his physical condition, did not make a strong showing before the committee, I think the committee showed a lack of consideration for a broken-down man. Judge Archbald wanted to help him because of his financial condition and the physical weaknesses that had followed a most pathetic bereavement in Mr. Watson's home. It was out of the kindness of his heart, and his hope that he could help the Bolands as well as Mr. Watson, that he tried to bring about a settlement with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Co. There is not a bit of evidence that Judge Archbald succeeded in getting any option or interest in any property through his official position. The fact that he used his official letterhead is an indication that he felt that he was acting openly on these questions. It was not necessary for him to use the letterhead to let the people in the community know that he was a member of the Commerce Court.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. FARR. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the gentleman, if he is going to explain the Watson deal, to tell the House why Watson came to Washington to see Judge Archbald. If the gentleman wants to make an explanation of Watson's conduct and the judge's relation to Watson in that deal, why did Watson come to Washington to see Judge Archbald?

Mr. FARR. I do not know the particulars to which the gentleman refers, but I know Watson and I know Judge Archbald, and I know that there was not a thought in Judge Archbald's mind of doing anything improperly, and all he did in the case was to help both the Bolands and Watson.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the gentleman read Watson's testimony, where he stated he came down here to see Judge Archbald to find out what the record was in a certain case pending before the Interstate Commerce Commission that had been appealed to the Commerce Court? Has the gentleman read the telegrams that passed back and forth, the telegram that came from Judge Archbald to him, and has he read the testimony to show that the attorney absolutely from the record was mistaken, and that is a mild word to use, and that his trip down here to see him in regard to that matter is absolutely unexplained to-day from the evidence?

Mr. FARR. I think both of them can explain it.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to have it explained.

Mr. FARR. To think Judge Archbald was influenced in the matter by a thought of profit or to intimate that men of the reputation and standing of E. E. Loomis, vice president, and R. A. Phillips, a near neighbor of mine, general manager of the mining department of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., both high-salaried men, in a deal against the interests of their company is absurd.

Now, I want to refer to a little matter which prejudiced me possibly more than anything else against the views of this committee is the reference to the sum of money raised by a friend of Judge Archbald, knowing he was going to take advantage of an invitation to visit the home of a relative of his wife in a foreign country. The clerk of the court knowing Judge Archbald was poor, feeling that a few extra dollars in his pockets would serve an excellent purpose, took advantage of that to send out to the different attorneys practicing before the court and asking them, without the judge's knowledge, to make contributions for a purse for Judge Archbald, and on the day Judge Archbald was on the boat he handed this purse unexpectedly to him, and the committee makes that an excuse for saying that this was an offense because of Mr. Cannon's corporate connections, saying Mr. Cannon is a remote relative of Mrs. Archbald, whereas the fact is that he is a first cousin of Mrs. Archbald, and so this $500 presentation is brought in and made part of these charges against the judge and one of the facts on which they want him impeached.

I shall continue this statement because I want it in the RECORD:

First. That in a suit brought by John W. Peale against the Marian Coal Co., in which the Bolands were largely interested, Judge Archbald had overruled a demurrer to the complaint filed by the counsel for the Marian Coal Co., because the Bolands had refused to discount a certain $500 note which Judge Archbald had indorsed.

Second. That in the same suit Judge Archbald, at the instigation of the Lackawanna Railroad officials, ordered the Marian Coal Co. to close its testimony in 30 days.

Third. That after Judge Archbald had become a member of the Commerce Court he, at the request of an official of the Lackawanna Railroad Co., induced District Judge Witmer, before whom the case of Peale v. Marian Coal Co. was then pending, to decide that case in favor of Peale.

Fourth. That through Judge Archbald Mr. Seager, one of the counsel of the Lackawanna Railroad Co., was given advance information that the Peale case would be decided against the Marian Coal Co.

All these charges, except the third, related to Judge Archbald's official acts. By the evidence before the Judiciary Committee of the House every one of these charges was so completely disproved that no reference is made to any one of them in the report of the committee or in the articles of impeachment.

The committee, however, has recommended the impeachment of Judge Archbald on 13 other charges, only 2 of which relate to the performance by him of any judicial act, and in neither of the 2 excepted cases is it charged that he acted corruptly.

CULM-DUMP DEALS.

The principal charge by the committee relates to Judge Archbald's connection with the attempted purchase from the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary of the Erie Railroad Co., of its interest in the Katydid culm dump. That Judge Archbald was interested in the proposed purchase is not denied. It is not claimed by the committee, and we assume it will not be claimed by anyone, that the mere fact that a Federal judge is interested in the attempted purchase of property from one who is or may be a litigant in his court is a criminal offense or is even in itself evidence of a corrupt mind.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. FARR. Not at this time.

Mr. CLAYTON. I would like to know from what the gentleman is reading.

Mr. FARR (continuing reading):

In its report the sole ground upon which the committee relies in reaching its conclusion that in this particular case Judge Archbald acted corruptly is the evidence as to the value of the Katydid culm dump. The committee assumes that the interest of the Hillside Co. in the dump was worth a great deal more than Judge Archbald and his associates were to pay for it.

When, in fact, the interest of that company was offered some years before that for nearly one-half of what Judge Archbald agreed to pay for it, though the fact is that the deal was never consummated.

The statement then quoted the testimony of Capt. May, manager of the Erie Railroad's coal properties, and that of other witnesses to show that Judge Archbald's profit in the Katydid culm bank, had he been able to sell it, would have been comparatively small, about $4,000, and that a portion of that would have belonged to Williams, his partner in the deal. The statement continued:

"Only two other culm bank transactions are referred to by the committee. One of them had no connection whatever with any railroad company. As to the other, there is no evidence of favor asked or favors given and no evidence that the transaction, if it had been carried through, would have been profitable. . As to these, as also with respect to the proposed purchase of coal properties from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., the case against Judge Archbald rests upon the naked proposition that it is an impeachable misdemeanor for a Federal judge to have business transactions with litigants or possible litigants in his court.

"In another article of impeachment it is charged that Judge Archbald 'for a consideration' used his influence to bring about a settlement of litigation which the Bolands, in various forms, were engaged in with the Lackawanna Railroad Co. It is not claimed in the report of the committee that there was any direct evidence tending to prove that for what he did in attempting to bring about this settlement Judge Archbald was to receive compensation or was to be benefited in any way. The committee simply assumes it to be incredible that Judge Archbald would help a friend to settle a litigation or help a lawyer to earn a fee unless he was paid for it. Mr. Watson testified positively before the committee that Judge Archbald was not to receive any part of the compensation which was to come to him (Watson).

"Judge Archbald's participation in the attempted settlement of this litigation was, in fact, due to long friendship for the Bolands and friendship for and a desire to help Mr. Watson, and there is no foundation for the charge that he was to receive any money or anything else of value.

"Another article of impeachment is based upon the charge that Judge Archbald 'agreed and consented' that the $500 note above referred to, indorsed by him, should be presented to the Bolands for discount at a time when they were interested in litigation in his court. When this note was offered for discount, Judge Archbald had had no connection with the case of Peale v. Marian Coal Co., except in overruling a demurrer which had been filed by that company to the complaint, and in appointing an examiner to take the testimony. There is nothing in the evidence to justify the inference that Judge Archbald authorized the note to be presented to the Bolands for discount because they were interested, as stockholders in the Marian Coal Co., in the case in which that company was defendant.

"Judge Archbald's petition was that of an accommodation indorser. The inference of the committee that Judge Archbald received or was to receive the proceeds of this note or any part of such proceeds is not justified by anything in the evidence and is not true in fact.

"In discussing the charge relative to the correspondence by Judge Archbald with the attorney of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co., the committee report entirely ignores the fact that the attorney's letter correcting the testimony of a witness in the case was pasted into the record (obviously by Judge Archbald) for all the world to see, and the written opinion afterward rendered by Judge Archbald assumes that the testimony was correct as it originally stood.

"New charges appear in the articles of impeachment which were not developed by the testimony before the committee. For example, it is made the ground of impeachment that Judge Archbald took a trip to Europe at the expense of Mr. Henry W. Cannon, who had large corporate connections. The committee say, 'it is claimed that Mr. Cannon is a distant relative of Judge Archbald's wife.'

"The slightest investigation would have shown that, in fact, Mr. Cannon is Mrs. Archbald's first cousin, and that the occasion and object of the trip was for the purpose of making a visit, at Mr. Cannon's request, at his residence in Florence, Italy."

Mr. Speaker, I desire, without reading it to the House, to add some additional remarks to go in the RECORD, and I desire also to repeat what I said at the beginning, that I regard Judge Archbald as an honest and a good man, his morals of the highest type and his habits the very best, and that in this case he is unfortunate, and I firmly believe that when this matter comes before the Senate and all the hearsay evidence and other evidence that does not properly belong in these hearings is removed, that he will be acquitted of this charge.

MEMORANDUM SUBMITTED ON BEHALF OF JUDGE ARCHBALD.

In order to present more fully Judge Archbald's defense in this case, I desire to submit the following statement made by his attorneys to the Judiciary Committee:

The original charges made by W. P. Boland to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by Commissioner Meyer transmitted to the President and by him to the Attorney General, were prepared by Mr. A. V. Cockrell, the confidential clerk of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and are found on page 152 of Serial II of the printed record. In substance these charges are:

1. That Judge Archbald sent Williams to Boland to procure the discount of a note for $500, to which Judge Archbald was a party, and that after Boland refused to discount the note Judge Archbald overruled the demurrer in the case of Peale v. The Marian Coal Co. because of such refusal.

2. That the letter of Mr. Seager to the Interstate Commerce Commission (Serial IV, p. 85) was based on advance information of a decision of the court in the Peale case, which was not rendered until some two months later.

3. That Judge Archbald's influence with the Erie Railroad Co. procured the sale to him of the Katydid culm dump, owned by the railroad, at a low figure, whereas it was worth a large sum.

4. That Judge Archbald was about to close the purchase of another culm bank through the influence of Mr. Darling, a railroad attorney.

Boland's motive in seeking the Interstate Commerce Commission was evidently to use his story of railroad oppression to influence the commission (C. G. Boland, Serial IV, p. 86). Mr. Cockrell, of the commission, says (Serial II, p. 154): "Mr. Boland was so full of his 10 years or more fight, I think, as he described it, for his rights, that his narrative took, I should say, and hour or two to tell."

Various members of the commission [Mr. Meyer, Mr. Cockrell, Mr. Clements] heard with great care Mr. Boland's story, and it was that part of it which related to Judge Archbald, a member of the Commerce Court, but did not relate to the suit before the commission, that was noted and transmitted to the President, as Mr. Commissioner Meyer says (Serial II, p. 90), "if for no other reason than that the commission was supposed to be charged with a certain attitude toward the Commerce Court."

When the charges got to the Attorney General, before whom the representative of the commission attended and examined W. P. Boland, there were made by Boland certain additional charges, coupled with the repetition of the complaints of railroad oppression (Serial II, p. 158). These were:

5. That the suit of Peale v. The Marian Coal Co. was started into activity by the making of an order by Judge Archbald upon the coal company to conclude its testimony in 30 days, after the suit had laid idle for 26 months, and that this action was taken because of the bringing of proceedings by the coal company against certain railroad companies before the Interstate Commerce Commission.

6. That the final decision in the Peale case was brought about by Mr. Loomis asking Judge Archbald to ask Judge Witmer to decide the case forthwith against the Marian Coal Co.

7. That Judge Archbald was to participate in the fees or profits to be made by settling the difficulties of the Marian Coal Co. with the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co.

There also was presented to the commission just before this visit to the Attorney General a charge by Boland against Judge Witmer, supported by affidavit, like the other charges. This was not laid before the Attorney General, because "Commissioner Meyer said that that matter had better not be included in his story, that it had no relation whatever on its face to Judge Archbald." (Cockrell, Serial II, p. 175.)

Every one of these seven charges has been proved by the investigation to be untrue, and nearly all of them clearly appear to be absurd. This we proceed to show.

1.—THE FIVE-HUNDRED-DOLLAR NOTE.

This note was dated December 3, 1909, discounted December 13, 1909. It was made by John Henry Jones to the order of R. W. Archbald, indorsed by R. W. Archbald and Edward J. Williams. [Testimony of Cashier Rollin D. Carr, of the Providence Bank, where the note was discounted (Serial II, p. 109); testimony of C. H. Von Storch, president of the bank (Serial II, p. 102); testimony of John Henry Jones (Serial II, p. 119); testimony of Edward J. Williams (Serial I, p. 22; Serial II, p. 41); testimony of C. G. Boland (Serial IV, p. 80, and as to date, p. 90). See also Williams's statement of July 31, 1911, which was prepared in Boland's office, and in which the date of the note is stated to have been December, 1910, a mistake, as all now agree, in the year (Serial I, p. 19).] According to both C. G. Boland and W. P. Boland, the note was presented to both of them at or about the same time, and no other note of a similar character was ever presented to either of them, and the note presented related to the Venezuela deal of Jones (C. G. Boland, Serial IV, p. 80; W. P. Boland, Serial VI, p. 792). There is no escape from the fact that but one note was offered for discount, and that that note was so presented in December, 1909, while the date of the ruling on the demurrer was September 25, 1909 (Serial IV, p. 91)—over two months before the note was made.

There is no evidence whatever to show that Judge Archbald suggested the presentation of this note to either of the Bolands. C. G. Boland never spoke to him about it (Serial IV, p. 93); neither did W. P. Boland (Serial VI, p. 729). Williams says that he suggested to Judge Archbald that he would take it to C. G. Boland, because the latter owed him money, and that Judge Archbald said, "All right, you can take it where you like" (Serial I, p. 9). And at that time C. G. Boland was the president of a bank near Buffalo which occasionally did Scranton business (Serial I, p. 16; Serial V, p. 546).

Jones says Judge Archbald had nothing to do with this (Serial II, p. 150).

The note was an accommodation by Judge Archbald to John Henry Jones. Jones received all the proceeds, used them to pay his expenses to England with reference to the Venezuela proposition (Jones's Serial II, pp. 118 and 126); Jones pays the discount on renewals, and has paid a sum in reduction of the note (Jones's Serial II, p. 124; Carr, Serial II, p. 111). It was Jones who, of his own motion, took the note to Mr. Von Storch, president of the Providence Bank, who finally discounted it, Jones having no knowledge that the Bolands were litigants in Judge Archbald's court (Jones's Serial II, pp. 122, 124).

Williams does not testify before this committee that Judge Archbald ever suggested that this note had any influence on his decision of the Peale case (Serial I, pp. 10, 13, and 14) or that he ever showed any feeling about Boland's refusal to discount it or said or did anything to show that he had been affected by it (Serial I, p. 17). Whatever Williams said on the subject to anyone was—he testifies—his own thought and not based on anything that Judge Archbald said or did (Serial II, p. 38). As a matter of fact, the dates demonstrate that Judge Archbald never could have said or done anything to give anybody any ground for believing that the matter of the note entered into his decision, and whatever Williams may have said about it on any previous occasion—which is not evidence before this committee—must necessarily have come from his own imagination or speculation, he himself not knowing or forgetting that the demurrer was overruled before the note was offered for discount and before it was in existence.

2.—SEAGER'S LETTER OF DECEMBER 6, 1911.

On December 6, 1911, Mr. Seager, who represented the Lackawanna Railroad in the suit of the Marian Coal Co. against it, upon being pressed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to furnish certain statistical tables, gave as an excuse for not doing so that (Serial IV, p. 85) "very soon thereafter we were informed, from a reliable source, that because of the loss of the property of the Marian Coal Co. as a result of litigation with other parties," and because of other relief obtained, Boland did not care to proceed. There is no evidence by anybody that Judge Archbald or anybody connected with him was the "reliable source" referred to. Mr. Seager (Serial VII, p. 930) has explained that his superior, Mr. W. S. Jenney, general counsel for the Lackawanna Railroad, was his informant, and Mr. Jenney (Serial IX, p. 1165) has explained that his information was derived from newspaper reports of the decree of Judge Witmer in the Peale case, which was entered August 24, 1911; the conversations with his Scranton associate, Mr. D. R. Reese, with reference to that decision conveying the information that at least $16,000 damages was admitted by the Marian Coal Co., and by conversation with Mr. Reynolds, attorney for the Central Railroad Co. of New Jersey, who reported that W. P. Boland had told him of the adverse result in the Peale case. Seager (Serial VII, pp. 960, 972) and Jenney (Serial IX, p. 1175) deny any other knowledge of or connection with the Peale case. The subject might well be dropped here.

It may not inappropriately be added, however, that Boland's present complaint that this letter of Seager's showed foreknowledge of the report of the special examiner filed in the Peale case January 30, 1912 (Serial IV, p. 91), could not have entered his mind until after he had taken offense at the letter, it being on January 6, 1912, that he made his first visit to the Interstate Commerce Commission to state his grievances (Serial II, p. 90). As a matter of fact, the decision of Judge Witmer, rendered August 24, 1911, effectually disposed of the whole case on the merits (Serial VII, p. 969; 190 Fed. Rep., p. 376) by perpetually enjoining the Marian Coal Co. from delivering its coal to anyone except Peale, directing an accounting for all moneys advanced by the plaintiff and for damages suffered by the plaintiff and appointing a master to state the account. This was final as to everything except figures, and its effect upon the Marian Coal Co. may be judged from the statement of W. P. Boland (Serial VI, p. 796).

"Mr. BOLAND. We were served with notice, and the property has been shut down ever since, and practically ruined—a loss of $10,000.

"Mr. WORTHINGTON. That was by this injunction that Judge Witmer granted on the 24th of August?

"Mr. BOLAND. That injunction has destroyed the property of the Marian Coal Co. Preventing the operation of the plant has destroyed the plant."

It is absurd, of course, to suggest that a letter written on December 6 showed foreknowledge of a final decree which had been rendered and published over three months before that date. And even as to the master's report, which was filed long after December 6, there is not a word of evidence in the record tending to prove that Mr. Seager or Mr. Janney knew anything about it till it was filed in court, or indeed till it was brought out in this hearing.

3.—KATYDID DUMP.

The facts taken from the testimony of those people who really knew and who gave accurate details, with the production of papers, dates, etc., are as follows:

(A) NEGOTIATIONS FOR PURCHASE.

Williams's attention was called to this dump by W. P. Boland (testimony W. P. Boland, Serial VI, pp. 755, 770), and Williams got a verbal option from John M. Robertson, the owner of one of the interests, for $3,500. He fixes the date as April 5, 1911, by a memorandum book. (Williams, Serial II, p. 77.)

At W. P. Boland's further suggestion (made for the purpose of getting Judge Archbald into relations with the Erie Railroad Co., Serial VI, p. 755), Williams went to Judge Archbald and got a letter from him to Capt. W. A. May, the superintendent of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., the owner of what was supposed to be the other interest. This is spoken of as a letter of introduction in many places, but when actually produced (Serial II, p. 83) it is a letter from Judge Archbald to Capt. May, inquiring whether his company will dispose of the dump, and, if so, what the price will be, without mentioning Williams.

This letter Williams evidently took to Capt. May, who thereupon (Serial II, p. 83) gave directions for an investigation and report to him upon the character and size of the dump. Capt. May later, probably in June, 1911, discussed the proposed sale with his superior officer, Mr. Richardson, the vice president of the company, when Mr. Richardson happened to be in Scranton, on which occasion they visited the dump (May, Serial III, pp. 15, 16; Richardson, Serial VIII, p. 1004). At this time Judge Archbald's letter was mentioned to Mr. Richardson as the basis of the negotiations which were to be conducted (May, Serial III, p. 16).

There was no discussion of price between May and Richardson at that time or at any time. (Serial VIII, p. 1006.)

May also says (Serial III, p. 60) that at this time he favored making a sale, and that Mr. Richardson opposed it because of the complications as to the title. Mr. Richardson says, however (Serial VIII, pp. 1005, 1013, and 1027), that Capt. May merely entered into the question and showed him the bank, with a view to taking it up at some future time when the investigation and negotiation would be complete and the question of finally making the sale would come up before Mr. Richardson for determination.

On August 4, 1911, Judge Archbald (who was then in New York holding a circuit court) called upon George F. Brownell, the general counsel of the Erie Railroad Co. and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary of the railroad company (Brownell, Serial III, p. 106), and stated that he wanted to clear up the title to this property; that he had been in negotiation with Capt. May, "but that no final answer had been received and that he understood the matter had been referred to the New York office. He stated, in substance, and I think in words, that he knew no other officer of the Erie Co. except myself, and so had taken the liberty of calling to ask if I could tell him who in the organization would be the person having the matter in charge (Serial III, p. 107).

Mr. Brownell took Judge Archbald to Mr. Richardson, introduced him, and soon left. Mr. Brownell never had any other communication with Judge Archbald at any other time or place with regard to the matter (p. 107). He had met Judge Archbald in Washington at hearings before the Commerce Court (p. 108). Nor did Mr. Brownell talk with Mr. Richardson about the matter at any other time until these proceedings appeared in the papers. (Serial III, p. 112.)

No complaint of Capt. May was made. "The only conversation was a request for information, not asking for favors, or a discussion of business details at the time I was there." (Serial III, p. 118.)

Mr. Richardson (Serial VIII, p. 1003) recalls Mr. Brownell's part in the interview in the same way, and then says: "The judge opened the matter of business on which he called by stating that he was either interested for himself or other parties in the Katydid culm bank. I told him I had had some conversation with Capt. May in regard to it several months prior to that time; that just what it was I could not recall, but that the next time Mr. May was in New York, or I was in Scranton, I would make it a point to ask him what the situation was, and to see if some determination could not be arrived at."

On August 25, 1911 (Serial IV, p. 6), Richardson talked with May in New York about this and other matters, and according to Richardson told May to "go ahead and see if he could not close it up in some manner" (Serial VIII, p. 1014), and since that time Richardson has had no communication from May about it (Serial VIII, p. 1007).

May proceed to close the matter up by giving what is known as the "May option" of August 30, 1911, agreeing to "recommend" the sale of the Hillside interest, such as it was, for $4,500.

It is important to remember the length of time which these negotiations consumed, in view of the fact that Williams mistakenly crowds the events at some places into two weeks (Serial I, p. 25; Serial II, p. 48), giving the impression that his failure to get a favorable answer from May was followed immediately by threats against May by Judge Archbald, a visit by the latter to Brownell, and an instant giving of the option.

No witness testifies to any threats made to the Erie officials, or anything even approaching it.

Williams' attitude as to these alleged threats is best illustrated by the following quotation from the testimony, referring to the statements made by him to Mr. Wrisley Brown (Serial II, p. 15):

"Mr. WILLIAMS. He [Judge Archbald] said 'I have some cases here for them now.' That is all he said.

"The CHAIRMAN. Did you not tell Mr. Brown, and do you not now say, that you thought that the judge meant that he had a chance to do something for them or against them; for May or for the railroad company, or against May or against the railroad company?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. He did not say so.

"The CHAIRMAN. What was the inference you drew from his remark?

"Mr. WILLIAMS. That would be mine; it would not be his."

The dates are also important for the purpose of comparison with the dates of the so-called Lighterage case. This was begun April 12, 1911, and was argued May 17, 1911, and preliminary injunction granted May 22, 1911, and appeal to the Supreme Court taken June 13, 1911. (Brownell, Serial III, p. 111.) It could hardly have come to Judge Archbald's attention until it was argued, and it was decided long before the visit to Brownell. Seager says that the appeal to the Supreme Court will dispose of the whole case. (Serial VII, pp. 947, 955.)

When the complainant moved for the appointment of an examiner to take testimony, Mr. Esterline for the Government resisted, saying (Serial X, p. 1208):

"The case has gone to the Supreme Court of the United States on the old record * * * not a word of which is disputed * * * and the Supreme Court's decision * * * will dispose of that case. * * * It is the contention of the Government that there is no testimony to be taken, and the decision of the Supreme Court will be final."

Though the examiner was appointed, no testimony has in fact been taken in the eight months which have elapsed (Serial X, p. 1212).

The dates show also how absurd is such an invention—by somebody—as that which appears in Miss Mary Boland's notes, that Williams said, on September 18 and 28, 1911, that Judge Archbald was then preparing a "brief" for the Erie Railroad in the Lighterage case (Serial V, pp. 610, 611).

(B) MIXED STATE OF THE TITLE AS TO KATYDID DUMP.

This best appears from the evidence of Capt. May (Serial III, pp. 10, 49) and of Robertson (Serial III, p. 119). The dump rested on a tract of land known as lot 46, owned one-half by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and one-half by a number of people with quite minutely subdivided interests known collectively as the "Everhart estate." The Hillside Co. had a license to mine from the Everharts, contained in a letter (which had been lost), by which it was agreed to pay them 20 cents a ton upon sizes larger than pea coal, and the Hillside had collected on that basis for the Everharts in the past. The Hillside Co. had mined the tract at one time, but most of the dump was produced by Robertson & Law, under a lease from the Hillside Co., at certain royalties stated by May (Serial III, pp. 11 and 22). The Everhart license was revocable at any time (Serial II, p. 11). Robertson had succeeded to all the rights of his firm, and had maintained his possession of the dump, taking coal from it from time to time (Robertson, Serial III, pp. 119, 140).

Judge Archbald and Williams had evidently supposed that the Hillside's agreement with the Everharts, their coowners, would permit them to dispose of the Everhart interest as well as their own; but when it appeared that the Hillside would only give a quitclaim, and the title was looked into by the attorneys for the Laurel Line, to whom a resale was proposed (Serial III, p. 74), the Everhart rights were brought up, and not only stopped that sale, but compelled the negotiators to try to purchase that interest through the intervention of Dainty, who was supposed to have influence with them (Williams, Serial II, p. 9).

These efforts, however, to the contrary, evidently stirred the Everharts into activity and they flooded Capt. May and Robertson with notices forbidding them to sell (Serial III, p. 42; Serial II, p. 135; Serial III, p. 173), so that Capt. May, under advice of his attorneys, eventually refused to go on with the sale at all.

These notices were dated April 11, 13, and 19. Capt. May says that he had no knowledge of any investigation by the Government into these transactions until he saw it in the newspaper of April 21, 1912 (Serial III, pp. 168, 170, 187); and there is no evidence to contradict this, so that his reason must be taken to be true.

(C) VALUE OF THE DUMP.

To support the suspicion that undue influence was exerted by Judge Archbald, it is intimated, rather than charged, that he was afforded an opportunity to make a large profit by giving him favorable terms.

The interests of Robertson and the Hillside were not one-half each, as has sometimes been assumed. If they were, Robertson's price made to Williams without Judge Archbald's interference ($3,500) would be a good standard by which to judge the Hillside's price ($4,500). The most accurate way of determining the value of the Hillside interest, however, is that adopted by Capt. May, who takes the Hillside interest at exactly what it was, to wit, a royalty interest, and by multiplying the number of tons in the dump, as estimated by Rittenhouse, the engineer employed both by the Government investigator and by the Laurel Line, and multiplying it by the royalties arrives (Serial III, p. 22) at the figure of $2,752.71. The purchasers, in addition, would have to pay the Everhart royalty of 20 cents per ton for sizes larger than pea coal (May option, Serial I, p. 26). Of this Rittenhouse estimated (Serial II, p. 21) 5,477 tons. The resulting royalty is $1,095.40.

The value of the dump is also shown by the terms of the resale to the Laurel Line. The very careful and detailed estimate of Mr. Rittenhouse, the engineer employed by the Government, showed the total contents of the bank to be 90,186 tons, and applying his percentages of the various sizes of coal down to the smallest size in use we get 46,704 tons of coal of all sizes (Serial II, p. 198), or 41,227 tons, excluding chestnut (Serial II, p. 190).

The survey of the Erie engineers showed 42,500 tons of merchantable coal (May, Serial III, p. 25). These estimates are probably much more accurate than those made by the eye merely of other people. At any rate, they are the estimates upon which the parties acted.

Mr. Conn, for the Laurel Line, agreed to give "a royalty of 27½ cents per gross ton for all coal shipped, with a minimum of 20,000 tons per year, and if you agree to accept this proposition will arrange to pay $10,000 as advanced royalties."

This appears by his letter of November 29, 1911 (Serial III, p. 77), and it is important to note it, as many of the witnesses, by misunderstanding, refer to the price as a flat rate of 27½ cents per ton; that is to say, for every ton of material, whether merchantable coal or waste. Mr. Conn says (Serial III, p. 81) that he based his figures on a total tonnage of 50,000 (the word "thousand" is omitted in the printed report). The Rittenhouse tonnage of 46,704 tons, at 27½ cents a ton, amounts all together to $12,943.60, which is the price Conn was thus in effect to pay for the dump.

The Bradley price of $20,000 was made in April, 1912 (Serial III, p. 148), at a time when the coal strike had caused a great advance in the value of dumps (Serial VI, p. 707; Serial II, p. 54), and as to the Bradley negotiations there is no evidence that Judge Archbald was in any way a party to them.

The Thomas Star Jones option for $25,000 came to nothing as soon as Jones had looked at the bank and estimated the quantity of coal in it. (Serial VIII, p. 979.)

A year or two before this transaction Robertson had proposed to sell the dump to the Du Pont Powder Co. for $10,000, and at that time Capt. May had tentatively agreed to sell the Hillside interest to Robertson (out of which he was to take care of the Everharts) for $2,000. (May, Serial III, pp. 36, 38, 39, and 50; Robertson, Serial III, pp. 120, 121, 122, 138.)

Rittenhouse, however, has a calculation of the large profits which the Erie or Hillside gave up to do this "favor." As to the profits of the railroad on the transportation of the coal, we find that Capt. May, in his option, reserved the right to approve of the purchaser, and proposed to draw further articles of agreement. (Serial I, p. 26.) Accordingly, when he did come to draw the only definite agreement to which he committed himself—the Bradley contract (Serial III, p. 171)—the lessee was obligated to ship over the Erie Railroad, and on failure to do so the agreement was to be revocable.

The profit to the Erie from transfer, etc., of the coal was thus expressly saved to it and drops out of the account. Whatever it amounted to it would still be made.

As to the profits on washing the bank itself to be made by the Hillside, this is all based on a conveying of the coal to the Consolidated Washery of the Hillside, which was some distance away. That the committee did not place any confidence in this theory of Mr. Rittenhouse is shown by the fact that when Capt. May undertook to explain why the Consolidated Washery of the Hillside could not handle this bank the chairman admonished him (Serial III, p. 24):

"Mr. May, the Chair does not desire to say how you shall answer any question, but the Chair submits to you that it would be well to omit from the record things that have no bearing upon this inquiry. I leave that to you?"

Whereupon he desisted.

The most important thing, however, is that the Hillside Co. did not own the bank. Robertson owned it, subject to the payment of a royalty to the Hillside; and while he had been wanting to sell to them and had been negotiating to that end for over a year, the bank was not of sufficient value to get as far as the mention of terms. (Serial III, p. 120.) If it was of such enormous value to the Hillside, they could and would unquestionably have bought out Robertson long before.

Rittenhouse figures out (Serial II, p. 199) that the Laurel Line would about break even at a "flat" rate of 30 cents a ton and that any other operator must lose money.

This absolutely proves that no favor was granted and that the whole matter was treated on a business basis.

Through all Judge Archbald's part in these negotiations there is not the slightest thing which has been connected by competent evidence with him to show that he tried to conceal his interest or deal in any other than an ordinary business way. The letter to Capt. May was in form a direct inquiry by him (Serial II, p. 83), and it was known to six or seven people in Capt. May's office. (Serial III, pp. 46, 69.) The Conn letter (Serial I, p. 33) was also in Judge Archbald's own name, and in it he stated explicitly that he was interested with Williams in the matter. W. P. Boland says (Serial VI, p. 759) that the agreement drafted with Conn was in Judge Archbald's name only. The talk with Robertson was that Judge Archbald was to have an interest (Serial III, p. 123), and Robertson says that everybody concerned knew of it. (Serial III, p. 127.) The Robertson option was in Judge Archbald's handwriting, witnessed by him, and ran in the name of Williams doubtless because Capt. May had first given his option in that form.

The only suggested concealment is in the papers concocted by W. P. Boland as part of the so-called "proofs" which he was getting up. These are the "silent party" paper of September 5, and the absurd veiled reference to a party not named in the letter of Williams to Conn of March 13. Boland admits that he helped to prepare both of these papers (W. P. Boland, Serial VI, pp. 756, 805), although his niece and stenographer remembers with great positiveness, and repeats twice (Mary F. Boland, Serial V, p. 616; Serial VI, p. 632) that both W. P. Boland and C. G. Boland were in Wilkes-Barre on the day the March 13 paper was prepared, and that Williams alone told her what to say in that letter. Boland says (Serial VI, p. 805) that he thinks that Dainty, Williams, and himself "participated in the formation of this letter" of March 13; that the dictation of the letter was the suggestion of all three of them. Williams certainly intends to be understood as saying that Judge Archbald knew nothing of the "silent party" paper (Serial I, pp. 44, 45; Serial II, pp. 43, 69), and nowhere contradicts his repeated assertion that Judge Archbald did not ask to be referred to as a "silent party." (Serial I, p. 46; Serial II, pp. 43, 56, 61, 63.) The letter of March 13, W. P. Boland says, was inspired by a desire to see Williams take his profits. (Serial VI, p. 760.) This is a novel motive for his acts. It was much more likely an effort to close the deal in order to get more convincing "proofs," as was also his suggestion of Bradley as a purchaser. (W. P. Boland, Serial VI, p. 760.)

4.—Darling Letter.

This was one of the most startling of the original charges. In the Cockrell memorandum of January 6, 1912, Boland is stated to have said that this sale was about to be closed (Serial II, p. 153). The letter from Judge Archbald to Darling was dated August 3, nearly seven months before (Serial III, p. 141).

It appeared that Williams asked Judge Archbald for a letter of introduction to Mr. Darling, an attorney, that Williams might inquire about the purchase of a culm dump. This was evidently instigated by W. P. Boland as part of his trap, for he promptly photographed the letter. Indeed, W. P. Boland admitted before the Attorney General that he put Williams up to getting this letter from Judge Archbald to Darling (Serial III, p. 165).

Williams was immediately informed that the dump was leased to another party, so that there were really no negotiations. No railroad or other litigant had any connection with the Hollenbach Coal Co., which owned the dump (Darling, Serial III, p. 142; Williams, Serial II, p. 30).

5.—Thirty-Day Order to Close Testimony in Peale Case.

The most obvious thing about this charge is that it is based on W. P. Boland's interpretation of oral remarks made by Judge Archbald upon the hearing in chambers of the application for the order, easily misunderstood by a layman, and most certainly misunderstood by a man of Mr. Boland's prepossessions (Serial VII, p. 817). A copy of the order (Serial VII, p. 817) shows as follows:

"Now, 27th day of January, A. D. 1911, it is ordered that the hearing before the special examiner in the above-entitled action be continued from 30th day of January, A. D. 1911, to 27th day of February, A. D. 1911, at the city of New York, State of New York, and that the defendant resume the taking of testimony on said 27th day of February, 1911, and continue the same until the defendant rests."

No more extensions were asked for (Serial VI, p. 743), although Judge Archbald meanwhile had gone on the Commerce Court bench, and the new judge might have been applied to. The order gave the defendant an indefinite time after February 27 in which to take its testimony and, as a matter of fact, there is no evidence as to when the testimony was closed. W. P. Boland's recollection is indefinite, and he does not assert that they ceased taking testimony after February (Serial VI, p. 787). The docket entries (Serial IV, p. 91) show that an amendment was applied for by the defendant on June 30, 1911, and that the evidence of both plaintiff and defendant, including rebuttal evidence of the plaintiff and surrebuttal of the defendant, were filed July 18, 1911. The case had been pending before the examiner for over 14 months—since November 17, 1910. The Supreme Court equity rules (rule 69) require the testimony in every case to be completed within three months. Mr. Frank E. Donnelly, the attorney for the Marian Coal Co., was not called to give the effect of the order upon the defendant's case, which he would naturally understand better than his client. In fact, Boland's complaint is not so much of the "30-day" order, as of what he alleges was the refusal of Judge Archbald to order the plaintiff to furnish a statement of the customers with whom he dealt, so as to enable Boland to investigate the facts. As brought out by Mr. Sterling in the examination of W. P. Boland (Serial VI, p. 743) and Mr. Graham (Serial VI, p. 733), there was no real application for such an order except so far as appears by the indefinite and easily misled recollection of W. P. Boland himself. There is no record evidence of it. In fact the Bolands did find what they wanted in the books of Peale, Peacock & Kerr (Mr. Graham's examination of W. P. Boland, Serial VI, p. 787).

It is hardly supposed that the granting of this order in the ordinary exercise of judicial discretion is sought to be made into an impeachable offense. Doubtless it has an important bearing on W. P. Boland's actions, because he says it is that which started his real suspicions of Judge Archbald's integrity, and started him on his plan to entrap Judge Archbald. In fact, he says that the $500-note incident would have been forgotten but for this order (Serial VI, pp. 768, 793; Serial VII, p. 816).

6.—Judge Witmer's Decision in the Peale Case and Judge Archbald's Connection With It.

The absurd story heard by W. P. Boland—or believed by him to have been heard—that Mr. Loomis, the vice president of the Lackawanna Railroad, got Judge Archbald to influence Judge Witmer to render this decision was the next act of oppression which actuated W. P. Boland, and he speaks of it in the same connection as his complaint about the "30-day" decision (Serial VI, p. 793; Serial VII, p. 816).

It is sufficient to say of this that neither W. P. Boland (Serial VI, pp. 783, 784, 765) nor C. G. Boland (Serial IV, p. 100) pretends to have any first-hand knowledge, but claim to have derived their story from Watson and Searle. Loomis (Serial IX, p. 1153) denies the story, and no inquiry was made of Watson or Searle, although attention was called to it by counsel for Judge Archbald when Searle was on the stand. (Serial X, p. 1253.) Phillips says that Boland told him that Searle told him that Loomis told Judge Witmer to render the decision. (Serial VII, p. 841.) There is nothing further to discuss with regard to it.

7.—Attempted Settlement of Marian Coal Co. Litigation.

Judge Archbald had nothing to do with the employment of Watson by the Bolands. They employed him on the recommendation of Williams as a man who had influence with the railroads. The inference is strong that the Bolands believed that Williams had in mind that Watson would interest Judge Archbald, because the whole incident is brought in in connection with Williams's alleged relations with Judge Archbald. (W. P. Boland, Serial VI, p. 734; C. G. Boland, Serial IV, p. 82; Reynolds, Serial V, p. 580.) Watson says that C. G. Boland first came to him about the matter—he does not know why—and that Boland suggested that Watson bring in Judge Archbald. (Serial VII, p. 844).

Whether the Boland motive was to trap Judge Archbald or to profit by the undue influence which they believed he could exert, their story is incongruous with the present assertion that they resented his interference (W. P. Boland, Serial VI, p. 784; C. G. Boland, Serial V, p. 541), though they never actually protested even when (as they allege) they were told that wholesale bribery was to be practiced in their behalf. Still more incongruous is the assertion that Judge Archbald's acts were in the interest of the railroad in order to delay the rate case until the Peale case should put them out of business (W. P. Boland, Serial VI, p. 737), which is evidently inspired by Boland's attorney, Mr. Reynolds. (Reynolds, Serial V, pp. 585, 594.) The Bolands themselves sought Watson and started these negotiations. They negotiated themselves with the railroad company, both before and after. (Serial VII, pp. 937, 938, 943.) The active work of the negotiation occurred in September, after the Peale decision. (Loomis, Serial IX, p. 1134 et seq.) And if designed for delay the negotiation would not have been broken so decisively by the railroads after only one interview with the railroad heads and with no suggestion of any further conference. (Serial IX, p. 1145; Serial X, p. 1188.)

Here again there is nothing but incompetent hearsay evidence that Judge Archbald was to participate in the fees or profits to be made by the settlement of this case. W. P. Boland does not pretend to have talked to Judge Archbald about it on any occasion (Serial VI, p. 729). C. G. Boland only goes so far as to say that he met Watson in Judge

Archbald's office, that Judge Archbald said he would be glad to help in the settlement, and called Loomis on the telephone while C. G. Boland was there, and, further, that Judge Archbald wanted an assurance of a fee of $5,000 to Watson, and that pursuant to this assurance C. G. Boland got a paper from W. P. Boland promising this fee, and gave it to Watson (Serial IV, pp. 82 and 83). All that C. G. Boland had to say about a division, either of the $5,000 fee or of the difference between $100,000 and $160,000 to be divided with Judge Archbald and the officials of the Lackawanna Railroad, he does not pretend to know of his own knowledge, but only by relation from Watson (Serial IV, pp. 88, 97, and 102). Indeed, C. B. Boland does not claim that Watson said that Judge Archbald asked for money, but merely that Watson said, "The judge was certainly an important factor," and "he felt the judge ought to be compensated." Although C. G. Boland talked to Judge Archbald about this settlement (Serial V, p. 541), and had a letter from him as late as November 13 (Serial V, p. 554), and talked to Loomis and Phillips, the officials of the Lackawanna Railroad, who, he says he thought, were to participate in the excess price asked by Watson (Serial V, pp. 537, 538, and 539), he never mentioned the matter to Judge Archbald or Mr. Loomis, and when he spoke of it to Phillips the latter (p. 538) vigorously denied it.

Phillips (Serial VII, p. 842), Watson (Serial VII, p. 901), and Loomis (Serial IX, pp. 1153 and 1157) all emphatically denied this story.

Although the above covers only a very small part of the charge made and the testimony taken on this transaction, it does cover all that could by any possibility be made an impeachable offense. That Judge Archbald interested himself as a mediator between the Marian Coal Co. and the Lackawanna Railroad, whether out of friendliness to the Bolands or to Watson or to the railroad, is not an offense of that character, unless he was either to profit by it or was to use an improper influence to bring it about. There is no evidence of either.

Criticisms upon Watson's testimony, and variation of his dates with the dates fixed by other witnesses, will not create evidence that Judge Archbald exercised any improper influence over the railroad, or attempted to do so, or that Watson asked him to do so, or, indeed, at the time of his Washington visit, asked him to interfere further at all in the case.

The reason for Judge Archbald's interest, in the entire absence of competent evidence of a corrupt motive, is evidently that given by several witnesses, as follows:

C. G. Boland (Serial IV, p. 89): "When I was called over to his office I was led to believe that he was acting as a friend of Mr. Watson; and I might say that the judge and myself have been neighbors for more than 40 years. We were friends."

Truesdale (Serial IX, p. 1113): "They were all, I took it, acquaintances and friends of long standing of Judge Archbald's."

Loomis (Serial IX, p. 1142): "Mr. Archbald being a friend of the Bolands and being friendly to us, was simply acting as a mediator to adjust the differences that were existing between our companies."

Jenney (Serial IX, p. 1168) says that on asking Maj. Warren, his associate attorney in Scranton, what Judge Archbald's motive was, he received the answer that Watson was influential in getting the United States court located at Scranton, drew the bill, and expected to be the judge, and that Judge Archbald, having been appointed in his stead, felt kindly toward him and wanted to help him, and was therefore drawn in by Watson.

That Watson raised the price he asked of the Lackawanna Railroad from the figure of $100,000, authorized by the Bolands, to $160,000, without authority, would, if true, affect only his relations with his client and would not tend to prove that Judge Archbald or anybody else was to participate in the excess sum. It is interesting, however, to notice that as early as September 1, 1911, the claim made in behalf of the Marian Coal Co. for reparation against the Lackawanna Railroad was for an average of 43 cents excess rate per ton upon 376,000 tons of coal shipped, amounting to $161,680 (letter of Phillips to Loomis of Sept. 1, 1911, Serial VII, p. 942). This is the sum which figured as Watson's demand. And from the date of this letter it evidently figured in the negotiations long before Watson's interview with Phillips, Loomis, and Truesdale on October 5, 1911. In fact, independently of Watson, the Bolands were seeking a settlement by interviews with Mr. Reese, the Lackawanna's attorney in Scranton. (Reese to Seager, July 31, 1911; Reese to Phillips, July 29, 1911, speaking of interview with W. P. Boland; Reese to Seager, Aug. 11, 1911, Serial VII, pp. 937 and 938.) Boland also continued negotiations after Watson's intervention. (Letter, Reese to Seager, Jan. 12, 1912, speaking of conference with Boland about settlement of all claims, Serial VII, p. 943.) And, as is already noted, C. G. Boland himself interviewed Loomis and Phillips after Watson had dropped out. (Serial V, p. 537.) The manner in which this claim of $161,680 is made up precludes the possibility of its being invented by Watson, as asserted by the Bolands. Although Boland's clerk, Pryor, prepared some figures about freight rates and tonnage to show the coal company's damages and took them to Watson (Serial IV, pp. 50, 72), who returned all his papers to the Bolands (Serial VII, p. 844), and although Judge Archbald evidently had some papers which he returned with the "Dear Christy" letter (Serial V, p. 554), no papers whatever are produced by the Bolands which were used in the Watson negotiations, and their absence is not accounted for. It is highly probable that they showed these very figures.

Nor is there a word of testimony to connect Judge Archbald with Watson's intention to collect an excess of over $60,000 if it existed.

This closes the discussion of all the charges that were preferred against Judge Archbald either in the Cockrell memorandum or the hearing before the Attorney General.

Other charges which have been indicated in the taking of testimony before the committee will next be considered.

8.—RISSINGER NOTE.

As to this note the intimation seems to be that Judge Archbald sat as trial judge in a case in which one Rissinger was interested as plaintiff against insurance companies at a time when he was indorser on Rissinger's note for $2,500.

This is disposed of by the fact that Mr. Reynolds (Serial VI, p. 636) and Mr. Lenahan (Serial VIII, p. 1051) assert that Judge Archbald's rulings could not possibly have been different from what they were. They both participated in the trial and settlement as counsel for the plaintiff.

The record dates also prove that the suit was tried and settled November 23, 1908 (Docket entries, Serial VI, p. 657), and that the note which was in form an accommodation and discounted for Rissinger, the maker, was dated November 28, 1908, and discounted December 12, 1908. (Wallace M. Ruth, cashier of the bank, Serial VI, p. 665).

9.—AS TO THE SUM OF $250 RECEIVED FROM SALE OF GRAVITY FILL.

Here the charge appears to be that Judge Archbald received the sum of $250 for using his influence with railroads in connection with a culm dump known as the Gravity fill.

It is apparent that Judge Archbald really received this money for services in negotiating with Mr. Berry (who represented the owners of the dump), as testified by Berry (Serial VIII, p. 1055). Neither Berry nor his principals, nor any of the other parties to the transaction, had any affiliations with any of the railroads or any parties litigant in Judge Archbald's court. The coal from this dump is all shipped over the "Laurel Line," which is not an interstate line, and can therefore have no cases in the Commerce Court (Serial VI, p. 706). There is nothing improper in this transaction, unless it be an offense on the part of a judge to engage in any business transactions whatever. This is the only money, or profit of any kind, which anybody testifies Judge Archbald actually realized from any transaction.

10.—INTERVIEW WITH RICHARDS ON BEHALF OF WARNKE.

Both Mr. Richards (Serial VI, p. 668) and Mr. Warnke (Serial VI, p. 675), say that the only thing that was done was that Judge Archbald requested Mr. Richards, an official of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to give Warnke another hearing on an old controversy, but that this was politely but firmly refused. The matter ended there. Nobody says that Judge Archbald acted in any other capacity than as a friend of Warnke or suggested the granting of any other favor than a rehearing.

11.—SALE OF INTEREST IN EVERHART LAND TO LEHIGH VALLEY COAL CO.

Mr. Warriner testifies (Serial VI, p. 710) that his company, the Lehigh Valley Coal Co., had been buying up the title of the lessors in a certain tract of which the company was lessee, and that the interest owned by a Mrs. Llewellyn, one of the Everhart heirs, was still outstanding, as she would not sell. Judge Archbald said to him that a man named Dainty had influence with Mrs. Llewellyn and could persuade her to sell, and Mr. Warriner thereupon gave to Judge Archbald the price at which they would buy, which was the same proportionate price as they had given to the other interest, saying that they absolutely would pay nothing more. He supposed that Judge Archbald was acting as a friend of the owner, because the people originally came from Scranton, and he heard nothing further from it after that (Serial VI, p. 710, et seq.).

Williams testifies (Serial II, p. 22) that "Judge Archbald had no interest in it"; that he (Williams) introduced Dainty as a friend of the Everharts to Judge Archbald, because he (Williams) "thought" Judge Archbald could get the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. to pay the price Mrs. Llewellyn, one of them, wanted; that Judge Archbald communicated with Mr. Warriner. Further than that he knows nothing.

Even W. P. Boland says of this transaction (Serial VI, p. 779): "I do not think there was to be a cent divided on the Everhart deal by any of them."

12.—MORRIS & ESSEX TRACT, OWNED BY THE LEHIGH VALLEY COAL CO.

This tract was sought to be leased by Dainty from the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. There is nothing to show that the negotiation got so far as to mention terms. It is linked with the previous transaction (No. 11, above), although not otherwise than that Judge Archbald said to Mr. Warriner, at the time of his interviews about that matter, that Dainty would like to have a lease of this tract. The two matters had no connection in Mr. Warriner's mind (Serial VI, p. 714), and Judge Archbald was not to have any interest in the matter (Serial VI, p. 720).

Mr. Wrisley Brown (Serial X, p. 1291) testifies that Dainty said to him that Judge Archbald had no interest in this Morris & Essex tract.

Williams testifies (Serial II, p. 27) that he knows of this only from Dainty; that he knows of no interest of Judge Archbald in it, and he does not appear to know of any terms.

W. P. Boland knows of this only from Dainty (Serial VI, p. 772), and has a most remarkable story twice repeated (Serial VI, pp. 772 and 779); that it was a reward to Judge Archbald for services to the Lehigh Valley in the "segregation" or "commodity-clause" suit. This, no doubt, refers to the litigation which resulted in the decision of the Supreme Court rendered May 3, 1909, before the Commerce Court was created, in United States v. Delaware & Hudson Co. (213 U. S., 366), a litigation with which Judge Archbald was never connected in any way.

The interest of Judge Archbald in this matter doubtless grew out of the fact that Dainty was to help clear up the Everhart interest in the Katydid culm dump, which, while outstanding, stood in the way of a sale to Mr. Conn (W. P. Boland, Serial VI, p. 774; Williams, Serial II, p. 9).

13.—PACKER NO. 3 DUMP.

As to this the intimation seems to be that Judge Archbald's influence with the Lehigh Valley Railroad was used in an attempt to procure a lease of a valuable culm dump.

Judge Archbald's attention was evidently brought to this dump by the fact that he had been approached about purchasing a neighboring washery known as the "Oxford," and on finding that this was not a good proposition had been drawn off to what seemed a better one near by (Archbald letter to Warriner, Serial X, p. 1229).

This dump was produced by the Lehigh Valley Coal Co. in mining operations under a lease from the Girard estate, which expires December 31, 1913. Notwithstanding it had run several years, the company was making no use of the dump (Serial IX, p. 1099), although they were doing a little toward working an adjoining dump of better quality (Serial IX, pp. 1106 and 1109; Serial X, p. 1231).

One of the dumps applied for the company had tried to work and found too full of ashes. (Serial IX, p. 1106.) The dumps, in fact, were of poor quality (Serial IX, p. 1105), and the company did not make a practice of working their dirt banks. (Serial IX, p. 1109.)

Judge Archbald and his associates apparently secured from Mr. Warriner a tentative agreement that they might get from the Girard estate a lease on this dump, the terms of which arrangement are shown by letter of Judge Archbald to Col. James Archbald (Serial IX, p. 1086), which provided for shipping over the Lehigh Valley Railroad, and for a royalty to the coal company added to the royalty that was to be paid to the Girard estate, and included an arrangement for keeping the stream clear of slush. Mr. Thomas, the president of the company, said that he had never agreed to this and that his consent was necessary. (Serial X, p. 1214.)

Madeira Hill & Co., of the Oxford washery, had previously obtained Warriner's consent to a lease of this bank to them, but the matter had fallen through. (Serial IX, p. 1109.)

The whole matter fell through because the Girard estate thought such a sublease would interfere with negotiations for a new leasing of the mines operated by the Lehigh Valley, and might deter other applicants which were in sight. (Serial IX, p. 1090.) Doubtless, however, the Lehigh Valley would not have objected to an arrangement which would have done this, as it would have helped them in their application for renewal.

14.—HELM BRUCE CORRESPONDENCE.

The letter of Mr. Helm Bruce relating to the testimony of Mr. Compton, elicited by Judge Archbald, was pasted into the record, evidently put there by Judge Archbald (Serial VIII, pp. 1066, 1079), so that all parties had the benefit of it, whatever it was. As stated by Mr. Bruce, the matter was not important, and the subsequent decision of the case the testimony of Mr. Compton was taken as it originally stood. "A colloquy occurred in the course of Mr. Compton's examination," the opinion says, "in which he seems to have admitted that the rule in the local tariffs referred to, not being limited in terms, might be claimed to have authorized the application of the Mobile combination to Montgomery shipments," which proves that the testimony was not regarded as changed. The same is substantially true with regard to the other inquiries answered by Mr. Bruce. The opinion assumed that there had been departures from the "Cooley adjustment" with respect to commodity rates, and that commodity rates were possibly what the commission, in speaking of these departures, had in mind, and the opinion then proceeded to show that this did not affect the stability of the "Cooley adjustment," it being class and not commodity rates that were involved. With this conclusion reached, the importance of the inquiries disappeared.

15.—WIRE TRUST SENTENCES.

It is submitted that these sentences involved the exercise of judicial discretion, and that nothing appears to indicate that that discretion was not wisely exercised. District Attorney Wise, in conference with the Attorney General, prefigured the result, calling attention to the fact that these Wire Trust pools had been discontinued for some considerable time, and expressing the opinion, in view of this and the doubtful construction of the Sherman law prior to the Standard Oil decision in the Supreme Court, that a jail sentence was not necessary, and not likely by any judge to be imposed. (Serial X, p. 1200.) He also distinctly said that he had not asked for more than a fine in any of the cases (p. 1200), except that of Jackson, on whom the maximum fine of $5,000 in each of the nine cases in which he was indicted was imposed. Nor would he deny that in discussing beforehand in chambers with Judge Archbald and counsel for the other defendants the question of the fine to be imposed on them, $2,000 was all that he had asked (p. 1202). The observations of Judge Archbald, at the time the sentences were imposed, disclose the considerations by which he was moved and justify the result (pp. 1205 and 1298).

16.—PURSE CONTRIBUTED BY MEMBERS OF THE BAR.

This money was not put into Judge Archbald's hands until the steamer was just ready to start, and Judge Archbald had no knowledge of it until that time. (Serial X, pp. 1242 and 1249.) It was intended as spending money to relieve Judge Archbald when called upon to go outside the expenses of the trip, which was made as the guest of a relative. (Serial X, pp. 1243, 1250.)

However embarrassing it might be to receive the money, it was impossible to refuse it in good taste and without reflecting on the givers. Nobody pretends that any of the gentlemen who contributed to this fund or Judge Archbald himself connected this transaction with any litigation then pending or liable to arise in the future.

THE LAW.

A corrupt decision is of course an impeachable offense.

The charges with regard to the Boland and Rissinger notes are the only ones which even approach to this character, and they are disposed of by the evidence.

An unwise decision will hardly constitute an impeachable offense, and even those who disagree with the penalties inflicted in the Wire Trust cases can not characterize them further than that.

All the other charges, which do not fail utterly on the testimony, relate not at all to corrupt or improper, or unwise, or even erroneous judicial action. Except for the Helm Bruce correspondence, they do not bear any relation to any specified litigation. Even the Litherage case on the statements made by Williams to Mr. Wrisley Brown bears only a remote relation to the Katydid dump; and when he dates are examined it appears that the business transaction which occurred months afterwards could not by any possibility have influenced the decision there. Indeed, nobody claims that it did.

No crime of any grade or under any law is alleged in these other charges, nor do they include any immoral act short of a crime.

Whether, therefore, impeachable offenses be those which have a criminal character, but may have no relation to the office of the person charged, and those which, falling short of positive crime, amount to improper conduct in the exercise of the office (as contended by the managers for the House in the Swayne case), or only acts which are criminal and performed in connection with official duty (as contended for the respondent in that case)—there is no impeachable offense shown here. Aside from the charges just mentioned, the acts of Judge Archbald consist solely of engaging in business dealings with those who were or might be litigants before him. Of course this in itself is not a crime of any grade whatever, and there is no suggestion even arising from the evidence before the committee that in any case such dealings were with an evil intent on the part of Judge Archbald.

It is not deemed necessary, in view of the weakness of the evidence in this case, to enter into any elaborate discussion of the authority as to what constitutes an impeachable offense. It is sufficient now to refer to what was said on this subject in the Swayne case.

The contention for the respondent in that case is shown by the following quotation from the brief of respondent's counsel (S. Doc. No. 194, 58th Cong., 3d sess., p. 393):

"In English and American parliamentary and constitutional law the judicial misconduct which rises to the dignity of a high crime and misdemeanor must consist of judicial acts performed with an evil or wicked intent by a judge while administering justice in a court, either between private persons or between a private person and the government of the State. All personal misconduct of a judge occurring during his tenure of office and not coming within that category must be classed among the offenses for which a judge may be removed by address, a method of removal which the framers of our Federal Constitution refused to embody therein."

And the contention on the other side appears well from the argument and citations of Mr. Manager Clayton for the House. (Id., p. 617.) He cites the following passage from the history of the Constitution of the United States, by George Ticknor Curtis, in volume 2, page 260:

"The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist when no offense against positive law has been committed, as when the individual has from immorality or imbecility or maladministration become unfit to exercise the office."

He quotes also from Foster on the Constitution (Id., pp. 619, 620), including the following paragraph:

"Some advocates have gone so far as to maintain by a misapplication of a term of the common law that the proceedings on an impeachment are not a trial, but a so-called inquest of office, and that the House and Senate may thus remove an officer for any reason that they approve. That Congress has the power to do so may be admitted, for it is not likely that any court would hold void collaterally a judgment on an impeachment where the Senate had jurisdiction over the person of the condemned. And undoubtedly a court of impeachment has the jurisdiction to determine what constitutes an impeachable offense. But the judgments of the Senate of the United States in the cases of Chase and Peck, as well as those of the State senates in the different cases which have been before them, have established the rule that no officer should be impeached for any act that does not have at least the characteristics of a crime, and public opinion must be irremediably debauched by party spirit before it will sanction any other course.

"Impeachable offenses are those which were the subject of impeachment by the practice in Parliament before the Declaration of Independence, except in so far as that practice is repugnant to the language of the Constitution and the spirit of American institutions. An examination of the English precedents will show that, although private citizens as well as public officers have been impeached, no article has been presented or sustained which did not charge either misconduct in office or some offense which was injurious to the welfare of the State at large.

"In this class of cases, which rests so much in the discretion of the Senate, the writer would be rash who were to attempt to prescribe the limits of its jurisdiction in this respect.

"An impeachable offense may consist of treason, bribery, or a breach of official duty, by malfeasance or misfeasance, including conduct such as drunkenness when habitual or in the performance of official duties, gross indecency, and profanity, obscenity, or other language used in the discharge of an official function which tends to bring the office into disrepute, or an abuse or reckless exercise of a discretionary power as well as a breach or omission of an official duty imposed by statute or common law, or a public speech when off duty which encourages insurrection. It does not consist in an error in judgment made in good faith in the decision of a doubtful question of law, except, perhaps, in the violation of the Constitution."

In the brief of respondent's counsel (Id., p. 396) occurs the following:

"On the other hand an equally untenable attempt has been made to widen unreasonably the jurisdiction of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment by the claim that, under the general principles of right, it can declare that an impeachable high crime or misdemeanor is one in its nature or consequence subversive of some fundamental or essential principle of government or highly prejudicial to the public interest, and this may consist of a violation of the Constitution, of law, of an official oath, or of duty, by an act committed or omitted, or without violating a positive law, by the abuse of discretionary powers for improper motives or for an improper purpose."

In all these definitions there is either the element of crime or of breach of official duty. No contention appears ever to have been made that an act not criminal and not official is an impeachable offense. In the case of Judge Archbald nothing approaching any previous definition of impeachable conduct has been shown. To make such relations between a judge and others as appear here impeachable we must assume a law to be in force which makes it a crime for a judge to purchase property from any person or corporation who has, or is likely to have, litigation in his court. There is no such law, and it is hardly conceivable that Congress would enact such a statute to govern future cases.

In conclusion it is respectfully submitted to the committee that its jurisdiction is only to inquire and report to the House whether there is ground for an impeachment of Judge Archbald. If the committee shall find that no such ground exists, it should not, in fairness to Judge Archbald, inquire or report whether as to any of the matters referred to in the evidence he has been indiscreet.

One who is impeached is tried by a court where the rules of evidence govern the investigation of the facts and where he has the right to summon witnesses and to object to hearsay and other incompetent evidence. While this committee has permitted Judge Archbald to be present with his counsel during its hearings and to cross-examine such witnesses as were called by the committee, this has been done as a courtesy (which is greatly appreciated) and not accorded as a right. As suggested by the chairman during the hearings, the proceedings in this case have been in the nature of an inquiry, not a trial. This is eminently proper and in accordance with usage if the question to be determined is solely whether impeachment shall be advised. But if such a proceeding, where only one side is heard, should result in a report to the House that Judge Archbald's conduct has been merely indiscreet or censurable, a great injustice would be done to him, for in such a case there would be no opportunity afforded him to present his defense. It would be the equivalent of an indictment by a grand jury out of court.

R. W. ARCHBALD, Jr.,
M. J. MARTIN,
SAMUEL B. PRICE,
A. S. WORTHINGTON,
Attorneys for Judge Archbald.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let it apply to all gentlemen who have spoken or will speak.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks to amend the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that all gentlemen who have spoken on this subject have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD on this subject.

Mr. CLAYTON. Or may hereafter speak.

The SPEAKER. Or may hereafter speak on it.

Mr. MANN. I think we had better first only have it apply to those who have spoken; however, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, in the history of the judiciary of our country we find very few cases of impeachment of Federal judges. That in and of itself is the highest compliment that could possibly be paid to the integrity of the Federal judiciary. And I shall always do everything in my power to maintain that high standard and keep the judiciary forum free from every suspicion of sinister influence or taint of corruption. When this matter was first referred to the Judiciary Committee I was prejudiced in favor of Judge Archbald, first, because I thought that probably the complaint was the work of disappointed litigants, and, second, because I did not like the motive of influential witnesses who had all too evidently tried to trap the judge, and I hesitated to set in motion the machinery of the Government in an impeachment proceeding, taking the time of this House and the time of the Senate, on biased, malicious, or doubtful testimony. But, Mr. Speaker, as the evidence kept piling up motives became immaterial and facts—bare, bold facts—stared us in the face, and I could not but feel that it was my duty to support this resolution in the committee and report it to the House.

I do not hesitate to say that here to-day we are facing a crisis in the judicial history of this country, and by this resolution we are raising the question here and now whether or not the machinery provided by the fathers in the Constitution of our country is sufficient to meet the issue raised at this time under these counts. If the facts alleged are substantiated and the established machinery for dealing with conditions therein set forth fails, the demand for radical changes in our organic law on this subject will have to be satisfied. Such conditions can not exist and confidence in the integrity of the judiciary be maintained. We owe a responsibility at this time to the people of this country who demand a pure and incorruptible judiciary, and we owe, if you please, a grave responsibility to the judge who is brought before this House. We occupy not the position of petit jurors, but in a certain sense each Member of this House now is sitting as a member of a grand jury, and the only question before us is the question of probable cause, a question of probable guilt, and not a finality.

The proceedings thus far have been ex parte, and every friend of Judge Archbald on this floor owes it to him at this stage of this proceeding to vote in favor of this resolution to-day, in order that he may have a full and free opportunity before the bar of the Senate to prove, if he can—and I trust in good faith and in all sincerity that he can—that he is absolutely innocent of the prima facie case which is made in this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment your committee would have been derelict in the premises if, in the face of the testimony presented to that committee, we had failed to bring in this resolution. If it shall ultimately transpire that the evidence which we believe sufficient to warrant us in our action is sufficient to substantiate before the bar of the Senate the accusations which we bring, then under those circumstances Judge Archbald ought not to sit in judgment on the Federal bench. But if he is not guilty, then he will have an opportunity to establish that fact forever to the satisfaction of the entire country.

Mr. Speaker, I shall only call attention to one count in the resolution which seems to me, while it does not charge the judge with a crime under any Federal statute, to be one of the most serious charges brought against the judge, and that is article 12, which reads as follows:

That on the 9th day of April, 1901, and for a long time prior thereto, one J. B. Woodward was a general attorney for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co., a corporation and common carrier doing a general railroad business; that on said day the said Robert W. Archbald, being then and there a United States district judge in and for the middle district of Pennsylvania, and while acting as such judge, did appoint the said J. B. Woodward as a jury commissioner in and for said judicial district; and the said J. B. Woodward, by virtue of said appointment and with the continued consent and approval of the said Robert W. Archbald, held such office and performed all the duties pertaining thereto during all the time that the said Robert W. Archbald held said office of United States district judge, and that during all of said time the said J. B. Woodward continued to act as a general attorney for the said Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.; all of which was at all times well known to the said Robert W. Archbald.

Mr. BOWMAN. Will the gentleman yield at that point just for a question?

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWLAND. I do not care to yield.

Mr. BOWMAN. Just one minute. Mr. Woodward is a constituent of mine.

Mr. HOWLAND. I yield, inasmuch as he is a constituent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOWMAN. Yes; and one of the most honorable gentlemen that resides in that district. He was the State Democratic delegate to the last convention. The difficulty was in that county that we had improper jury commissioners, and by a special request that gentleman was appointed to that office, and no objection was ever made to any juryman upon account of his selection.

Mr. HOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am raising no question as to the integrity or character of any man. All we have presented to us are the facts as developed by the testimony. I do not appear here as a prosecutor in any way, shape, or manner; but the fact that the attorney for a railroad company should be appointed by a judge as a jury commissioner to select the jury to try the cases of the railroad company in the judge's court and continues to act as such attorney and commissioner at one and the same time strikes me as the most severe indictment and arraignment of a judge that could possibly be presented. Justice may be blind, but we are not. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore on the floor of this House taken strong ground in favor of an independent judiciary, speaking particularly with reference to the recall of judges by popular vote. I speak just as strongly to-day for an independent judiciary as against the sinister influence of private interests. They must not and shall not creep into the court room by the back stairs.

While on the one hand we insist that political influences shall not reach the ear of the judge, we must just as strenuously insist that the ear of the judge shall not be secretly at the service of private interests in the selection of jurors or in any other manner. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detain the House very long. I am anxious that this resolution shall be passed now, and will therefore avail myself of the opportunity of submitting a short statement of some of the more salient facts in the case.

I want to say that I heard every word of this testimony, as detailed by the witnesses, and after reading it as it has been printed in the hearings it is my judgment that the evidence before your Committee on the Judiciary sustains each and all of the 13 specifications or articles of impeachment against Judge Archbald. [Applause.]

Permit me to state briefly the testimony in support of article No. 1, which I regard as one of the most important charges embraced in the resolution.

Judge Robert W. Archbald was appointed a United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania on the 29th day of March, 1901. He continued to serve as a United States district judge until the 31st day of January, 1911, on which date he was duly appointed as an additional United States circuit judge and designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and entered at once upon the discharge of his duties as a judge of said United States Commerce Court. Judge Archbald, on or about the 31st day of March, 1911, became interested with one Edward J. Williams in an effort to purchase or secure an option on a certain culm dump, commonly known as the Katydid culm dump, near Moosic, Pa., owned by the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a corporation, and one John M. Robertson. Previous to this time, however, Edward J. Williams had applied to W. J. May, vice president and general manager of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., for an option on the said culm dump, and May had refused to consider his application for such option. Edward J. Williams lives at Scranton, Pa., where Judge Archbald also resides. Edward J. Williams is a coal miner and coal operator, but in recent years has been engaged chiefly in buying and selling culm dumps under options secured from the owners thereof.

The evidence discloses that Edward J. Williams is not regarded in and about Scranton, where he has resided for about 20 years, as a man of financial responsibility, reliability, or of high character for truthfulness, and his testimony before your committee is so conflicting and vascillating in its character as to be abundantly convincing that any lack of confidence among his neighbors and fellow townsmen in his veracity is well founded. The evidence, however, discloses that Judge Archbald was well acquainted with Edward J. Williams and had ample opportunity to know his character and standing in said community.

On March 31, 1911, after Edward J. Williams had been refused an option on the Katydid culm dump, Judge Archbald entered into an agreement with the said Edward J. Williams whereby he and Williams agreed to become equal partners in the purchase of the Katydid culm dump with the view and for the purpose of disposing of said property under such option in such a way as to be of financial profit to themselves. Pursuant to said agreement and understanding, and in furtherance thereof, Judge Archbald, on the date mentioned, addressed a letter to William A. May, vice president and general manager of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., making an inquiry as to whether or not the said coal company would dispose of its interest in the Katydid culm dump, and if so, upon what terms, which letter was delivered in person by Edward J. Williams to William A. May, who thereupon directed an investigation and estimate to be made of the amount and value of the coal in said culm dump with the view of disposing of the dump to Judge Archbald and his associate, Edward J. Williams.

On or about the 15th day of June, 1911, William A. May brought the matter of the option of this property to the attention of his immediate superior in office, G. A. Richardson, vice president of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and also vice president of the Erie Railroad Co., and G. A. Richardson, disapproved of the proposal to sell or otherwise dispose of the property. Edward J. Williams, being fully advised as to the action of G. A. Richardson in refusing to approve or recommend the sale of or the giving of an option on Katydid property, reported the facts to his associate and partner, Judge Archbald, and thereafter, namely, on the 4th day of August, 1911, Judge Archbald, pursuant to an engagement previously made, met in the city of New York George F. Brownell, vice president and general solicitor of the Erie Railroad Co., and requested Mr. Brownell to put him in touch with that department or official of the said Erie Railroad Co. in control of the sale and disposition of the coal property belonging to the railroad company or its subsidiary corporations. And thereupon Mr. Brownell personally introduced Judge Archbald to G. A. Richardson, vice president of said Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and of the Erie Railroad Co., who was in charge of its coal department, and then and there Judge Archbald took up with G. A. Richardson the proposition for the purchase and option of the Katydid culm dump for himself and Edward J. Williams. At this conference G. A. Richardson at the instance of and by the influence of Judge Archbald changed his position and policy in regard to the sale and disposition of this property; and thereafter, on the 29th day of August, 1911, in a personal conference with William A. May, vice president and general manager of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., directed the said William A. May to reopen negotiations with Judge Archbald and Edward J. Williams for the purchase of said Katydid culm dump; and on the 30th day of August, 1911, the day immediately following this conference, William A. May, in behalf of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., executed a certain writing or option to Edward J. Williams for the use and benefit of himself and Judge Archbald for the consideration of $4,500, to be paid to the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. for its undivided one-half interest in the property.

At the time of these several transactions and negotiations the Erie Railroad Co. owned all of the stock of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and George F. Brownell was then and there vice president and general solicitor of the Erie Railroad Co., and G. A. Richardson was then and there vice president and general manager of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and was also a director of and vice president of the Erie Railroad Co. and was the immediate superior in office of the said William A. May. During the period covering the several negotiations mentioned Robert W. Archbald was a judge of the United States Commerce Court, duly designated and acting, and the Erie Railroad Co. was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce and had divers and sundry suits pending in the United States Commerce Court for hearing and determination, and George F. Brownell was counsel of record in such cases. It is clear to my mind and it was clear to your committee that Judge Archbald well knew these facts and took advantage of his official position as judge of the United States Commerce Court to wrongfully induce and influence the officials of the railroad company to direct the officers of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., a subsidiary corporation thereof, to enter into a contract with him and his associate, Edward J. Williams, for financial profit to themselves. It is also equally clear that Judge Archbald, through the influence exerted by reason of his position as judge of the United States Commerce Court, willfully and corruptly did induce and cause the officers of the Erie Railroad Co. to permit, direct, and influence the officers of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. to enter into such contract contrary to the general policy of said company and for a grossly inadequate consideration.

After securing this agreement or option, Judge Archbald having also acquired from one John M. Robertson an option for the purchase of the remainder of Katydid culm dump in the name of his associate and partner, Edward J. Williams, on the 20th day of September, 1911, and at different times thereafter undertook in person to negotiate a sale of said culm dump to the Lackawanna, Wyoming & Valley Railroad Co. through Charles F. Conn, president and general manager of said railroad company, said railroad being an electric railroad engaged in intrastate business, but also in connection with other railroad companies crossing its line was engaged in handling traffic moving in interstate commerce. At the time aforesaid the Lackawanna, Wyoming & Valley Railroad Co. was a patron of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. in the purchase of large quantities of coal for use in operating its line of railroad; at the time aforesaid an agreement was entered into by and between Charles F. Conn, president, as aforesaid, in behalf of his railroad company, and Judge Archbald and Edward J. Williams for the purchase of all the coal in said Katydid culm dump for 27½ cents per ton for the entire tonnage and material therein, amounting, according to the estimates of the engineers of the Erie Railroad Co. and also of the Lackawanna, Wyoming & Valley Railroad Co., to between 85,000 and 95,000 tons, which agreement was made subject to approval of title to said property by the attorneys of the Lackawanna, Wyoming & Valley Railroad Co., the title to which was not approved by the attorneys of said railroad company, and by reason of their failure to approve title the deal was not consummated. Under the terms of this agreement, based on the estimates of the engineers as aforesaid who examined the property, Judge Archbald and Edward J. Williams would have received under said contract a gross sum of from thirty-five to forty thousand dollars for said coal dump, and would have realized a net profit to themselves of from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars.

After their failure to consummate the above-described deal with the Lackawanna, Wyoming & Valley Railroad Co., Judge Archbald and Edward J. Williams on or about the 11th day of April, 1912, entered into a contract with one Richard Bradley for the sale of the Katydid culm dump for the consideration of $20,000, which agreement was approved in writing by William A. May, vice president and general manager of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., and by direction of the said William A. May the attorneys of the Erie Railroad Co. prepared a deed of conveyance conveying all of the rights and title of said coal company in the Katydid culm dump to Edward J. Williams for the use and benefit of himself and of Judge Archbald. This agreement and conveyance was submitted to the several parties in interest for their approval on or about the 11th day of April, 1912, and the matter is still pending, subject to the approval of the superior officers of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. and of the Erie Railroad Co., and the execution of deeds and conveyances to the property aforesaid.

It is not denied that Judge Archbald was financially interested in each of the foregoing contracts and agreements mentioned and described, but he carefully avoided placing his name in the face of any of such contracts or agreements as one of the contracting parties, so that the fact of his having or owning an interest therein was concealed from the public, but the evidence fully discloses that Judge Archbald's interest in the several contracts and agreements made and sought to be made was well known to the officers and agents of said coal company and of the several railroad companies named.

I wish now to call your attention to another questionable transaction, namely, to the evidence of Judge Archbald's accepting as a gift or present a certain promissory note for $500, or an interest therein. Article No. 5 relates to the matter to which I wish now to direct your attention.

The testimony in regard to this transaction and to circumstances leading up to it is somewhat conflicting, but there is no view of this testimony which does not tend to the discredit of Judge Archbald. Edward J. Williams, the same Williams that was associated with the judge in Katydid culm dump deals, testifies that about December, 1909, he and one John Henry Jones became partners in an option on 1,000,000 acres of land in Venezuela and that Judge Archbald expressed a desire to become interested in the deal. The testimony shows that on December 3, 1909, John Henry Jones executed a promissory note for $500 payable to Judge R. W. Archbald, due three months after date, and that same was afterwards indorsed by Edward J. Williams and R. W. Archbald and discounted by a bank, Jones receiving the cash thereon. This note has never been paid, but has been renewed from time to time every three months since its execution. According to the testimony of Edward J. Williams, this money was secured by and for Judge Archbald and was paid to Jones in consideration of an interest in the Venezuela deal. John Henry Jones gives a different version of this transaction. According to his testimony this $500 note was executed by him on December 3, 1909, and made payable to Judge Archbald and was thereupon indorsed by Judge Archbald and afterwards by Edward J. Williams and delivered to him (Jones) and was discounted by a bank, and that he (Jones) received the entire proceeds of the same. He testifies that the note was not executed in consideration of any interest in the Venezuelan land deal, and states that Judge Archbald at no time had any interest in said deal and that the note was simply accommodation paper to enable him to secure a loan of $500 by reason of the judge's indorsement that he could not secure on his own indorsement.

The testimony shows that afterwards, about December, 1911, John Henry Jones obtained knowledge of a culm fill near Scranton, Pa., owned by Lacoe & Shiffer. Jones communicated his knowledge of this culm fill to Frederick Warnke, who desired to purchase same. According to the testimony of John Henry Jones, who held or claimed to hold an option on same, his commission in case a deal was made for this property was fixed at $500. The testimony shows that Jones brought the parties together and introduced them, but took no part further in the negotiations for or the sale of the property. Jones testifies that the deal was made, and the firm of Warnke & Co., of which Frederick Warnke was a member, became the purchasers of the same. Jones further testifies that he demanded his commission of Warnke & Co., and received same in the form of a note for $500. He further testifies that he gave one-half of the amount of this note, or $250, to Judge Archbald as a gift or present in consideration of the favor rendered by him in indorsing for discount the $500 note of date December 3, 1909, already referred to, and that the judge accepted the same as a gift or present. Frederick Warnke gives a different version of this transaction. Warnke testifies that John Henry Jones showed him the property and introduced him to Lacoe & Shiffer, the owners thereof. He also testifies that Jones told him that Judge Archbald knew about the title to the property. He testifies that he made the deal directly with the owners, and was compelled to pay $1,000 more for the property than the price given to him by Jones. Jones had priced the property at $6,500, and the price paid by the firm of Warnke & Co. was $7,500. Warnke testifies that after the purchase was made Jones called on him for a commission of $500, and he refused to pay him any commission, and denied that he was entitled to any commission whatsoever. Warnke testifies that he had on Jones's recommendation consulted Judge Archbald about the title to the property in question, and that he told Jones he intended to make Judge Archbald a present of $500 if the judge would accept it. Warnke testifies that when he called on Judge Archbald to see about the title that the judge seemed to know all about the title and pronounced it good. Warnke testifies that when he first went to Judge Archbald to consult him about the title the judge told him he could not represent him as an attorney, but that he would cheerfully give him any information he possessed in regard to the title, and proceeded to do so to the full satisfaction of Warnke.

The testimony shows that the conversation between Warnke and Judge Archbald in reference to the title lasted for 10 or 15 minutes, and that afterwards he again called on the judge and asked him some further questions relative to title, and that this second conversation lasted about 5 or 10 minutes. Warnke further testifies that after the judge had explained the title to him and assured him that the title was all right, he offered to compensate the judge, and the judge said: "No; you need not do that at all." He then told the judge that if the deal went through he intended to make him a present of $500.

Warnke further testifies that after the deal was made Judge Archbald called at the office of Warnke & Co. to see about the $500 that Frederick Warnke had promised him. Frederick Warnke was not in the office at that time, and on his return to the office his attention was called to Judge Archbald's visit, and he then executed a company note for $500, payable to the individual members of said firm, who in turn indorsed the note and turned it over to Judge Archbald who accepted the same as a present or gift.

In order to get a clearer insight into and a better understanding of the real motive that prompted Frederick Warnke to tender to Judge Archbald such an unusual gift and that influenced the judge to accept it, it will be necessary to consider another matter in which Judge Archbald had rendered or attempted to render Mr. Warnke a service in connection with a controversy between Warnke and the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. by interceding in Mr. Warnke's behalf.

In the year 1904 Frederick Warnke, of Scranton, Pa., purchased a two-thirds interest in a lease on certain coal lands owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. located near Lorberry Junction, in said State, and put up a number of improvements thereon and operated the culm dump on said property for several years. Operations, however, were carried on at a loss, due to the action of the elements. Frederick Warnke then applied to the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. for the mining maps of the land covered by his lease. He was informed that the lease under which he claimed had been forfeited two years before it was assigned to him and his application for said maps was therefore denied. Frederick Warnke then made a proposition to George F. Baer, president of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and president of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., to relinquish any claim that he might have in this property under his said lease, provided the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. would give him an operating lease on what is known as the Lincoln culm bank, located near Lorberry; that George F. Baer referred the matter to one W. J. Richards, vice president and general manager of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., for consideration and action; that Richards and Baer later concluded that there was no reason why they should make an exception to the general rule of the coal company not to lease any of its culm banks, and Warnke was so advised; that Warnke then made several attempts through his attorneys and friends to have George F. Baer, president of the said railroad company, and Richards, vice president of said coal company, reconsider their decision in the premises, but without avail; that some time during the month of October or November, 1911, Warnke stated his version of the matter to Judge Archbald, who was then and there and now is a United States circuit judge and having been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, and asked him to intercede in his behalf with the said Richards; that on November 24, 1911, Judge Archbald wrote a letter to Richards, vice president of the coal company, who lives at Pottsville, Pa., requesting an appointment with the said Richards; that several days thereafter Judge Archbald called at the office of the said Richards to discuss with him the proposition of the said Frederick Warnke; that the said Richards then and there informed Judge Archbald that the decision which he had given to the said Warnke must be considered as final, and Judge Archbald so informed Mr. Warnke.

The testimony shows that the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. is owned by the Reading Co., which, as a holding company, owns the entire capital stock of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co., which last-named company is a corporation engaged in interstate commerce.

In view of this testimony, it seems clear that Judge Archbald, being then and there a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and well knowing all of the facts, did attempt to use his influence as a member of said court to aid and assist the said Frederick Warnke to secure an operating lease on a certain culm dump owned by the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co., which lease the officials of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. had theretofore refused to grant, which said fact was also well known to Judge Archbald.

The testimony shows that Judge Archbald, shortly after the conclusion of his attempted negotiations with the officers of the Philadelphia & Reading Railroad Co. and of the Philadelphia & Reading Coal & Iron Co. in behalf of Frederick Warnke, and on or about the 31st day of March, 1912, did accept as a gift, reward, or present from Frederick Warnke in consideration of favors shown him by said judge in his efforts to secure a settlement and agreement with the said railroad company and coal company and for other favors shown by the judge to the said Frederick Warnke, a certain promissory note for $500, executed by the firm of Warnke & Co., of which the said Frederick Warnke was a member.

I have given you a brief but, I believe, faithful statement of the evidence in regard to only two of the charges preferred against Judge Archbald. Statements concerning other similar transactions have been given by the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the committee [Mr. CLAYTON], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING], and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], and what does the testimony disclose in each case? We find a judge of the United States circuit court, and duly assigned as a member of the United States Commerce Court, interesting himself with individuals in culm dumps and coal properties and then seeking to make trades and settlements, obtain credit, secure contracts and agreements with officers and agents of railroad companies or coal companies owned by railroad companies, which were common carriers engaged in interstate commerce and which had at the time cases pending before the United States Commerce Court. Nor were such transactions occasional or isolated, but they were numerous. The judge's activity in endeavoring to bring about some of these deals was persistent. I here submit an extract from the report of the committee in support of article 13 of the pending resolution, which sets forth a summary of the evidence in reference to Judge Archbald's general conduct in regard to these several deals and speculations, as follows:

GENERAL MISBEHAVIOR OF JUDGE ARCHBALD.

(See article 13.)

The testimony in the whole case tends to support this general specification. Judge Archbald was appointed a United States district judge for the middle district of Pennsylvania on the 29th day of March, 1901, and held such office until January 31, 1911, on which last-named date he was appointed an additional United States circuit judge and on the same day was duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, which position he has since held and now holds.

The testimony shows that at different times while Judge Archbald was a judge of the United States district court he sought and obtained credit and in other instances sought to obtain credit from persons who had litigation pending in his said court or who had had litigation pending in his said court.

The testimony shows that after Judge Archbald had been promoted to the position of a United States circuit judge and had been duly designated as one of the judges of the United States Commerce Court, he in connection with different persons sought to obtain options on culm dumps and other coal properties from officers and agents of coal companies which were owned and controlled by railroad companies.

The testimony further shows that in order to influence the officers of the coal companies, which were subsidiary to and owned by the railroad companies, Judge Archbald repeatedly sought to influence the officials of the railroads to enter into contracts with his associates for the financial benefit of himself and his said associates. In most instances the contracts were executed in the name of the person associated with the judge in the particular transaction or trade, and the judge's name was not disclosed on the face of the contract. The testimony shows, however, that he was, as a matter of fact, pecuniarily interested in such contracts, and that while his interest was not known to the public it was known to the officials of the railroad companies and of the coal companies, subsidiary corporations thereof. The evidence discloses that while the judge's several associates or partners would locate properties the judge would take up the matter of the purchase or sale of said properties with the officials of the coal companies and of the railroad companies which, as already stated, in most instances owned and controlled the coal companies. The testimony shows that while these negotiations were being conducted, and agreements were made and sought to be made, the railroad companies with whose officers Judge Archbald was making contracts and agreements, and seeking to make contracts and agreements, were common carriers engaged in interstate commerce and had litigation pending in the United States Commerce Court.

The testimony shows that such options, contracts, and agreements were sought and obtained and sought to be obtained by Judge Archbald to such an extent that the exposure of the judge's several transactions through the press gave rise to a public scandal.

The testimony fails to disclose any case in which Judge Archbald invested any actual money of his own in any of these several trades or deals, but shows that he used his personal influence as a judge, in consideration of which he received or was to receive his share or interest in the property or his profits in the deal.

Your committee finds that Judge Archbald by his conduct in carrying on traffic in culm dumps and coal properties owned directly or indirectly by railroads, and in using his influence to secure such contracts from coal companies which were owned and controlled by railroad companies as aforesaid, and in using his influence with high officials of said railroads to induce them to permit or direct the said coal companies to enter into contracts with him or his associates which resulted in financial profit to himself and those associated with him, grossly abused the proprieties of his said office of judge, was guilty of misbehavior and of a misdemeanor in office.

THE LAW.

CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO JUDICIAL IMPEACHMENTS.

The provisions of the Constitution of the United States bearing upon the impeachment of judges are as follows:

"The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers, and shall have the sole power of impeachment. (Art. I, sec. 2.)

"Judgment in cases of impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from office and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, judgment, and punishment according to law. (Art. I, sec. 3.)

"The President * * * shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. (Art. II, sec. 2.)

"The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Art. II, sec. 4.)

"The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services a compensation, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. (Art. III, sec. 1.)

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury." (Art. III, sec. 2.)

Mr. Speaker, in view of the law governing the impeachment of officers of the United States which has already been ably presented and discussed by the chairman [Mr. CLAYTON] and other members of the committee, and to which I do not purpose to advert further than to say I fully agree with them as to the law, and in view of the vast volume of testimony tending to show, and in many instances positively showing, misbehavior and reprehensible conduct on the part of Judge Archbald, I feel it to be the solemn duty of this House to pass the resolution now under consideration.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have not read the record. I did not follow the taking of the testimony by the Committee on the Judiciary, but I have read the report and the resolution which is now pending. If the charges in the resolution are true, then this judge ought to be removed from the bench; and, as those charges are made in this manner, if they be not true, he is entitled to a trial which will acquit him of the charges.

I assume that the Committee on the Judiciary have the evidence before them on which the charges are based. I believe that every judge ought to respect the duties and responsibilities of his office and consider his office as of such a high character as to permit him under no condition to follow the course which is stated to have been followed by this judge, regardless of whether he did it for profit or for personal considerations to other men. No judge has the right to prostitute his office, as is charged to have been done by this judge. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, while it is not necessary under the Constitution to have a roll call upon this resolution, it seems to me that, in presenting articles of impeachment to the Senate, the House ought to do it by a yea-and-nay vote; and if no one else does it, at the proper time, while the House is quite full, in order to have a yea-and-nay vote, I shall make a point of no quorum, because that expedites the voting.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend at this time to take up the time of the House in discussing this resolution. I am a member of the committee that made the investigation. I believe I have heard all of the evidence presented, and was present at the different hearings to as great an extent as any other member of the Committee on the Judiciary.

I have some ideas and some views that I intended to speak upon this afternoon, but inasmuch as so much time has already been taken in the discussion of the question by various other Members, I shall not detain the House now by attempting to make any remarks.

I want only to say that after a careful and conscientious hearing of all the evidence, and I believe with a full knowledge of the responsibility resting upon the committee in investigating these serious charges and weighing the evidence—sometimes unsatisfactory, and often, in fact in a majority of cases, brought out of witnesses who were unwilling and who showed by their actions that they were extremely friendly to Judge Archbald—I say, after a fair and, I think, honest consideration of all the evidence by all the members of the committee, they have come to the conclusion unanimously that this evidence warrants every charge and every indictment that we have brought before the House for consideration.

I thought I could not let the opportunity pass, having been a member of the committee that brought in the indictment, without saying this much, even though the hour is late, and even though the Members are already weary.

[Mr. LINTHICUM addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply pained that the proceedings had before this House to-day involve one with whom I have lifelong personal and professional associations and for whom I have high regard.

The committee having the investigation in charge has, with judicial poise and manner, given full and careful consideration to the case, and I can not but commend the members that their report and presentment is freed from evidences of bias or partisanship and that it is based upon their deep sense of responsibility and duty. Nevertheless, the proceedings before this committee were necessarily ex parte, with Judge Archbald's witnesses not present, and where he and his attorneys were permitted only by the courteous sufferance of the committee.

Incomplete and inadequate statements of this ex parte evidence have found their way through the press to the public, and it is only by a trial before the Senate that Judge Archbald can clear away there inferences and insinuations. I am sure that he craves the opportunity to meet and fully answer the presentment of the House this day made, whereby the country may be apprised of his side and explanation, as it has been furnished with the statements against him. Judge Archbald has stood high in all the circles in which he has moved.

In voting to-day I do so upon the ground frequently expressed here in debate, that this vote is not upon the guilt or innocence of the accused, but I cast it in the sympathetic hope and belief that in the tribunal provided by the Constitution, under the fullest investigation which will there be had, his name will be cleared and his fame shine forth as brightly and as unsullied as in the days of yore.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, some animadversion has been made by some gentleman during this debate—I believe by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT]—on the witness Williams. Whatever else may be said of Williams, I will read some of the documents put in evidence before the committee to show Judge Archbald's business associations with Williams, and inferentially his good opinion of him. The judge held him out to other people as worthy of trust and confidence. Williams carried the following letter from Judge Archbald to W. A. May:

[United States Commerce Court, Washington.]

SCRANTON, PA., March 31, 1911.

W. A. MAY, Esq.,
Superintendent Hillside Coal & Iron Co.

DEAR SIR: I write to inquire whether your company will dispose of your interest in the Katydid culm dump, belonging to the old Robertson & Law operation, at Brownsville; and if so, will you kindly put a price upon it?

Yours, very truly,

R. W. ARCHBALD.

After much hesitation on the part of the Erie Railroad officers and considerable negotiations on the part of Judge Archbald with those officers, May delivered the following letter to Williams on August 30, 1911:

[Pennsylvania Coal Co. Hillside Coal & Iron Co. New York, Susquehanna & Western Coal Co. Northwestern Mining & Exchange Co. Blossburg Coal Co. Office of the general manager.]

SCRANTON, PA., August 30, 1911.

Mr. E. J. WILLIAMS,
626 South Blakely Street, Dunmore, Pa.

DEAR SIR: As stated to you to-day, verbally, I shall recommend the sale of whatever interest the Hillside Coal & Iron Co. has in what is known as the Katydid culm dump, made by Messrs. Robertson & Law in the operation of the Katydid breaker, for $4,500.

In order that it may not be lost sight of, I will mention that any coal above the size of pea coal will be subject to a royalty to the owners of lot 46, upon the surface of which the bank is located.

It is also understood that the bank will not be conveyed to anyone else without the consent of the H. C. & I. Co., and that if the offer is accepted articles of agreement will be drawn to cover the transaction.

Yours, very truly,

W. A. MAY, General Manager.

Judge Archbald afterwards drew and witnessed the following contract or option:

This agreement made and concluded the 4th day of September, A. D. 1911, by and between John M. Robertson, of Moosic, Pa., of the one part, and Edward J. Williams, of Scranton, Pa., of the other part, witnesseth:

Whereas the said party of the first part is the owner of that certain culm dump in the vicinity of Moosic, made in the operation of the firm of Robertson & Law of the so-called Katydid mine or colliery; and whereas the said party of the second part is desirous of purchasing the same.

Now this agreement witnesseth that for and in consideration of $1, to him in hand paid, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part hereby grants and conveys unto the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, the right or option to purchase his interest in and to the said culm dump for the price or sum of $3,500, which said option is to be exercised within 60 days from this date, the terms to be cash within 5 days after the exercise of said option. It is understood that this option is intended to cover and include all the interest of the said party of the first part and of the said late firm of Robertson & Law.

In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year aforesaid.

[SEAL.] JNO. M. ROBERTSON.
[SEAL.] E. J. WILLIAMS.
Witness:
R. W. ARCHBALD.

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
County of Lackawanna, ss:

On this 12th day of September, A. D. 1911, personally appeared before me, a notary public in and for said State and county duly commissioned, residing in the city of Scranton, county aforesaid, the above-mentioned E. J. Williams, who, in due form of law, acknowledged the foregoing indenture to be his act and deed and desired the same might be recorded as such.

Witnessed my hand and official seal the day and year aforesaid.

[SEAL.] GEO. W. BENEDICT, Jr.,
Notary Public.

My commission expires March 10, 1913.

After these options had been secured Williams executed the following assignment:

Assignment made this 5th day of September, A. D. 1911, by Edward J. Williams, of the borough of Dunmore, county of Lackawanna and State of Pennsylvania, party of the first part, to William P. Boland and a silent party, both of the city of Scranton, county and State above mentioned, parties of the second part. For services rendered or to be rendered in the future by William P. Boland and silent party, whose name for the present is only known to Edward J. Williams, W. P. Boland, John M. Robertson, and Capt. W. A. May, superintendent of the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., it is agreed by said Edward J. Williams, who is the owner of two options covering a culm bank, known as the "Katydid," situate in the vicinity of Moosic, Pa., that he hereby assigns two-thirds of any profits arising from the sale of the above-mentioned property over and above the amounts to be paid John M. Robertson and the Hillside Coal & Iron Co., $3,500 and $4,500, respectively, to be divided equally between William P. Boland and silent party mentioned above, their heirs, successors, or assigns, and this shall be their voucher for same.

[SEAL.] E. J. WILLIAMS.
W. L. PRYOR.

The testimony shows that Judge Archbald was the "silent party" referred to in the assignment.

Afterwards Judge Archbald and Williams attempted to sell at a large profit this option to Mr. Conn, vice president and general manager of the railroad known as the Laurel Line, and Judge Archbald wrote the following letter in furtherance of this attempt:

[R. W. Archbald, judge United States Commerce Court, Washington.]

SCRANTON, PA., September 20, 1911.

MY DEAR MR. CONN: This will introduce Mr. Edward Williams, who is interested with me in the culm dump about which I spoke to you the other day. We have options on it both from the Hillside Coal Co. and from Mr. Robertson, representing Robertson & Law, these options covering the whole interest in the dump. This dump was produced in the operation of the Katydid colliery by Robertson & Law, and extends to the whole of the dump so produced. I have not seen it myself, but as I understand it this dump consists of two dumps a little separate from each other, but all making up one general culm or refuse pile made at that colliery. Mr. Williams will explain further with regard to it if there is anything which you want to know.

Yours, very truly,

R. W. ARCHBALD.

For the purpose of making another deal, Judge Archbald wrote the following letter to Thomas Darling, one of the attorneys for the Lehigh Valley Railroad Co.:

UNITED STATES COMMERCE COURT,
Scranton, August 3.

MY DEAR DARLING: This will introduce Mr. Edward Williams, of this city, who wishes to talk with you about the purchase of a culm dump which you control. Mr. Williams is a coal man of experience and is in touch with parties who are able to handle the dump if you are inclined to dispose of it.

Yours, very truly,

R. W. ARCHBALD.

THOMAS DARLING, Esq.

This letter is used for the purpose of showing the esteem in which Judge Archbald held the witness, E. J. Williams.

Mr. Speaker, I was asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania if witnesses had been subpœnaed to appear before the committee in behalf of Judge Archbald. My answer is no, and that in no impeachment case was such ever done. No grand jury and no body sitting as a grand inquest, as your committee has sat and as this House is now sitting, ever called witnesses for a defendant. The duty of the House when an impeachment charge is brought is to make such thorough and fair examination as may be necessary to convince the impeaching body of the reasonable probability of the guilt of the accused judge or civil officer. I may say, however, that in this case nearly all—indeed every one of the witnesses except one—was the friend of Judge Archbald or friendly to him. Most of the witnesses were his neighbors and associates.

The committee examined every witness that the committee was informed could possibly know anything about the conduct of Judge Archbald in the various transactions involved except one, and that was the judge's friend, one James R. Dainty, whom the committee could not find or could not have served with process, although every diligent effort known to the law was used to subpœna the witness. Undoubtedly this man Dainty absconded to avoid testifying. In fact, nearly all of the witnesses who testified appeared to be so desirous of shielding the judge that it was with the greatest difficulty that the committee was able to develop the facts in the case.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think it necessary to quote at length from the printed testimony taken by the committee, which testimony is now before the House, nor do I deem it necessary to repeat the findings of facts embraced in the report of the committee, which was printed in the RECORD on the 8th instant. However, let me call attention to a few indisputable features of this case. After Judge Archbald became judge of the Commerce Court he evidently became seized with an abnormal and unjudgelike desire to make money by trading through others and himself out of railroads and their subsidiary corporations, which concerns had business or were very likely to have business or litigation in his court. He abused his potentiality as judge to further these trades and placed himself, or sought to place himself, under obligations to these corporate concerns and their officials.

In practically all of his correspondence with these officials of these corporations and their subsidiaries he used the official stationery—that is, the letterheads—of the United States Commerce Court, Washington, D. C., thereby keeping constantly before the minds of these officials the fact that he was a member of the tribunal charged with the duty of passing upon the rights of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce in dealing with shippers of the country and the general public.

He had personal interviews and communications otherwise with these railroad officials at Scranton, in New York, and elsewhere, in which he sought to secure or to promote these trades to make money for himself out of these corporate interests which had litigation in his court or were most likely to have such litigation frequently before him.

On the very day upon which he pronounced mild sentences on numerous violators of the antitrust law, a number of whom were directly or indirectly connected with large railroad interests, he approached the vice president of the Erie Railroad Co. in his offices in New York City in furtherance of his negotiations to purchase a certain coal property from a subsidiary of that railroad with a view to consummating a transaction which would net him a large personal profit.

This incident illustrates the remarkable facility with which the judge used his official position for personal profit. This also illustrates his utter lack of any just appreciation of the proprieties of his judicial position. It is needless to say that judges ought not to use their official power to promote gainful bargains.

Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, if this judge had been guilty of only one or two of some of the things established against him, there might be generated a doubt in his favor. But the evidence shows that his dealings with the officials of these railroads and their subsidiaries constitute the rule of his conduct rather than the exception and seem to constitute a well-planned system to acquire wealth by means of the influence and power which he wields as a member of the Commerce Court.

In pursuance of his plan to make money out of his various financial adventures, he capitalized his power and influence as judge and never invested so much as one dollar of his own money in any of these enterprises or speculations. This judge thus converted himself into an opportunist and embraced every chance to secure property concessions or business advantages from corporations subject to the jurisdiction of his court.

Mr. Speaker, without dwelling further upon the facts of this case, let me invite the attention of the House to the law of impeachment, as stated in the report of the committee, which I presented to the House on Monday last.

The Constitution provides:

The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. (Art. II, sec. 4.)

And the Constitution further provides:

The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office. (Art. III, sec. 1.)

The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury. (Art. III, sec. 2.)

Of course, the House knows that under paragraph 6 of section 3 of Article I the Senate has the sole power to try impeachments.

It is the function of the House to indict or charge, and the duty of the Senate to try the cases.

George Ticknor Curtis says, in his Constitutional History of the United States:

Although an impeachment may involve an inquiry whether a crime against any positive law has been committed, yet it is not necessarily a trial for crime, nor is there any necessity, in the case of crimes committed by public officers, for the institution of any special proceeding for the infliction of the punishment prescribed by the laws, since they, like all other persons, are amenable to the ordinary jurisdiction of the courts of justice in respect of offenses against positive law. The purposes of an impeachment lie wholly beyond the penalties of the statute or the customary law. The object of the proceeding is to ascertain whether cause exists for removing a public officer from office. Such a cause may be found in the fact that either in the discharge of his office or aside from its functions he has violated a law or committed what is technically denominated a crime. But a cause for removal from office may exist where no offense against positive law has been committed, as where the individual has, from immorality or imbecility or maladministration, become unfit to exercise the office.

In Watson on the Constitution (vol. 2, p. 1034, published in 1910) it is said:

A misdemeanor comprehends all indictable offenses which do not amount to a felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, attempts and solicitations to commit felonies, etc. These seem to be the definitions of these terms at common law, but it would be strange if a civil officer could be impeached for only such offenses as are embraced within the common-law definition of "other high crimes and misdemeanors." There is a parliamentary definition of the term "misdemeanor," and a modern writer on the Constitution has said: "The term 'high crimes and misdemeanors' has no significance in the common law concerning crimes subject to indictment. It can only be found in the law of Parliament and is the technical term which was used by the Commons at the Bar of the Lords for centuries before the existence of the United States." Synonymous with the term "misdemeanor" are the terms "misdeed," "misconduct," misbehavior," "fault," "transgression."

Volume 2, pages 1036–1037:

A civil officer may so behave in public as to bring disgrace upon himself and shame upon his country, and he may continue to do this until his name would become a national stench, and yet he would not be subject to indictment by any law of the United States, but he certainly could be impeached. What will those who advocate the doctrine that impeachment will not lie except for an offense punishable by statute do with the constitutional provision relative to judges, which says, "Judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior"? This means that as long as they behave themselves their tenure of office is fixed, and they can not be disturbed. But suppose they cease to behave themselves? When the Constitution says "a judge shall hold his office during good behavior," it means that he shall not hold it when he ceases to be good. Suppose he should refuse to sit upon the bench and discharge the duties which the Constitution and the law enjoin upon him, or should become a notoriously corrupt character and live a notoriously corrupt and debauched life? He could not be indicted for such conduct, and he could not be removed except by impeachment. Would it be claimed that impeachment would not be the proper remedy in such a case?

In the American and English Enclycopedia of Law, second edition (vol. 15, pp. 1066–1068), it is said:

The cases, then, seem to establish that impeachment is not a mere mode of procedure for the punishment of indictable crimes; that the phrase "high crimes and misdemeanors" is to be taken not in its common-law but in its broader parliamentary sense and is to be interpreted in the light of parliamentary usage; that in this sense it includes not only crimes for which an indictment may be brought but grave political offenses, corruption, maladministration, or neglect of duty involving moral turpitude, arbitrary and oppressive conduct, and even gross improprieties by judges and high officers of state, although such offenses be not of a character to render the offender liable to an indictment either at common law or under any statute.

This view of the law of impeachment is supported by the elementary writers and commentators on our Constitution, by the usage in cases of impeachment, by the opinions of the framers of the Constitution, by contemporaneous construction, and stands uncontradicted by any recognized authority, case, or jurist of note. This view of the law is supported by reason and by principle, as well as by the great weight of authority.

Mr. Speaker, the law is so fully stated in the committee report that I shall not now cite further authorities.

Mr. Speaker, no man who has read the testimony in this case would believe that in the face of such testimony Robert W. Archbald would now be appointed to the office of judge by the President. No man would believe the Senate would now confirm him as judge. No fair-minded man can doubt that he ought to be removed from office. I have an abiding conviction that this House will do its duty, and a firm belief that the Senate will remove from office this judge whose behavior has been bad, and who has forfeited the conditions upon which he holds his high commission of trust, responsibility, and power.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, I voted "aye." I am paired with the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. SCULLY. I believe if he were present he would vote aye, but under the circumstances I wish to withdraw my vote and answer present.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I offer the following resolution in connection with the resolution just passed, and ask for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 626.

Resolved, That HENRY D. CLAYTON, of Alabama; EDWIN Y. WEBB, of North Carolina; JOHN C. FLOYD, of Arkansas; JOHN W. DAVIS, of West Virginia; JOHN A. STERLING, of Illinois; PAUL HOWLAND, of Ohio; and GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, Members of this House, be, and they are hereby, appointed managers to conduct the impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court; that said managers are hereby instructed to appear before the Senate of the United States and at the bar thereof in the name of the House of Representatives and of all the people of the United States to impeach the said Robert W. Archbald of high crimes and misdemeanors in office and to exhibit to the Senate of the United States the articles of impeachment against said judge which have been agreed upon by this House; and that the said managers do demand that the Senate take order for the appearance of said Robert W. Archbald to answer said impeachment, and demand his impeachment, conviction, and removal from office.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I offer the following resolution and move its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 627.

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House in the matter of the impeachment of Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, be, and they are hereby, authorized to employ legal, clerical, and other necessary assistants and to incur such expenses as may be necessary in the preparation and conduct of the case, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers approved by the managers, and the managers have power to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, I present the following resolution and ask for its adoption.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 628.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, and that the House adopted articles of impeachment against said Robert W. Archbald, judge as aforesaid, which the managers on the part of the House have been directed to carry to the Senate, and that HENRY D. CLAYTON, of Alabama; EDWIN Y. WEBB, of North Carolina; JOHN C. FLOYD, of Arkansas; JOHN W. DAVIS, of West Virginia; JOHN A. STERLING, of Illinois; PAUL HOWLAND, of Ohio; and GEORGE W. NORRIS, of Nebraska, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, in the beginning of the resolution, where it recites that the House has impeached Robert W. Archbald, I ask leave to amend by inserting the words "for high crimes and misdemeanors," so that it may follow the customary language.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to insert the words "for high crimes and misdemeanors" in the proper place, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend so as to read:

"Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House has impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge," etc.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I had supposed that these resolutions which were now being offered were in the exact form of the resolutions heretofore agreed to by the House when proceedings in impeachment were had on former occasions. The last resolution it is now proposed to amend.

Mr. CLAYTON. I can explain that, I think, to the satisfaction of the gentleman. I had prepared each one of these resolutions—the first one, that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] introduced, the one that the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] introduced—similar to the resolutions in like cases. I had prepared one similar to the last one, but it has been misplaced. So I turned to the record of the Swayne case and had copied the resolution as near as was suitable. In drawing the resolution the words which I ask to insert here were omitted. I hope that is satisfactory to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I knew that the gentleman from Alabama would in advance prepare the necessary papers, but I noticed that when the Clerk read this last resolution he read it with some difficulty. So I was satisfied that it was not a typewritten resolution made in advance, and therefore I asked the question.

Mr. CLAYTON. A resolution similar to that, as I said before, had been prepared.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to inserting the words "for high crimes and misdemeanors" in this resolution at the place suggested? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, July 12, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 12, 1912.

(Continuation of legislative day of Saturday, July 6, 1912.)

At 10 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah suggests the absence of a quorum. The roll will be called.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Brown	Culberson	Gamble
Bacon	Bryan	Cullom	Gardner

Overman	Sanders	Sutherland	Works
Page	Simmons	Swanson
Paynter	Smith, Md.	Thornton

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, at the close of my remarks yesterday I was discussing the attitude of the custodian of all the morals of the country, both public and private, he who would not have contributions from those who possess predatory wealth. The malefactors of great wealth could not contribute to any campaign for his benefit. But I find in an account in this morning's paper that the chairman of the committee in his campaign testified that $1,900,000 was contributed for his campaign in 1904. Of course, that came from the common people, of whom this man is the great champion. No malefactors contributed in that campaign, no trusts, no combinations of great wealth, only the common people, of whom he is the guardian.

In concluding his letter to Col. Roosevelt, President Taft said what I shall read. By the way, may I not state here that this letter was written on the 6th of January, 1911? The record in this case, I am informed, was delivered to the document room on the seventh day of that month, a day after the letter was written, which to my mind would be evidence that any information which the President may have received on this subject was from those who are supporting this prosecution. In concluding his letter to the Colonel he said:

I want to win. So do you.

Win what? Win a contest? What sort of a contest? In the open? A free field and a fair fight? Was the sword and shield handed to me, and was I then notified to defend myself, that a battle was on? Oh, no; there was no opportunity, no knowledge of what was coming, they were going to win, win, win. How? Sneak up like a thief in the dark, strike from behind with a club in the back of the head, and destroy with no opportunity to defend himself. And why, why all this? Why, for fear, said President Taft, that Senator BAILEY with his unbounded logic and his matchless eloquence might plead the dignity of the Senate of the United States.

Oh, Mr. President, was mortal ever more completely surrounded by conspirators and intrigue? The President of the United States, William H. Taft; Theodore Roosevelt, the ex-President of the United States; and the candidate of the Democratic Party for President of the United States, William Jennings Bryan, the trust press of this country, all combined and joining in the conspiracy to misstate the facts, because they could not have known them unless they read the record—and not one of these men ever read it. They joined with the trust press of this country to poison the mind of the citizenship of this Union in order that one man might be destroyed to satisfy the malice of the most corrupt set of newspaper owners known to the history of this country.

Mr. President, I do not claim that anything I have said on this subject is evidence of anything. It does not prove that my seat was not corruptly secured, but surely it shows that the men who are prosecuting this case are capable of conspiring to do anything against anybody they want to destroy, even to taking a life. It is because I know these things, and because when the attention of the Senate is called to them they are all beyond any question of doubt proven, not by my word, not by what I say, but in the documents, in the photographs, in the letters, in the affidavits that I have presented in this discussion, and with that I think I have said enough about those who are back of and aiding in this prosecution.

Now, we will come to the Helm committee. Who is the Helm committee? What is the Helm committee? Senators of the State of Illinois, think you? Oh, no. They were creatures of Gov. Deneen and the newspaper trust of Chicago. The Helm Committee. Were they senators, dignified gentlemen, men who had opinions of their own, who acted as their consciences dictated? Oh, no. The Helm committee was Herman Kohlsaat and the Record-Herald, representing Victor Lawson, the Tribune, Gov. Deneen, and John J. Healy. John J. Healy was one of the counsel representing your committee in this case. I do not want to be understood as criticizing the committee for employing Mr. Healy, because if there be a man in Illinois who knows aught about the politics of our State and could ferret out any corruption John J. Healy is the man. In addition to that he would be inspired with his own personal malice toward LORIMER, because he is one of the most violent and bitter enemies that I have in the State. If the committee failed to produce evidence on which an honest judgment could be rendered recommending the removal of LORIMER from the Senate, he could not be blamed, for surely they had the man that could find the proof if it was to be found. There was every reason in the world for it. He had first of all the ability. He had the motive and the knowledge of the situation in Illinois. His partner was the partner of Gov. Deneen before he was elected governor. He and the governor and Keeley and Kohlsaat met when? On the 17th day of January, when the resolution was adopted appointing the committee to investigate as to whether or not corruption had been practiced in the Illinois Senate? No. In February, the next month? Oh, no. The 1st day of March? Oh, no; not until the Senate of the United States had defeated the resolution declaring that LORIMER was not entitled to his seat in this body. These were the reorganizers of the conspiracy which had been partially dissolved by the action of the Senate declaring my election valid.

They had been defeated; the Senate had spoken; it had put the stamp of approval on LORIMER'S certificate of election and something else must be done. "What are we to do?" was the question. "How are we to get LORIMER out? If we could only start another investigation; there has been a change in the Senate; 30 new Members are there. Probably enough of the new men, enough of the new judges, may be influenced to take our view of the case. If we can only have another investigation and try the case over again, we will take our chances on turning LORIMER out."

Then the Helm committee took up the investigation, not of the senators of the Senate of the State of Illinois, not of the members of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, but whether or not LORIMER was corruptly elected to the United States Senate—a question that had been settled.

How are they going to do it? They must have new evidence; they must have something that has been recently discovered. Then began the shameless hippodrome; the convening of the Helm committee; the calling of Edward Hines and the formality of asking him questions. The first witness of importance, not knowing that Funk was to be called, not knowing that Kohlsaat was to be called, they asked of Hines questions calling for answers which might be impeached by the witnesses which the prosecuting attorney of that committee knew would follow and would tell the Funk story.

Then comes Kohlsaat; oh, this priestly Kohlsaat, as he calls himself; this "honorable man," who never violated a confidence in his life! He appeared before the committee and they asked him about the editorial of the 15th day of February. He said, "Yes; I dictated that editorial and I knew whereof I wrote." "Well, who was your informant?" "Oh"—and here is the beginning of the hippodrome—"I will not tell you; it was given to me in confidence, and, as a newspaper man, I hold the confidence as sacred as would a Catholic priest hold a confession. I would prefer to go to jail rather than tell you." Then the whole country had a view of this most righteous and most loyal man who had received the statement in confidence; and from the testimony that was adduced before the committee they must have concluded that he violated that confidence to not less than 20 or probably more persons, and gave the name of his informant to 3 persons. The country was aroused; they wondered if this loyal man would tell the story; they wondered if he would ever give the name; they were looking on to see whether or not he would go to jail rather than violate the confidence. So the public attention was again called; and then we have it in the testimony that Funk—this "honorable man," as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] called him—said: "I can stand it no longer; I can no longer see my friends prosecuted, and so I will tell the story; I will go before the Helm committee." He went before the Helm committee; he told the story, and he told it in a different way than he would have told it if he had been permitted to tell it before the investigating committee of this Senate.

Then witnesses were called in from other places. Edward Hines, on the advice of his lawyers, waited in Chicago to go before the Helm committee again and testify as to the Funk story. Did they again call Hines? No. They sent the reporters of the Hearst papers over this country to interview men and ask them if they knew anything about this $100,000 jack pot, and the men interviewed, every individual, said they did not. The reporters returned and made affidavits to the Helm committee that they had invited these men before the committee to testify; that they said they would not come; and because they lived in other States, of course, the Helm committee could not compel their attendance. Their own representative, Mr. Coan, reported that to the committee. These men were called before your investigating committee and every one of them testified that Coan had never asked him to go before the Helm committee, and that he had never refused to go before the Helm committee. Yet, the Hearst representatives, who by that time had come into this conspiracy, made an affidavit to the Helm committee that these men had refused to come into the State of Illinois.

Then they reported to the State senate and stated that they could not secure these important witnesses, and that the only body that could get them was the Senate of the United States. So they passed a resolution calling on the Senate to undertake another investigation because of their inability, after a most strenuous effort, to secure the witnesses who were outside of the State of Illinois.

Was the attention of the people of the country called to this? Oh, yes. Every man all over the country, including myself, said that if there was a corruption fund of $100,000 the country ought to know of it, and the Senate—while I believe they violated a fundamental rule of law of this land in so doing—appointed another committee. Thus have we before us the action not of the Helm committee, but of Gov. Deneen, of the Tribune crowd, of Herman Kohlsaat, of Victor Lawson, of John J. Healy; and, hence, we are here to-day. That is why and how we happen to be discussing this question here this morning, because it was necessary to have some official creature, such as the Helm committee, call on the Senate of the United States to act.

And then the second investigating committee was appointed. I merely want to say, in concluding that statement, that no witness was summoned before the Helm committee, which was appointed on the 17th day of January, until after the 1st day of March, when my case had been disposed of. These conspirators had humbugged this Senate into appointing a committee. With the hope of finding new evidence in their mind? Oh, Senators, no; there was no such thought in their mind; but to try the case on the old testimony, because there were new judges, and they hoped to be able to get a verdict for that reason.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to discuss for just a few moments the views of the minority of the committee and to point out to the Senate the misstatements they have made of the record and the insinuations and innuendoes that were resorted to, in my opinion, with no other purpose than to poison the minds of Members of this body.

Before going into that, however, I want to call attention to their report in which they state that they conclude that Joseph Clark must have received money and therefore was corrupted and that his vote should not be counted for LORIMER.

But before proceeding further with that, I want to state that I heard, after the last investigation, that many Senators were opposed to LORIMER because he did not take the stand in his own behalf. When I testified before the committee, Senator JONES asked me at the conclusion why I had not taken the stand before. If my memory serves me right, I responded that it had been admitted in the prior investigation by the counsel for the Chicago Tribune that they did not expect and would not claim that they would connect LORIMER with any corrupt act, and that I thought it was beneath the dignity of a Senator of the United States to take the stand when any sort of insinuation was made and swear that he was not guilty. But I did make a statement upon this floor, and I have sworn to every word that I stated here, and not one single word has been contradicted.

In this connection I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] to a statement that he made. He sent to Gov. Deneen to find out whether LORIMER was lying or not. He asked the governor if Shurtleff had been one of a committee that worked in favor of Senator Hopkins—I stated that he had been, in Senator Hopkins's previous election—and the governor did not answer my statement. The governor said if it were so, it would be news to the people of the State of Illinois. The governor evaded in his answers the important inquiries just as he evaded that one.

My attention is called to the further fact that the Senator from South Dakota asked if Gov. Deneen's friends had aided in defeating Senator Hopkins; and that was because I had stated upon this floor that Gov. Deneen was responsible for the defeat of Senator Hopkins, and that if his friends had voted for Hopkins on the first ballot in the separate houses, or on the first five joint ballots, Senator Hopkins would have been elected. The governor evaded that question, Senator CRAWFORD. But on the stand, under oath, when the question was deliberately put to him, he swore that he and his friends had a conference, and they decided to defer the election of Senator

Hopkins, and that they did defer it until after the governor's contest was settled, which occurred on the 18th day of the following March. That is what he testified to, Senator CRAWFORD. I was taught, from the earliest time I can remember, when I sat beside my mother, that to act a lie was more heinous than to tell one. While he did not deny my statement, he acted in such a way and he framed his response in such a manner as to give the impression to any man who read the telegram that LORIMER had lied when he made that statement upon the floor of the Senate. That can be found in the remarks of the Senator from South Dakota in the RECORD, made on the night he made his famous filibustering all-night speech, talking about everything under the sun except, for a short time, the question that was really at issue in the Senate.

Senators also complain because I did not discuss the record. May I not call the attention of Senators to the fact that there was no investigation open in the Senate, no investigation called for, until I myself introduced a resolution, at least within three days of a month after the charges had been made in the newspapers and after Lee O'Neil Browne had been indicted. Will not Senators recall that from the day I introduced the resolution until the Senate acted I never as much as raised my finger to convince any Senator that any testimony which was given before the committee was not the truth? I concluded when that resolution was introduced that I would sit here and await the deliberate judgment of the Senate and let them decide it without any discussion of the facts from me; and that is why I did not discuss the testimony.

But I feel now that my case is settled. Do what you may, you can not set aside the judgment that is written in the record of this body and can never be stricken out. I believe that because I have a title not only of a certificate presented and accepted, but a title that has been challenged and declared valid by this body, I am now justified in discussing this testimony.

Now, it is stated that Joseph Clark must have received money, and, therefore, his vote was corrupt and should not be counted for LORIMER. I received a letter from John A. Bingham, of Vandalia, Ill., on the second day of June, 1911, and I shall read only the parts that are important. Referring to Joseph Clark, he says:

At the request of Joseph Clark, I am writing this letter. I have just come from his bedside, where I went at the request of Joe over the phone.

As I told you in Chicago when I last saw you, Joe is not long for this world unless he improves rapidly. He has been confined to his bed for two weeks steadily, and in bed more than half of the time since spring.

Now to the question. To-day's Tribune contains the statement that Senator OWEN yesterday read three affidavits in the Senate made by three citizens of Vandalia that Joseph Clark stated in their presence "that he said he voted for LORIMER on condition of controlling the post-office appointment at that place," and that he, OWEN, did not want them to go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. Clark wants you to give him the names of the "Vandalia citizens" who made the affidavits that he may know who they are.

Also copies of the affidavits, if you can get them. Mr. Clark informs me he never made such a statement in the presence of anyone; that he had no promise of any kind from you or anyone for his vote for you, or any other consideration of any kind or character; that he never had a conversation with you for months before the vote was taken, and about six hours afterwards, and then in the presence of a room full of your friends. And he is ready to so state, and in his testimony before the senatorial committee in Chicago did swear to these facts where same can be found.

Now, this part of my letter is confidential. If you want the testimony of Joseph Clark for use on this or any other question, you better serve notice and have it taken soon, as my judgment is Mr. Clark can not live long, and will not unless a change in his condition comes soon.

On the 19th of June the same gentleman sent me the following letter:

FRIEND LORIMER: On behalf of Joseph S. Clark, of this city, I again write you. June 3d last I wrote you—at Mr. Clark's request—asking you to furnish him the names of the citizens and copies of the three affidavits read by Senator OWEN to the Senate on the day previous, charging that Mr. Clark voted for you in consideration of naming the Vandalia (Ill.) postmaster.

Mr. Clark is in a very dangerous condition at the present, with little hope of his recovery, and wants to know before he dies who these citizens are who made such affidavits.

Can not you gratify the wishes of this poor dying man? He also wants to aid you in any way in his power, and if it is possible that he may have the opportunity to record his affidavit or evidence absolutely denying the facts in those affidavits, he wants it done.

It would relieve his mind greatly to be given the opportunity. Certainly your tormentors are not so calloused as to deny the request of a dying man.

Then I sent him a telegram in which I stated that I had forwarded copies of the affidavits.

Mr. President, it can be seen from those letters that they were not secured for me; that they did not come as a result of any effort that I put forth to bring them here. They are requests from a dying man who wanted to leave a record before he passed to the kingdom come that his traducers lied about him; and he made a dying declaration, and that is what I want especially to call to the attention of the Senate. I will ask permission to have printed in the RECORD all the portions that I will not take up the time of the Senate in reading, and I will only read the vital elements of his dying declaration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LORIMER. I read from Joseph Clark's affidavit:

I am now a sick man, having been confined to my bed for the past 48 days, and may soon be called to the judgment bar of my God.

* * * * * * *

And I desire to state further, as a further explanation, and as I now feel this will be the last opportunity I may have, and want this statement to be a part of my affidavit:

* * * * * * *

I desire to further state, and make it a part of this affidavit, there was no consideration of any kind from Mr. LORIMER or anyone else on his behalf or for him made to me directly or indirectly, or any hope of reward held out to me or anyone for me, that moved me to cast my vote for Senator LORIMER for United States Senator—no promise of post office or anything else—and I did not do this until I was convinced we, as Democrats, could not elect a Democrat; and I want to say further, I consulted with my Democratic friends and was advised by them, if we could not elect a Democrat, to defeat Hopkins at all hazards, and when the opportunity came, and being convinced we could not elect a Democrat and that we could defeat Senator Hopkins, so cast my vote, and these considerations, and these only, moved me and prompted my vote.

* * * * * * *

As matters of this life stand now with me it matters but little to me whether the enemies of Senator LORIMER succeed in ousting him from his seat in the United States Senate or not, or what becomes of the post-office fight in Vandalia, Ill. I feel that I have discharged my duty in both matters and it is for this purpose and that the truth in both matters may be known I have caused this affidavit to be made. I want to add further that this affidavit is made at my own request, and none other.

That is the dying declaration of Joseph Clark. How he received the affidavits I have just stated. No man will ever convince me that any man on his deathbed, knowing as Joseph Clark knew that his days would soon be numbered, would plead with anybody for an opportunity to perjure his soul and sink it into damnation to help a man who had not requested his help.

No, Mr. President, before I believe that I must understand Christian people, and I must understand the Christian doctrine different than it was taught to me. All the suspicion that all the committees or parts of committees might cast upon the vote of any man who had made in the closing moments of his life a statement of that kind would not make me believe that when he was going before his Maker he had perjured his soul.

Joseph Clark in a few days after passed away. So much for the views of the minority with reference to Joseph Clark.

Now, for the insinuation; now for the innuendo. Luke has been referred to as one of the men who received money, and all through the discussion of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] you will find Luke's name running. He uttered this sentence:

I do not know that I shall refer to Luke's testimony again—

Now remember, "Luke's testimony again"— and therefore I will add here that Charles Luke is the man who has since died.

Since when? Since he testified? What other impression can you have, because he states that he will not refer to Luke's testimony again and that Charles Luke is the man who has since died. I read from page 35 of Senator KERN's speech.

Now, what is the evident purpose of making a statement of that kind? I can find no other reason except to smear and slime the record and create suspicion in the minds of Senators that Luke testified and that he did not believe him. He classed him among those, therefore, who had received a bribe.

Now, Senators, what are the facts? The first resolution that was introduced in the Senate was on the 28th day of May, 1910, and I introduced it myself. Before the resolution was introduced Luke had gone to his Maker and he never testified before this committee or any other committee. I challenge here and now in the presence of the men who are to decide this case Senator LEA, Senator KERN, Senator KENYON, the men who signed the minority views, to point out in any part of this record or the previous record or any of the records that Luke ever testified in this case.

Mrs. Luke, the widow of Charles Luke, did testify. She testified in Chicago. She testified before both committees. She was asked if she had seen any money in the possession of her husband. She said she had. She was asked the question how much, or was it $950? She answered that it was. She was asked the character and the denomination of the bills. She said she thought they were $20 bills. She was asked if he received it or if she saw it after he came back from St. Louis after he had received a telegram from Robert E. Wilson. She testified, no; it was before. She was asked if he had been to St. Louis or Chicago before he received the money. She said, no; he had not.

That is what she testified to before the committee in Chicago in the previous investigation. In this investigation she answered—and she was a poor, weak, sickly woman—that she forgot whether it was before he went to St. Louis or not. But on cross-examination her testimony was read to her on the previous examination, and the question was asked, "Was your memory better then than it is now?" and she said it was. She was asked did she tell the truth at Chicago the first time, and she said she did.

There is the testimony—and the only testimony we have—as to the money that she saw with her husband before he had gone to St. Louis to meet Robert Wilson, and that he had neither been in Chicago nor St. Louis before she saw the $950.

Now, how does that tally with the insinuation of the Senator that Luke testified, and that he would not talk about his testimony any more, the inference being that it was so unbelievable that it was not worth talking about?

Jandus, the man who was in Broderick's saloon the day that Holstlaw called, also it was shown was buying property soon after the election of Senator LORIMER and paying out considerable sums of money, and that he had a large sum of money in his vault at his office. Jandus testified that he bought property in connection with other people; that he made from seven to eight thousand dollars every year; that he was either secretary or attorney, I have forgotten which, of somewhere from 10 to 12 building associations. I have known Jandus since he was a boy. He is an industrious man. Jandus has been in the real-estate business as an active 18-hour-a-day toiler all his life, and he has been buying and selling and trading real estate all his life. And because he joined with other people to buy farm land, that is evidence that he was corrupted! There is no evidence in the record here, there is no statement by anybody, charging Jandus with having been purchased to vote for LORIMER.

Then there is a lot more of what is termed to be circumstantial testimony, that Henry Shephard had a safety-deposit box in the city of St. Louis, and that he was a banker, and because he was a banker he ought to keep his papers in his own vault at home in Jerseyville.

I started out to be a banker when these conspirators started out to destroy me. I have been a poor sort of a banker since. We have a vault in our bank. Inside of that vault I have a little box. Nobody has the combination but my sons and myself. I have papers there. In the same building downstairs in the safety-deposit vault I have a box. The vault we have is good enough and secure enough to defy all the burglars in the world; but I also have a safety-deposit box in the safety-deposit vault downstairs. One of the largest banks in the city of Chicago occupied the space that we occupy now, and they, too, had a safety-deposit box in which to store their valuables.

It is pointed out as a suspicious circumstance that Thomas Tippitt, the leader of the minority Democrats, had a safety-deposit box. The evidence here shows that Thomas Tippitt had had the box since 1902. If you go through the list of the members of the general assembly, the average man in Chicago and in Illinois—not the man of affairs, but the average man—you will find that he has a safety-deposit box. In Chicago we rent them by the hundreds of thousands, and we are not millionaires in that town by the hundreds of thousands. That insinuation is to poison the minds of the Senate and create a suspicion that they rented these boxes to store away the corrupt money which they received as a result of LORIMER's election.

Then De Wolfe and Wheelan and Blair, the latter seen at the ball park with hundred-dollar bills; it was said that one bought a house and paid for it, and the other had money in the Bible at home. That is taken as an evidence that they were corrupted to vote for LORIMER.

Why, Mr. President, if they had called in all the members of the Illinois General Assembly and put them on the stand, I have no doubt that they all would have testified—those who voted for me and those who did not—that at some time, at some place they had money—twenty-dollar bills, fifty-dollar bills, hundred-dollar bills—and it is just as reasonable to assume or to insinuate that the men who testified that they had money who did not vote for LORIMER received it corruptly because they did not vote for LORIMER as to assume that those who had money, who did vote for LORIMER, because they had money were corrupted to vote for LORIMER.

These are all men; they are all of age; they all have families; they all have to work for a living. Will anybody suppose that that was the only time in their history that they had had money? Is it not just as fair to presume that the money they had 10 years ago was money they got on a promise to vote for LORIMER 10 years hence? I believe, if it was necessary to make that argument, Senators who do not seem to care for the facts would have made such a statement. So I will not go into the details as to those members of the general assembly.

Mr. President, as to the four so-called confessors, the four men who are said to have been bribed to vote for LORIMER, the first is Charles A. White. If you have any case here it must stand or fall on the statements of Charles A. White. I am not going into the impeaching testimony of all the witnesses to prove the character of White and the many things that he said and that he threatened to do to extort money from persons; but I am going to call your attention to facts that, if true and not disproven beyond any question of doubt, you may feel that you have a right to disbelieve White, even though everybody here, no matter how he came here, must admit, because it is in the record, that Charles A. White is a perjurer and that he admitted under oath that he was a perjurer.

What are the facts? When Lee O'Neil Browne was on trial in Cook County, what was the charge? He was charged with bribing Charles A. White to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator. He was not charged with paying money, except as he paid a thousand dollars in three payments to Charles A. White for his vote for WILLIAM LORIMER. The State's attorney of Cook County centered all his energy around that statement to prove that Lee O'Neil Browne had bribed Charles A. White to vote for LORIMER. After the first trial they realized that they must prove that. To prove it they put the Yarbroughs on the stand—the two brothers. Let me call your attention to this:

White had testified that Browne called him on the phone in his room between 11 or 12 o'clock, or some such hour, on the night of the 24th of May, and told him that he wanted to come to White's room; that he wanted to talk to him; and that he did go there. When he arrived there it is claimed White was there, Otis Yarbrough was there, and Sidney Yarbrough was there; and that Browne made some jocular remark about three sleeping in a bed. So well did they recall the details that there was no mistake about it. White said that Browne invited him (White) to his room; that he went there; that Browne asked him to vote for LORIMER; and without White asking him anything about what he would get, Browne said, "It will not be any chicken feed either."

The whole case in that trial depended upon whether or not White told the truth. White stated that no other man previous to that moment had asked him to vote for LORIMER; that he had never told a soul that he intended to vote for LORIMER; and that he had never discussed it with anybody on the face of the earth. The only person who ever talked to him about the matter, according to his statement, was Lee O'Neil Browne. Both of the Yarbroughs testified that they were there when Lee O'Neil Browne called.

Now, eliminate White, eliminate Browne—eliminate their testimony altogether—and what do we find? First of all, we find Representative Shaw, a Democrat, a constant supporter of Senator Stringer and chairman of the committee of Democrats organized for the purpose of persuading Democrats not to vote for LORIMER; he did not himself vote for LORIMER; it was his duty, as chairman of the committee, earnestly to work to defeat LORIMER, to talk to every Democrat, and he testified—now mark you—Shaw testified, that he talked to White. He had reason to talk to him; it was his duty to talk to him; and he has reason to remember his talk with him. He says, three or four days or a week before LORIMER was elected White told him that if he got a chance to vote for BILL LORIMER he would vote for him. Shaw tried to persuade him not to do so, but White insisted that he would do so if he got a chance. That was prior to the 24th day of May, about a week before LORIMER was elected.

John O'Neill, a labor leader from Chicago, known personally to White, a friend of White's, testified that he talked with White a week or more before the election of LORIMER, and White told him—now mark you; remember that White said that nobody ever talked to him; that the matter never was mentioned by anybody—but John O'Neill said that he talked with White; and that White told him that he, as a Democrat, would vote for LORIMER; that he was a member of the legislature; and his language was that "a good many of the boys"—meaning the Democrats—"felt the same way about it." On Sunday morning, the 23d of May, in the city of Chicago, he told a street-car motorman named Gloss with whom he had worked in East St. Louis and in O'Fallon that BILL LORIMER was going to be elected, and that he was going to vote for him.

There is no reason why these men should tell falsehoods. Nobody will challenge the statement of Representative Shaw. I think every member of the committee, minority and majority, believed every word that Shaw said; I believe every member of the committee believed every word that O'Neill said; and I believe that every member believed what Gloss stated.

Now, remember this, that the whole question turned on whether or not White told the truth when he stated that Lee O'Neil Browne was the only man who ever talked with him about voting for LORIMER, and that Lee O'Neil Browne was the only man whom he ever told he was going to vote for LORIMER. The men to whom I have referred stated otherwise. In addition to that, I stated on the stand that Charles White, a week or 10 days before I was elected, walked up to me in the House of Representatives of Illinois and volunteered this statement: "If your name is presented to the general assembly I will cast my vote for you."

But I am an interested party. I do not ask you to consider my testimony, but I am justified in assuming that you will consider the testimony of men whom no one impeaches and whom no member of the committee doubts.

Now, I go a step further. These three men testified that the Yarbroughs—the two of them—were in the room on the night of the 24th of May, when Lee O'Neil Browne called. That is a circumstance through which they expected to prove that White was telling the truth; and it had no other purpose, because they gave no other testimony with reference to that proposition.

Now, what does the record show? The record shows that Sidney Yarbrough was not there, but that he was in the city of Chicago on the night of the 24th of May. I will not go into the details of that. But if any Senator doubts the statement, I will do so, and prove it beyond any question of doubt, as this testimony does, that Sidney Yarbrough was in Chicago, in the motorman's house, in bed, the night of the 24th of May. Does any Senator misunderstand? He was in Chicago, not in Springfield in Charley White's room. He went to Springfield on the night of the 25th on the Illinois Central Railroad, and rode on Charles A. White's pass. That was testified to by the man and the woman in whose home he slept that night. Nobody doubts that. There is not the remotest doubt in the mind of anyone who heard that testimony that Sidney Yarbrough was not in Springfield. The register in the hotel shows that only Otis Yarbrough and Charles A. White registered on that night at the St. Nicholas Hotel.

How do we know that he went on the Illinois Central Railroad? Gloss, who had been Sidney Yarbrough's motorman, testified that he knew Sidney Yarbrough's handwriting. Sidney Yarbrough had to sign the coupon on which he rode to Springfield. Browne's lawyers sent to the railroad office, and there were produced Charles A. White's coupons, 45 or 46 of them—these were coupon passes—bearing on one side the date on which they were used; bearing the name of the person to whom issued on the other side. The 45 or 46 coupons were turned face down, leaving the signatures on the coupons exposed, and Gloss, who had been Yarbrough's motorman, was called to pick out, before he had previously had an opportunity to see them, those coupons which bore the signature of Charles A. White written by Sidney Yarbrough; and he picked them out. I have forgotten how many he picked out, but more than one; and when they were turned up it was found that one of them bore the date of May 25, 1909, used 24 hours after Sidney Yarbrough had sworn that he was in Charley White's room in Springfield when Lee O'Neil Browne called on the night of the 24th of May.

Now, are we to believe White, who swore that Sidney Yarbrough was there? Are we to believe Otis Yarbrough, who swore Sidney Yarbrough was there as circumstantial testimony to prove White was telling the truth? Are we to believe White against Representative Shaw's testimony, John O'Neill's testimony, the testimony of Gloss, who picked out the signature of White that was written by Sidney Yarbrough? Are we to take White's testimony as the truth and consider that these men are perjurers, or will we believe these men whom nobody attempts to impeach?

Now, as to the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], why did I loan or contribute—put it in any way you choose; put it in the most offensive terms that you can conjure up; make it carry with it all the suspicion that innuendo and insinuation are capable of—why did I furnish money to aid Lee O'Neil Browne in his defense?

Does it take a man of superhuman intellect to understand? No. I think anybody who wanted to understand could understand without an explanation. What was Lee O'Neil Browne on trial for? Corrupting Charles White? Oh, no. Giving money to Charles White? Oh, no; except as it was a circumstance. He was tried for giving money to Charley White and bribing him to vote for LORIMER. That was the charge. And if it is true, LORIMER has no place in the Senate.

I know that Lee O'Neil Browne never paid out $1 for a vote for LORIMER. I know that the State's attorney and the Tribune and the governor were in a conspiracy to destroy LORIMER, and I know, and every Senator here knows, that if Lee O'Neil Browne could have been convicted it would have been hard to make anybody believe that LORIMER had not bought his seat or that somebody had not bought it for him, and with the conviction of Browne, that conviction would have been brought here to the Senate as evidence that LORIMER was here by corrupt methods and practices. That is on what they intended to base the prosecution. They thought they had it closed up; they thought it was a closed book; that there was no doubt that Lee O'Neil Browne would be convicted; that he could not escape. All the power of the third degree they knew would be brought to bear by State's Attorney Wayman; all the power of the governor's office would be brought to bear by the governor.

Lee O'Neil Browne was to be convicted. Where? Where the venue lay? Oh, no. He did not bribe White in Chicago. If he bribed him to vote for LORIMER he bribed him in Springfield. Yet they say he paid him money in Chicago. I answer, then, it is stated that they paid him $100 in Springfield, and the venue was in Springfield, Ill., where, if there was a corrupt act, it was performed. But what was the effort of the State's attorney of Chicago, and of the governor of Illinois, and of the attorney general? They were all lawyers. I am not. They knew where the venue was, but they were afraid of the State's attorney at Springfield, Ill. They knew, or at least they thought at that time, that they could not depend upon him to apply the third degree, and Wayman sent White and Beckemeyer out of the State in order that they might not be subpœnaed by the State's attorney of Sangamon County to go there and testify, and on their testimony an indictment be brought and the State's attorney of that county might prosecute Lee O'Neil Browne and take him out of the hands of Wayman and the Tribune.

How far did they go in their effort? They called in the attorney general of the State. They got him to commence proceedings in Sangamon County, in the circuit court, to prohibit the State's attorney of Sangamon County from subpœnaing anybody before the grand jury to testify on matters affecting this case. The circuit court of Sangamon County refused to interfere.

These men were taken out of the State and kept out until when? Until the Record-Herald and the Hearst papers made Burke believe that the newspapers would make a great man of him. He went to Chicago and visited all the newspapers in town. His picture was taken and put in the papers—but I will tell that story a little later on.

But, now, if Lee O'Neil Browne had been convicted in Cook County, no lawyer will believe that he ever would have gone to the penitentiary. At the end of the fight in Illinois, in the appellate court or in the supreme court, or, if not there, here, where all men's liberty is secure—in the Supreme Court of the United States—it would have been decided that the venue was not in Cook County but in Sangamon County; that even if Lee O'Neil Browne was guilty the court had no jurisdiction, and he would have been dismissed. But meanwhile time would have been consumed and the conviction of Browne would have been placed before the Senate and would have been cited as strong proof that LORIMER's seat was purchased and that Lee O'Neil Browne was a party to the purchase.

Does the Senator from Missouri think that any man who has the slightest respect for his own honor would stand by and permit these conspirators, through perjury and without right of law, to send a man to the penitentiary because he was not able to employ counsel on account of his financial condition? It would not only convict him unlawfully, but, in the minds of the people, convict LORIMER of securing a seat here by bribery and corruption.

That is all there is to the White story; there is the evidence, all centered around the night of the 24th of May. If that be true, you have a right to believe it, and I say you have just as much right to believe White as Browne, if you want to. But no man has a right in deciding a case, either as judge or juror, to take the testimony of a self-confessed, time after time, perjurer—a man who would sell his soul for money—against the three other witnesses, Shaw, O'Neill, and Gloss.

Take the testimony of Sidney Yarbrough offered as circumstantial proof—and, standing alone, it is convincing—against the statement of Mr. and Mrs. George Gloss that he was in their home on the night of the 24th day of May. You must believe that all these men, Shaw, O'Neill, and Gloss, and this good woman, Mrs. Gloss, are perjurers and that Charles White tells the truth as against them, if you are to believe there is anything in this case. That is all there is to the case. Settle that question in your own mind and you have settled it all. You do not need to go to Link; you do not need to go to Beckemeyer; you do not need to go to Holstlaw, when you have settled in your mind that Charles White was not telling the truth about that incident; then you must conclude that he was not bribed to vote for LORIMER; that he did not receive any part of the $1,000 to cast his vote for LORIMER. I am not asking Senators to consider, in connection with his testimony, that I testified that 10 days or a week before he voted for me he voluntarily rose from his seat in the house of representatives and pledged me his vote.

Yes; the views of the minority are that in this case there are the confessions of four men that their votes were secured by bribery, and that their confessions are corroborated by strong circumstantial evidence; that four men testified that their votes were secured by bribery. Stop there. That is what they say that the four confessed. Senator KERN signed that report. Senator KENYON signed that report. Senator LEA signed that report. They signed it in the face of the testimony in the record of Michael Link, corroborated by the State's attorney of Cook County, who was the prosecutor, that he never said that he received a dollar or was promised a dollar or ever got a dollar for casting his vote for WILLIAM LORIMER. Yet there is that statement. It is not insinuation, it is not innuendo, but it is the views of the minority.

But in this case there are confessions by four men that their votes were secured by bribery.

That is what they said; nothing more, nothing less. I have just stated to the Senate that that is in the face of the fact; that the record shows that Link never made any such statement, but always persisted that he voted for LORIMER because he had promised to vote for him a considerable time before he was elected if he would be a candidate, because he liked him and because the people of his district were for LORIMER, and they were for him because they live on the Mississippi River and LORIMER was the champion of the deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf, and his constituents were more interested in that than they were in anything else, and that they favored him, and that, therefore, he favored him.

The further fact is shown in this record that only one man, Charley White, testified that he was bribed to vote for LORIMER, and that he received and was promised money to vote for LORIMER. Link denied it in every way that the English language can cover it that he never thought of being rewarded, that he never was rewarded, that he would not have accepted a reward for casting his vote for LORIMER.

Senators, that is the testimony, and the record shows it. I do not ask you to take my view or my opinion of it. Read the record. It tells the truth. Link said—now mark this—Link said that he was put through the third degree. I will not rehearse it all, but he said finally they put the proposition up to him, "Say you got the money and go home to your family; and if you do not you are on the road to the penitentiary." Now, what is Link's testimony? His testimony is that he said, "If I have to lie to save my wife and to keep out of the penitentiary I will lie before the grand jury."

Where did he testify to that? Before the committee? Yes; before the previous committee. Since that time Mike Link has passed away. Was that the only place where he testified? No; he testified in the criminal court in Cook County. He testified to that twice in the jurisdiction of Wayman. If it was not true, Senators, it was perjury, and it was perjury in Cook County, where the venue lay. It was testified to twice in the presence of Wayman that he told Wayman if he must lie to save his wife and his family and to keep out of the penitentiary he would lie.

Was he ever indicted for perjury? No; Wayman never brought him to the bar of justice for perjuring himself, if it was perjury. They never disproved it on the stand. Nobody ever appeared before any committee to contradict it until Michael Link was dead and in his grave, and then they brought the assistant State's attorneys before this committee, after three times during his lifetime he had sworn to it, and then they testified that Michael Link was not telling the truth. If they were looking for perjurers, if they were looking for men guilty of corruption—and what more awful crime is there than perjury—why did they not prosecute Michael Link for testifying that the man who was prosecuting was told, before Link went before the grand jury, "if I must lie to save my wife and my family, and to keep out of the penitentiary, I will do it"?

Suppose we were not trying this case in the newspapers, suppose we were not trying a case by the newspapers, what would we do with such testimony as that of Link? Who would accept it as circumstantial or corroborative proof of anything? Nobody, nowhere. No man who has followed the record can accept it as testimony or evidence even worthy of the slightest consideration in this case.

Another statement, White testified immediately after the adjournment of the legislature June, 1909, that he wrote asking Browne for the balance of his Lorimer money. We have no letter of that kind in the record. I searched the records for a letter of that sort.

It is suggested to me by a Senator to state that Link said that he got a thousand dollars, but he repeated time after time and time after time that he did not get it for his vote for LORIMER. Whom are we to believe? Will you believe these men only when their testimony will destroy LORIMER and disbelieve them when it tends to aid LORIMER? Is there only one time that we can believe a perjurer, and that time when his testimony aids the newspaper trust in destroying the man they have never controlled and, with God's help, never will control? But while I live and am given the strength, regardless of the action of this Senate, this fight will go on, and on, and on, until all the people of the world will come to know the case.

The five Senators of the committee who reported to you that the testimony taken before them clearly established that my election was valid heard almost every line of testimony. I sat with the committee except on a few days when I was called away on business. I do not condemn the Senators for it, but the record will show that of the minority one Senator was there less than 25 per cent of the time, another Senator not to exceed 50 per cent of the time, another Senator not to exceed 80 per cent of the time. That is what the record shows. And he of the three who has the best record was not actually present in the room more than 50 per cent of the time when witnesses were on the stand.

White's testimony is corroborated by the following facts—

This is in the views of the minority—

(4) By the threats of White to blackmail Browne and LORIMER, which were made in August, 1909—

Mark you, August—to friends of Browne, and which were doubtless communicated to Browne, and by the thinly veiled threats of exposure by White in a letter to Browne of October 20, 1909, in which he stated, according to his testimony—

I would have the attention of Senators to this—he knew LORIMER and Browne were under no obligations to him, since he had received his part of the Lorimer and jack-pot money, and the fact that thereafter Browne and Senator LORIMER both tried to secure positions paying satisfactory salaries to White. For if White had had no knowledge that would be injurious to LORIMER or Browne, he could not have blackmailed them successfully, and there would have been no reason to obtain the position that was secured for him by Senator LORIMER, through Lee O'Neil Browne, after these threats, or no reason to try to placate White. On the contrary, innocent men would indignantly have refused to have anything else to do with such a blackmailer.

There is not a scintilla of evidence in this record to prove the insinuation that LORIMER ever tried to placate White. There is not a scintilla of testimony to prove that in August White tried to blackmail LORIMER. I will tell the Senate. It was not necessary to testify, because nobody insinuated anything of that sort while the committee was in session.

Browne came to me after my return from Europe. I landed in New York on the 19th day of October, 1909, after an investigation of the waterways in Europe. I went to my office in Chicago, I think, on the 22d day of October. There I found a letter from White pleading for help, for some sort of a situation. He said he was $500 in debt, and that he wanted me, if I would, to help him to secure a position. I told Browne, who told me this story: "White is poor. He has no employment. The street car company will not take him back. He is a troublesome labor leader. Can you not get him a job?" He never had a place that paid him over $65 or $70 a month. I secured him a job in Cook County, at $75 a month. There was no sign of blackmail, not a word of intimidation. It was a plea to help a man that helped me. When a man who has helped you to climb the ladder in the world asks you for assistance, if you are an honest man, if you are true to yourself, in accordance with the theory of the minority of the committee you will turn that friend down. All right, Senator KENYON, Senator KERN, Senator LEA, you may live up to that rule if you will; but all my life I have tried to make a reputation for never having gone back on or turned down a friend. God willing, I will continue in that course until my death; and if it shall be a sign of vicious habits, bribery, and corruption, I will still go on, and let Him judge, who, after all, shall be the final judge, whether or not it is correct to do unto others as you would have them do by you. By that rule have I lived, and by that rule will I die, if all the world, including the Senate, shall condemn me.

It is evident from the views of the minority, if the statement of the minority be true, that LORIMER was a man of great force, with no equal to be found anywhere in Illinois. They say:

Senator LORIMER's hand was the guiding force in shaping the action of the Legislature of Illinois in 1909, from soon after its organization—

There is not a word, not a syllable in the record which justifies that statement—and that he was in close consultation with Speaker Shurtleff—and minority leader Lee O'Neil Browne.

Yes—

To read this one would infer that from the beginning, or soon after the organization of the legislature, LORIMER was guiding the acts of the legislature and that he was in close consultation with the speaker and Lee O'Neil Browne. It naturally carries the impression that LORIMER and Browne were constantly in consultation during the whole winter; but the record shows that LORIMER and Browne were not. There is no evidence even to create the slightest suspicion that Browne and LORIMER were in close consultation until some time in the neighborhood of two weeks before the election. That LORIMER and Shurtleff were in consultation, close consultation, all winter is true. LORIMER was at Springfield every week after the 12th day of January. For what? Take the testimony of the governor of the State. He testified that almost every time he and LORIMER talked they talked about the deep waterway proposition. I testified that I was there every week in the interest of the deep waterway project. The Senator from Indiana pooh-poohs that and passes it over. He says there is nothing in that. Oh, no; there is nothing in LORIMER'S interest in the deep waterway; he never had been interested enough in the deep waterway to take him to Springfield; and yet the record shows that LORIMER for three years had attended every session of the legislature in the interest of the deep waterway, first, to have the $20,000,000 constitutional amendment passed, and, after it was passed, to go there, as he went there that year, to make it effective by legislation.

Probably the Senator from Indiana has the idea that all public men devote their time to pulling down people and things and that none of them devote their time to building up. For 17 years I have devoted my time to the deep waterway project, not alone to speak at meetings, not alone to urge other people to join, but to organize, and to pay out of my own pocket the expenses of creating the organization, in 17 years amounting, in round figures, to more than $30,000, of which I hold receipts for more than $20,000—not aided by others, not contributed by others, but out of my own pocket. If a man will spend on an average $2.000 a year out of his own money to create a sentiment in the interest of a great project, out of which he can not hope to receive the slightest reward, is it not at least evidence to justify the statement that I made that I had an interest in the deep waterway project, and that it was important to me? If I had not been compelled to follow for two and a quarter years this awful, bitter, vicious prosecution the deep waterway from the Great Lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, I am sure, would have been legislated for for completion from the Lakes to the Gulf.

I may not be able to aid further in constructing that mighty highway of commerce, but the work has not been in vain; the expenditure of personal funds has not been without reward, because, through the efforts of the Lakes to the Gulf Deep Waterways Association, a sentiment in the country has been created which has caused Congress thus far, before this year's river and harbor bill was passed, to appropriate, and the Government has expended $7,000,000 to regulate and control the Mississippi River, which can be done beyond the slightest question of doubt with the proper appropriations and with the known scientific methods. In that way the Mississippi can be controlled. I may not be here, as I had hoped to be when I began to make an effort in favor of this project, to see the final completion and the deep-draft boats of Lake Michigan traversing the Chicago Drainage Canal down into the Illinois River and off into the Mississippi to the Gulf of Mexico; but the work has been done. The people now realize the feasibility and the importance of it to the commerce, not alone of the Mississippi Valley, but, with the completion of the Panama Canal, to the commerce and industries of the entire country. Whether LORIMER shall ever be heard of again, whether LORIMER shall live to see the final completion, or to have aught more to do with bringing it about, I have faith that the organization that was started will continue the work, and that this proposed great highway of commerce will one day be a highway in fact. When the Senator from Indiana, in the language chosen by himself, attempts to make the Senate believe that that was not of sufficient importance to LORIMER to cause him to go to Springfield and stay there all winter, as he had stayed there many days before for the same reason, he indicates that he does not realize the length and breadth and magnitude and importance of the project, or that that is not his rule of labor.

In the same connection the minority further say:

> And that he was in such close consultation with Speaker Shurtleff and minority leader Lee O'Neil Browne as to justify the belief that these men were his agents and to warrant our holding him bound by their actions.

"His agents!" What is an agent? Every lawyer knows what "agent" means. We laymen do not fully appreciate the importance of the word, but you lawyers know what it means. It means somebody authorized to act, somebody selected to speak for LORIMER, to carry out a bargain for LORIMER. That is what lawyers tell me it means. If that be so, then the evident purpose of putting that term into this statement would be to confuse and to create suspicion; but there is no evidence in the testimony which justifies that insinuation.

> The agency of these men is so thoroughly established that Senator LORIMER could reap no reward by virtue of their wrongful action without being equally guilty and responsible for their wrongdoing. (Views of the minority, p. 111.)

Not his wrongdoing; not the singular, but the plural; not one, but both. There is not one scintilla of evidence, not the slightest charge in this record that Edward Shurtleff is guilty of wrongdoing. "Their wrongdoing." If there were one mistake, one insinuation, one innuendo in the minority views, I would be willing to say that I believe it was an error in language; but when the record is deliberately misstated, when wrongdoing is pointed to on the part of some man without a line in the record to justify it, then I am compelled to believe that it had no other purpose than to prejudice the judges sitting in this case.

Here is another statement—and oh, Senators, this is a vile insinuation, because it involves a man who is in no way connected with the case:

> Mr. Hines went directly to his bank, the Continental Commercial National Bank, and after a conference with the president of the bank—

Listen to this language—

> after a conference with the president of the bank, telephoned to Mr. LORIMER, and later telephoned again, to either Mr. LORIMER or some one else—

"Some one else"—mind that—"some one else"— > in Springfield interested in LORIMER'S election. * * *

> It is at least a remarkable coincidence that the election of Senator LORIMER, which had been doubtful up to that time, followed almost immediately after Hines's visit to his bank and his telephone message to Springfield.

Now, what is the purpose of that? Hines went to the bank, talked with the president, telephoned to Springfield, and LORIMER was elected immediately after that. What is the natural inference? That he went there, talked with the president, arranged for the money, called LORIMER, and later some one else, and then LORIMER was elected after the telephone message. What a vile thing that is. The president of that bank, the largest bank in Chicago, with the largest deposits of any bank in the United States, a man of the highest reputation, who was offered under this administration the position of Secretary of the Treasury and refused it, respected by every man in Chicago, not my friend, but always on the opposite side in politics, and yet it is insinuated that the bank president and Hines talked it over; the money was arranged for; he telephoned to Springfield to LORIMER and somebody else. It does not say who the "somebody else" was, but the testimony shows that the "somebody else" was Gov. Deneen. Gov. Deneen testified that he talked to Mr. Hines over the telephone that morning, and that Mr. Hines delivered a message to him that I asked him to stop off at Chicago and deliver to the governor, because, if he did not deliver it to him there, it would have been too late when he got to Springfield, for I would either be elected or defeated by that time.

Why was not the governor's name used. The expression "somebody else" was more suspicious. They knew the governor was not friendly to me on that day; they knew the governor's testimony in the record; and they knew that if they used his name his testimony would impeach the innuendo; and that is why it is put in that way in the views of the minority. There is no other explanation for it, and you are expected, Senators, to decide this case on that sort of information. You must depend upon these eight men constituting the committee. I know the general opinion of the people of the country is that every Senator and every Member of the House of Representatives examines thoroughly into every question that is brought up for disposal, but service here has demonstrated to me that that is absolutely impossible. We can not know all about everything, and there never was a question submitted to the Senate that involved so many different kinds of propositions and so voluminous a record as this. No man can understand the record unless he has devoted all of his time to an examination of it; and therefore you must depend upon the report of the committee and their statement as to the facts to guide your action and to make up your judgment in this case. If Senators on the committee will misstate the record, will deliberately insinuate that things have occurred that have not occurred, what hope, what chance have you to know the truth in this case?

The Senator from Indiana in his speech said that before he began to discuss the record he must set the stage—

> Before introducing the actors in this drama, we should attend to the proper setting of the scenery and the arrangements of the stage.

The stage, as everybody knows, is the realm of fancy, not of fact. He must show the condition in the country; show that we had an election; show that the Republicans had a small majority to pass Republican tariff bills; that the people of the country were all excited, and their eyes were on the Illinois Legislature, wondering whether they would send a protectionist, or at least what sort of man he would be and what sort of views he would have, coming from Illinois. When he got the stage all beautifully set, full of all sorts of scenery, when the observers set their eyes upon it after the curtain was raised, there were so many things to look at that did not affect the case that the audience did not see the act. I would not think of putting the construction that I do on that sort of statement but for the fact that the Senator's remarks are so full of that kind of matter.

Go to Illinois. The Senator said the Democrats wanted a Democrat or they wanted an "insurgent" Republican, because they were for Democratic or the "insurgent" Republican views.

The Senator does not know the Democrats in Illinois, and he does not know their views on the tariff question. There is probably no man in Illinois better acquainted with the people in all parts of the State than I am myself. Surely, no man in my time has ever been so close and so conversant with the Democrats of that State as I have been, and I make this statement, that if you put the question of tariff for revenue only or a protective tariff up to the Democrats in the State of Illinois, the third State in industry in the country, and a great agricultural State—if you put up to the Democrats a question involving nothing except a decision on the part of the Democrats in Illinois, whether they are for a tariff for revenue only or a protective tariff, I venture the statement that the majority of the men that never voted for anything but the Democrat ticket all their lives, down to and including William Jennings Bryan, will vote for a protective tariff. That is Illinois. It may not be the case in other States, but it is in Illinois.

But the main purpose of stating this case as it was stated, the so-called setting the stage, was the fear that somebody might call attention to the fact that one member of the minority, Senator LEA, was elected by Republican votes—32 Republicans and 34 Democrats—while LORIMER was elected by 53 Democrats and 55 Republicans, to try to make a reason for challenging the Illinois Democrats, and to make it impossible to charge that there was anything going on in the country that would impel Republicans to persist in voting for a Republican in Tennessee, when they knew that there was no possibility of electing a Republican, and knew that they could elect a Democrat that had helped them to disrupt the Democratic Party.

That is all there is to it—the setting of the stage—to cover up the LEA Republican votes, to cover up the Tennessee bipartisan combination, to make Senators forget it.

What are the facts in this case? Almost every Democrat that voted for LORIMER was LORIMER'S warm, close, personal friend. Almost every Republican that voted for Senator LEA was delivered to him by the leaders of the Republican organization of that State and did not vote for him for reasons of personal friendship, as was the case in my election. That is the record in the case. It can be the only purpose of putting the case in that way.

I quote from Senator KERN'S speech:

> There is direct evidence to the effect that John Broderick had told Holstlaw, "If you vote for LORIMER, there is $2,500 in it." There is evidence, further, that the $2,500 was Lorimer money.

Senators, there is not one word in the record that justifies this statement. It can not and it will not be shown that "there is evidence, further," that it "was Lorimer money."

What are you going to believe? How are you going to make up your minds? How are you to know how to vote on this question, if this is the statement made by a member of the committee and it is not true?

A little further on, Senator KERN says:

> I might observe here that this boy McCann, who was then perhaps 16 years old, and probably 18 years old when he testified—though I am not sure as to that—has been provided for. He has been given a place in the sheriff's office in Sangamon County, Ill., just as Robert E. Wilson, that notorious member who paid cut the jack-pot money at St. Louis, was, after his infamy was disclosed, given a lucrative position in the county clerk's office of Cook County, which he now holds. And Senator Jandus, the man who corroborated Broderick's testimony, which testimony is now conceded to be false, has been given a lucrative place in a county office in Cook County, which he now holds.

This is the point:

> It is the same method that was proposed, as I shall show later on, by Lee O'Neil Browne with Charles A. White in order to quiet him when he began to show signs of recalcitrancy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LORIMER. Certainly.

RECESS.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate take a recess until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.

At 2 o'clock p. m., on the expiration of the recess, the Senate reassembled.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

> Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, I wish to thank the Senate for the courtesy of the recess, as I was very much exhausted at the time it was taken and I now feel very much refreshed.

When I suspended my remarks I was just about to discuss a portion of the speech of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] and to call the attention of the Senate to this further insinuation, and probably—oh, yes; I will say—it is the most vile insinuation that has been made:

> I might observe here that this boy McCann, who was then perhaps 16 years old, and probably 18 when he testified—though I am not sure as to that—has been provided for. He has been given a place in the sheriff's office in Sangamon County, Ill., just as Robert E. Wilson, that notorious member who paid out the jack-pot money at St. Louis, was, after his infamy was disclosed, given a lucrative position in the county clerk's office of Cook County, which he now holds. And Senator Jandus, the man who corroborated Broderick's testimony, which testimony is now conceded to be false, has been given a lucrative place in a county office in Cook County, which he now holds. It shows a method in taking care of witnesses here. It is the same method that was proposed, as I shall show later on, by Lee O'Neil Browne with Charles A. White in order to quiet him when he began to show signs of recalcitrancy.

Mr. President, if the above statement means anything in connection with this case, it means that I have been suborning perjury. If that is the intent of the Senator from Indiana, I desire to characterize this statement in the only manner in which it can properly be characterized—a deliberately false statement. Suborning perjury is the insinuation; LORIMER the guilty man.

What are the facts? In the election of 1910 all the county officers—the sheriff, the county treasurer, the clerk of the probate court, the clerk of the criminal court, and the county commissioners—were elected, and every single one of them a Democrat, by all the way from 10,000 to 50,000 Democratic majority. Who were the men occupying the positions in those offices prior to that time? Many of them the best friends that LORIMER had, Republicans, had been employed in those offices all the way from 10 to 20 years. They were turned out almost to a man—I have no complaint as to that—and Democrats who were capable of filling the positions were put in their places. Jandus, a Bohemian, was appointed chief clerk of the probate clerk's office, a place that pays him $3,000 a year. The elected official is a Bohemian, and he wanted a man who was conversant with the law, and so he appointed Jandus chief clerk of the office. Bob Wilson was appointed to the county clerk's office on the recommendation of the Democratic organization of his own ward, and the testimony in this record proves it. Every one of those men was appointed to those offices because Democrats were elected; and they put their men in and put the Republicans out. What does that mean? That the Democrats who were elected to office were Lorimer men? Oh, no. If they were Lorimer men, surely the Lorimer Republicans would have stayed in the offices; but they walked the plank, and they have no complaint to make about it. Paul McCann lives in Springfield. I did not know he was employed in the sheriff's office of Sangamon County until he was called before the committee.

But that is a deliberate attempt by the Senator from Indiana to convey the impression to the Senate that LORIMER was suborning perjury, getting places for Democrats so as to close their mouths. Without any reference to this case at all, no matter how this case goes—and surely so if it goes in favor of LORIMER—that should be inquired into, because if he is capable of doing an act of that kind, he is not fit to sit in the Senate. I challenge the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] now or at any other time, to-day or to-morrow, to produce any sort of testimony anywhere that will justify that statement. Yet you are asked to form your opinions from the report of the minority and from such statements as to the facts in the case upon the floor of the Senate!

In this connection, let me call your attention to a further misstatement of the record and a further vile insinuation by the Senator from Indiana. Now, mark you, he said:

It is well enough in this connection, Mr. President, in dealing with the credibility of the testimony here to state that when Lee O'Neil Browne testified he gave the committee to understand that the amount of this contribution—

Referring to the money that LORIMER loaned Lee O'Neil Browne—was in the neighborhood of only about $1,500.

And then:

I am not going to comment on that testimony or the testimony of Senator LORIMER on that subject.

That statement, in effect, is that LORIMER said it was $10,000, or about that, and that Lee O'Neil Browne said it was $1,500, and it does not make any difference which way you take it, one of them was lying about it. He is not going to comment on the credibility of the testimony of men of that sort. That is the impression that it was evidently intended to make on the minds of Senators.

Now, let us see what the record shows with reference to that proposition:

Senator JONES. Did any special friend of Senator LORIMER assist you?
Mr. BROWNE. Not a one, and I did not ask one. In fact, I had not asked aside from that—yes, I did ask one other, Senator, but aside from that and one other I made no request.

Then, he goes on and testifies about the other:

Senator FLETCHER. Were those large amounts or comparatively small?

Referring to the money that he borrowed from others than LORIMER—and this is one particular individual whose name he asked the committee not to compel him to disclose, because it would be of no assistance to the committee. I myself know who the gentleman was.

Mr. BROWNE. I got $1,500 from him—

Referring to this man from whom he borrowed the money—

Senator FLETCHER. And the other amount?
Mr. BROWNE. I could not tell you now, Senator, how much, but a good deal more than that—

Referring to the money that he got from LORIMER—

The CHAIRMAN. From which one did you get $1,500?
Mr. BROWNE. From my friend.
Mr. MARBLE. The amount you say you can not tell is the one you got from Senator LORIMER?
Mr. BROWNE. Yes. I can not tell that amount.

That is the record. He states that he got $1,500 from his friend, and he says the money that he got from LORIMER was a larger amount. He testified to it here; and yet the Senator in his speech on the floor of the Senate a few days ago said that LORIMER testified it was $10,000 that he loaned Browne; that Lee O'Neil Browne said it was $1,500; and that he would not test the credibility of the testimony of either one of those men.

That is the sort of information you get from the minority of this committee. I challenge any one of the minority now and here to refute the statement that I have just made—any one of them—in the presence of the judges who must decide this case. Let us have it if it is the truth; and, if it is not, then let us denounce it as a misstatement of the record and a deliberate attempt to mislead the Senate.

His testimony shows—

Talking about the testimony of LORIMER—and this is also from the speech of the Senator from Indiana—

His testimony shows that by reason of this system of machine politics he was thrown in contact with the most vicious political elements of that city; that the spoils were distributed not only to Republicans, but that official favors were granted to Democrats who would serve him and the interests of his party; that he maintained friendly, and in some cases intimate, relationships, personal as well as political, with such notorious characters as "Hinky Dink" Kenna, the now discredited John Broderick, Manny Abrahams, Cyril Jandus, and many others.

When the Senator made that statement on the floor of the Senate, referring to Kenna and Broderick, he included the statement:

Both of whom are saloon keepers.

Why it was stricken from his speech I can not tell; whether or not it was because he was chasing a ghost at Baltimore and was afraid to go before the saloon keepers of the country as denouncing them because they were saloon keepers I can not tell. He will have to explain that; but the fact is that he did say it, and it is stricken from the speech.

Yes, I have known John Broderick since long before he kept a saloon, and "Hinky Dink" Kenna since we were children, when we played together and when we worked together. Then we nicknamed him "Hinky Dink." That was when Chicago had 2,000,000 less population than it has to-day and when the greatest distance from one city limit to the other was 3 miles, instead of about 30, as it is to-day. Our chums and playmates of those days are engaged in all sorts of business—some saloon keepers, some leading merchants, some leading physicians, some leading lawyers, some judges, some clergymen, some small merchants, some mechanics, some laboring men, and some have fallen from grace—but he who is the most successful meets and greets him who is the least successful in the same cordial way as in the days of yore, ready always to extend a helping hand. No man in our city has reached out and lifted up more fallen and helped them on the road to a better life and prosperity and greater happiness than Michael Kenna.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the fact that it is written that charity covers a multitude of sins, and to suggest to him when on that great judgment day the recorder shall open the great book of records to set off the bad deeds with the good to see to it that he may have marked up behind his name as many marks for treating "thy neighbor as thyself," and "doing unto others as ye would be done by," as will be found behind the name of this man whom he so much despises, "Hinky Dink" Kenna.

Oh, yes! It is all right to slur. It is all right, by innuendo and insinuation, to denounce. It is easy enough to pull down. But let us all see to it that when the record is made up we have more marks for building up and lifting up than we have for tearing down and destroying. And the Senator from Indiana may profitably learn from Michael Kenna on that question.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LORIMER. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. I will ask the Senator to allow me to suggest that there is not a word or a line in this record reflecting in any way, shape, or form upon this man Kenna, or in any way connecting him with the election of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LORIMER. The Senator from Indiana just deliberately went outside of the record to find somebody who was a friend of LORIMER, or had been in his boyhood days, whom he might assail, without reason and without cause. That gives the Senate an idea of the character of the information it has received from the minority of the committee and from Senator KERN in his statement on the floor of the Senate.

He desired to stand by those who had been his friends—in times of stress and storm, and followed them into the current of political wrongdoing.

Referring to LORIMER—

Now, we have the question brought right up to us—LORIMER charged by this Senator upon the floor of the Senate with political wrongdoing. That is his language. I have added nothing to it; I have taken nothing from it. It is as you will find it in his speech.

Mr. President, I claim to be no different than any other man. I am subject to all the weaknesses of the human family. I expect to be called upon to account for my share of sin in the Kingdom Come. Oh, yes! I am only as other men are; and there is none of us different, except in degree. And so I claim for myself nothing more than I am willing to accord to every living soul on the earth. But here and now I challenge the Senator from Indiana to point out to the Senate anything in this record, anything that he knows, anything that he has ever heard, anything that anybody ever told him, that will point—no! I will not close it there. I will open it wider. It shall be broader than that. Let him point to anything—and let him, though, make good—to any wrongdoing, either in private, in commercial, in financial, or in political life. And if he will do it here and now, Senators, I will not embarrass you with voting on my case. When he has done it, I will walk out of yonder door and never seek to return. Come on, Senator KERN—you who have slimed and smeared this record all over with suspicion—come here now and make good, and I will keep my word.

[After a pause:]

The Senator saw fit to quote a statement that I made in proof of the statement that he made that I did not understand American ideals, that I had been raised in such a way that I had not been able to learn the human family, and to come to any kind of a sensible conclusion of what American institutions stand for. He asked me some question as to whether the people were not to be consulted. He says, in support of his views, that LORIMER answered—and this is correct:

> Oh, yes. That is the way men talk who reach the clouds, you know, when they are making that kind of a speech—that the voters are the men that they are responsible to. Of course they are, but voters are human beings.

I said that. When I said "that is the way men talk who reach the clouds" I had something in mind. I had in mind that the Senator was sitting in front of me and that he was interrogating me. I had in mind that at the first meeting of the committee that I attended, when my counsel asked that the names of the witnesses be submitted to him, Senator KERN protested in an undertone that does not appear in the RECORD. Just think of it. Senator KERN, a United States Senator—not only that, a lawyer—mumbling: "No, no, no; don't give him the names of the witnesses."

Who ever heard of such a proceeding as that—a lawyer doing that? A layman who does not understand the rules of procedure might do that and might be excused for it, but no lawyer can be excused for such an act.

Then I had in mind that he had attended about 80 per cent of the committee meetings, and his name is registered there, and then I had in mind that he was there only about 50 per cent of that 80 per cent of time. Then I had in mind that he had not asked one question during the whole hearing that tended to elicit the truth; that all his inquiry was along the lines of trying to muddle the record. Then I had in mind what this righteous man once stated, or what purports to have been stated by him:

> It is a matter of great regret that under the cloak of the secret ballot so many Representatives were able to defy the will of their constituents. The secret ballots made possible not only these betrayals, but all sorts of treachery, double-dealing, and corrupt practices. I believe that thoughtful people will find in the scenes of the last two days additional strong argument in favor of the election of United States Senators by direct vote of the people. I do not care at this time to discuss in detail the causes which contributed to the result. (Indianapolis Star, Jan. 15, 1909, p. 1, col. 7.)

Mr. President, I had that in mind. I had in mind, further, that if the Senator made that statement, I have never heard him denounce it as false. I had in mind, further, that if he made that statement, he never rose in his place in this Chamber and said that it was not the truth. I had in mind, further, that the man whose seat he charges in that language with having been secured by corrupt practices was a candidate for the leadership on the Democratic side of this Chamber. I further have in mind that Senator KERN supported him.

Because he made that charge against his colleague, it makes no impression on me. I never knew a character of his sort who was a good loser; and seldom are they willing to attribute the success of their opponents to anything but unfair dealing. Until it is proven, I will never believe, after reading the views of the minority that he signed, and the statements that he made in his speech on this case, that there is a word of truth in it. I had those things in mind when I sat and looked at the Senator asking these questions—all those things. And I had in mind—oh, yes—that he had never introduced a resolution for an investigation, but has since allowed the blot to remain upon the escutcheon of his State and the title of his colleague. And as he sat there before me with assumed self-righteousness and an expression of "more holy than thou" on his countenance, then was I reminded of the Pharisee in the parable, with his hands reaching to the high heaven in prayer:

> God, I thank Thee that I am not as other men are, * * * even as this publican.

That is what I had in mind, Mr. President, when I said: "Yes; men reach to the clouds."

Now, Mr. President, I am not going into the detail of the Funk testimony, but some Senators here seem to have the impression that Mr. Funk is a very much abused man. Some Senators here state that Mr. Funk is a very honorable man and that he would do no wrong, and during the discussion of the question as to whether or not a committee should be appointed to reinvestigate this case, it was stated by a Senator on the floor that there was convincing proof that Edward Hines went to Funk and asked him for $10,000. He asked him he said on the 27th day of May, 1909. But after February 15, 1911, he went to Mr. Funk to ask him to hush it up, to tell him he wanted to talk with him about it, that he was afraid he might have gotten a wrong impression, that he might have thought he was asking him to get money for LORIMER'S election. That was the corroborative circumstance; that was the proof; and the Senator said that is the most common way that crooks cover up their tracks. It was convincing and conclusive to him, and he believed the story for that reason.

What does Funk testify to? Funk testified that Hines came to him on the 27th of May, 1909, and said to him: "We put LORIMER over at Springfield. It cost us a hundred thousand dollars, and we had to do it quick, so a few of us put up the money." Now, they had to do it quick; they were in a hurry; the men would not perform until the money was given to them. That must be the natural deduction from Hines's statement, if he made such a statement, and if he was telling the truth. So the money was paid then, before LORIMER was elected, because it was the 27th day of May, 1909, and LORIMER was elected the day previous, and if they had to do it quick and put up the money then, the money was up.

The legislature was in Springfield at that time. LORIMER was elected on the 26th. The legislature adjourned on the 4th day of June, and it was there continuously from the 26th day of May until the 4th day of June. Now, the money was up. LORIMER'S election had been paid for. A hundred thousand dollars had been given. A few men had to put it up and had to put it up in a hurry. Then what do we find them trying to prove? That the money was paid to these men, one of them in Chicago on the 18th day of June; the others in St. Louis on the 21st day of June.

Now, let us take the reasonable view of this proposition. If the money was put up before LORIMER was elected, why not pay them then? If they would not vote until they got their money, they must have paid them then. They were all in Springfield all this time—all the members of the legislature. There was a full meeting of both houses every day. Why defer it until the legislature adjourned and take them all the way down to St. Louis, calling them together from all parts of the State, or take them up to Chicago, as White says he was taken, all the way from East St. Louis to get his money? Why not pay them in the most convenient place, where there was the least suspicion? Do those things coincide in the record?

They got the money before LORIMER was elected, and whoever got it kept it for pretty nearly a month before he delivered it. He carried it around with him; he had it in his pocket or in a belt; he had it in a safe-deposit vault; he had it somewhere; but he did not pay until after the legislature adjourned.

Does that harmonize? Does that look right? Do you think if they were demanding their pay that those Democrats who voted for LORIMER, who were insisting upon having their money, or the Republicans who voted for LORIMER and insisted upon having their money before they voted, and Hines and a few other fellows had to put it up, would wait until the legislature adjourned? Would they wait until everybody went home and then be called in from all parts of the State—from long distances—to be paid the money that they might have been paid in the city of Springfield a month prior?

Now, did Edward Hines go to Funk's office as Funk stated about the time, two days, he said, or three days, it may be, he was not sure as to the number of days, but sure it was about two or three days after the editorial was published in the Record-Herald, and it was published on the 15th day of February, 1911. The record shows conclusively that Edward Hines was not in Chicago at or about that time. The record shows conclusively that Hines was in the city of Washington from about the 7th day of February until, as I know, the 4th day of March. Never before was such a lot of corroborative testimony presented anywhere as that which proved that Edward Hines was in Washington. For myself, I would not testify that he was here on the 7th or 8th day of February, but I did testify that he was here on and after the 12th day of February excepting one day, one night, when he was in the city of New York. The reason why I know he was here all that time, I testified, was that on the 12th day of that month Senator BAILEY made the first portion of his speech, and I know that he was here from that day until the 4th day of March. I had been home on account of sickness. When I returned Mr. Hines was going to Rainy Lake or Virginia City to attend a meeting of his board of directors. His wife came and talked with me and told me that Edward was sick; she did not want him to make the trip; she was afraid of it. I talked it over with him and I persuaded him to call off his meeting arranged for the 15th of February.

Then he was going to New York on the 16th day of February or the 15th day of February on a business trip that he testified to. He was very poorly at that time, and I told him that he should not go to New York, that I was afraid if he should go on the night train to New York he was much in danger of having pneumonia. I persuaded him to stay over until the next day. The next day he went to New York at night. He was at my room in the Raleigh Hotel at 11 o'clock talking to me. He took the train at 12 o'clock and went to New York. The next afternoon he called me upon the telephone from New York City and that night at 9 o'clock he walked into my room. That was on the 17th of February, and he appeared here every single day, and he went home with me on the train accompanied by his wife on the 4th day of March, and we arrived in Chicago on the 5th day of March.

But I am telling you only what I know about it myself. I do not ask you to take my word, but to read the record, and see if you can arrive at any other conclusion but that Edward Hines was in Washington except the time that he went to New York, every single night, and that was only one night on the train going to New York.

Now, if this corroboration is to strengthen and buttress and build up Funk's story there is nothing to that. There is no chance to believe it if you take the record. Nobody reading the record would ever arrive at that conclusion.

I said I would not go into details of it, because it has been discussed by the majority of the committee, but I want to call your attention to another fact, and only a portion of it is disclosed by the record. Mr. Funk testified on the stand that the corporation of which he is general manager never made contributions to any campaign, to individuals, or to parties. His statement was that broad; it covered everything. He said that they never gave any money. He was asked if he ever personally made any contribution, and he said, "Oh, yes; sometimes I have given $5, sometimes I have given $25. One time I gave $100, and that man was beaten, and I thought I was a poor guesser and let it go at that."

Now, you have only my statement for this, but I state it to you on my honor as a man and as a Senator, and if you have another investigation I will convince the committee and give the committee the names. This is as true as every word that I uttered here on the 22d day of February, 1911, which I have sworn to since and which is now in the record, and that has been corroborated, much of it, by the testimony of Gov. Deneen.

I met two men, prominent men in politics in Illinois, one a Democrat and the other a Republican. The Democrat I met only a few days ago. I met them both on a train on the Pennsylvania Railroad. We were discussing the Funk testimony. The Republican said, "LORIMER, I could not believe Funk's testimony, and the reason why I can not believe it is because he said that his company or he never contributed to anything or anybody in politics. Well," he said, "I know that is not so because he has contributed several times, and I received the money, for campaign purposes."

The Democrat came down on the train with me. It was before the Democratic convention, and he was on his road to Baltimore. He said, "LORIMER, the reason why I did not believe Funk's story was because he testified that his company or he did not contribute to campaign funds, and it is only a short time ago since I went to him and he gave me a contribution of $5,000 for the campaign of the Democratic Party."

Now, I say that is only a statement from me, and if I am the kind of a man the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] would have you believe me to be, if you think as he thinks, you will not accept my word. But if it be true that Funk did give this money to the Republican and to the Democrat, then he deliberately committed perjury. Why commit perjury? It made no difference whether the International Harvester Co. contributed to Democratic or Republican campaign funds; at least there was nothing criminal about it, and when he was under oath and asked the question you would think that he would at least tell the truth and not perjure his soul when it did not make any difference whether he told it or not. At least that is the opinion that I hold. That is what I think about it.

I sat and listened to Mr. Funk testify, and so without the information that I have I could not say, and I would not have said until this testimony was given, that Mr. Funk was anything but an honorable, straightforward, truthful man. But with this staring me in the face, facts of which I had knowledge myself, I can not be brought to believe that an honorable man would perjure his soul. It does not make any difference as a matter of law, but it makes a difference as a matter of truth, and it will count against him as much as if he could have been sent to the penitentiary for making the false statement.

With that in mind, without any of the other testimony that was produced to prove that Edward Hines was not in Chicago anywhere around the 15th of February, I take Mr. Hines's testimony against Mr. Funk's.

But now, Senators, suppose we take the Funk story in all that it is. He says he gave no money. He said that they were not in that kind of business. No money was paid to Hines. So what we have is the statement of Mr. Funk that Mr. Hines told him that they had to put up a hundred thousand dollars, had to put it up quick, had to put it up before the election, and then LORIMER was elected. That was the deduction, and nobody can make any other logical deduction from that statement.

That is the evidence we have that there was $100,000 put up, and that is all. Nobody has ever said that that money, $100,000, was paid out to anybody for anything in connection with LORIMER's election. Hines testified that he never put up a dollar for LORIMER in his life. LORIMER testified that Hines never did. LORIMER testified that Hines had lived in his district for years and that he thought Mr. Hines would have contributed to his campaign if he had allowed him to do it, but that he did not allow anybody to contribute to his campaign; he paid his own expenses. That is the testimony that is in the record.

Now, Hines, and the record will show it, was no bosom friend of LORIMER. He lived in my district. He called upon me as a Member of Congress to aid in things that I should do as a Member of Congress; for instance, to go to Gulfport, Miss., to view an improvement being made by the Federal Government to determine whether, in my opinion, the Federal Government should take over the improvement or not. Mr. Hines did not own it. He had not a cent's worth of interest in it. I went there; and I did other things in the years that I have known him like that, as a public official, but he never called at my house. His family and my family were not intimate. We were not friends in the sense of the word that we were associates or that we attended the same club or that we had any sort of social intercourse.

I think I would state it truthfully if I said that I have not seen Mr. Hines more than once in one or two years since I have known him.

There is the Funk story, and there is the Hines story. If what Mr. Funk said was true, that Hines did ask him for the money, and he did tell him what Funk says he told him, still there is no evidence that Mr. Hines or anybody else ever collected a dollar or paid it to get votes for LORIMER. In the views of the minority it is insinuated that he went to his bank, and as soon as he talked to the president he telephoned quick to Springfield, and then it was all over. LORIMER was elected.

The auditors for your committee examined the bank account. Does anybody think that you can go to a president of a national bank—now just stop and think of it for a minute—that you can go to a president of a national bank and make arrangements and take out at any time $100,000 without the bank having a record of it, or the president or somebody else connected with the bank making a record of it? When the money goes into a bank there is a record made of it, and every single night the cashier has to account for every dollar that the record shows is in the bank; and if they find an error has been made, then the tellers and the bookkeepers must remain there after hours and work the mistake out. I have seen the boys in our bank work all night to discover an error. The idea that you can go to a bank, grab a hundred thousand dollars out of the vault, and run away with it without making a record will not appeal to anybody who has the slightest idea about banking business.

The record of the bank was examined into by the experts appointed by your committee. They reported that they examined every single account, not only in that bank, but in every bank, that Edward Hines had any business with, and reported that they did not find that he had paid out any money for LORIMER's election. Edward Hines made good with a record for every single dollar that had been drawn out of any bank anywhere in the country with which he had business. He proved every check by a voucher, and every voucher was followed until the experts were satisfied that the money was used for the purpose the voucher indicated.

Now, there is the testimony of Mr. Funk. Let me ask the lawyers here, if a poor criminal that had a record so black that nothing would make it white, or even put a white spot on it, and he was being tried on that kind of testimony—I am now asking the lawyers—should he be convicted on that testimony? Would you consider that sort of testimony, even admitting that it was true? Would you consider it when you were making up your judgment? That is all there is.

Funk did not care as to what he testified. His tongue seemed to be hung in the middle, and it ran at both ends at the same time. He testified that Edward Hines was at Springfield; that it was common gossip; that the newspapers were full of it; and that he was down there pulling wires to elect LORIMER—not in Chicago or in Washington, but in Springfield—and all the evidence tends to show that Hines was not in Springfield, that he had not been there for three years prior and not until two years later, when he was subpœnaed by the Helm committee.

I am not calling your attention to any sort of feeling that Mr. Funk had against LORIMER. I am not basing this on any feeling that existed between LORIMER and Funk or Funk and LORIMER. My statement is based on nothing but the record, and any Senator who will look into the record will find it just exactly as I have stated it. If that is not so, then I will stop discussing the question for the reason that I am not familiar with the record.

As to Representative Beckemeyer, the Democrat, I am not going into the impeaching testimony in that case, because it has been thoroughly discussed by the members of the committee, except to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the minority views state that there was nothing in the charge of the third degree. They say that Mr. Burke and Mr. Wayman both testified that there was no third-degree methods employed by either of them. Beckemeyer was brought to Chicago by subpœna, he testifies, when before the grand jury on the first occasion. I think he said there he was not in St. Louis. Then he was taken out of the room and an indictment was found against him for stating that he was not in St. Louis. That is all that they asked him. That is all he stated. I am not a lawyer, so I am going to ask any lawyer present if that was all he was asked and all that he stated, could he be sent to the penitentiary if he had been put on trial? Will any lawyer say that he could? Why, then, was he indicted? He was indicted to intimidate him. After that he was put in the custody of an officer of the State attorney's office, who was told to take him out "and to treat him right." The officer, when he was on the stand, testified that he knew what that meant—to get him drunk. They stopped in a saloon just across the street and they had some drinks. They went to the Hotel Kaiserhof, at Van Buren Street, about a mile from the court, and got something to eat and some beer there. When they returned Beckemeyer went before the grand jury again. He testified that he got a thousand dollars at the Southern Hotel; that he called on the clerk; that the clerk handed him an envelope with a thousand dollars in it, and that he did not know what it was for, but that he took it and went away.

Then, what happened? Officer Keeley took him out again; took him to a club and bought drinks for him there. Then they went to a number of places and bought drinks. They seemed to be drinking all the time. They went to the theater, and he was so drunk he had to go outside because he was sick in the theater. They then went to the Grand Pacific Hotel, and then asked him to go out for the night. He says himself that he was so drunk that after they took him to a house of ill fame, from that time on he did not remember anything until the next morning, when he wanted to go back to the State attorney's office to learn what he had sworn to the day before, and he did. He then testified that he got $1,000 from Lee O'Neil Browne, but he did not claim at that time that anything was said about the thousand dollars being Lorimer money. That was the last time that he was before the grand jury. When he went on the stand he said that Browne gave him the thousand dollars, and said "Here is your Lorimer money."

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. LORIMER. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He never testified to that before the grand jury.

Mr. LORIMER. I said when he went on the stand. I meant to say in the trial of Lee O'Neil Browne. I omitted to state that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That may have been, but before the grand jury he never testified to that remark.

Mr. LORIMER. He never testified to that remark before the grand jury, but the State's attorney, Mr. Wayman, says that, after he came out of the grand jury, he told him that when Browne handed him the money he said: "Here is your Lorimer money."

Now, I should like to ask the judgment of Senators on this proposition. Lee O'Neil Browne was Beckemeyer's friend. He said so on the stand. Beckemeyer liked Lee O'Neil Browne. LORIMER was nothing to him. He testified on the stand that he did not intend to vote for LORIMER until George Alschuler, his seat mate, pleaded with him, and said to him, "You promised me all winter long that whenever the time came that Hopkins could be beaten, you would vote for the man, no matter whether or not he was a Republican, who could beat him." The substance of what he said to him was, "I want you to keep your word;" and a short time before the roll was called, he said he told George Alschuler that he would vote for LORIMER; and the record will show, if Senators will investigate it, that Beckemeyer voted for LORIMER, not because Browne got him to vote for him, but because George Alschuler, who had devoted the whole session to trying to beat Hopkins, had pledged him to vote for anybody to beat Hopkins; Beckemeyer kept his word with Alschuler; as he testified time and again, everywhere, in court and before committees, in every imaginable way that the question could be put to him, that, when he voted for LORIMER, nobody prior to that time or subsequent to that time had told him that he would get a dollar for voting for LORIMER, and he testified over and over again, everywhere, in the Browne trials and twice before the Senate committee, that he never had any hope of reward for casting his vote for LORIMER or after he had cast that vote.

That is Beckemeyer's testimony. No member of the minority will dispute that; and yet in their report they say there was no third degree. He was taken out by an officer and was "mellowed up," and he came back and testified again. Then, he testified that his friend, Lee O'Neil Browne gave him the money, but he did not testify that it was given to him for his LORIMER vote.

What I want to ask Senators is this: Why should Beckemeyer shield LORIMER and destroy his friend Lee O'Neil Browne? What is the logic of that? Can some Senator point out the logic of that position to me? He testified that Browne gave him the money, and he involved Browne; but he failed to say that when Browne did give it to him, he said, "Here is your Lorimer money," thus protecting a man that he had no association with, that he had no such friendship for as he had for Browne. Why should he protect me? The facts are that the poor, weak man, as he stated, had a sick wife in the hospital. He could drink and go home; he might even accept a bribe and go home; but he felt that if it ever came out that he spent in a house of ill repute the whole livelong night, and that got to his wife, it might have serious results. If any man who had a good wife at home and children that he loved were guilty of such an act, even though he had been unfaithful to them, and it was held up to him that this information would be taken home to the good wife and that his children would learn of it, oh, what would a weak man do under those conditions? No man could imagine the position that that man was in or his state of mind if he had not at some time been in the same position himself; and so I do not expect Senators to imagine what this man's state of mind was; but, oh, what would your state of mind be if you had been found desecrating your own home, stopping all night in a house of ill fame, and the news were to be taken home to your good wife and your lovely children? That is hard to imagine.

If that, Senators, is not "the third degree," what is it? What is "the third degree"? I do not know the real definition of the term, but the impression I have of it, and the average impression is, that it is doing something to a man to make him talk. And they made Beckemeyer talk. Beckemeyer never told anybody that Browne said, "Here is your Lorimer money." Beckemeyer never testified that Browne said, "Here is your Lorimer money," until they gave him the "third degree." Beckemeyer's testimony was of very little value unless they could connect it with LORIMER's election, because they were not searching out corruption; they were not trying to send men to the penitentiary who had been guilty of corrupting members of the legislature. Oh, no; that was not the campaign they were carrying on; they were carrying on a campaign to destroy LORIMER; and if Lee O'Neil Browne had testified as Beckemeyer testified, or substantially so, and had said, "Yes; I did give Beckemeyer the money, and it was given to me by somebody else to give to Beckemeyer," and that he got his part of it and that this somebody else was the man who was responsible for handing around the money, Lee O'Neil Browne never would have been put on trial. Corruption was not what they were seeking; they wanted to get rid of LORIMER, and any man who would connect LORIMER with the matter, even in the remotest degree, could have immunity. You have not read all this testimony, but you have heard about all the corruption in the Illinois Legislature, about all sorts of things, and the names of men connected with it, but not one single man has been put on trial for a corrupt vote in the legislature except where it involved LORIMER.

When the Browne case was over all these cases were nollied. There has not been a single member of the Illinois General Assembly put on trial for corruptly casting any vote on any proposition. We have Beckemeyer with "Here's your Lorimer money." That was the final price of immunity, to save himself, though I think not so much from disgrace with the public as from trouble at home. Beckemeyer was willing to do anything that would secure for him immunity. That is all there is in the Beckemeyer story.

Now, for Holstlaw. What happened to Holstlaw? Did they work the third degree on Holstlaw? Let us see what the record shows. Holstlaw was a senator. He had been to Baltimore to a church convention, and on his way home was summoned before the grand jury in Springfield, Ill. The State's attorney took him before the grand jury and inquired of him if he had made an appointment or solicited an appointment at a certain time with a furniture agent of the name of Johnson, and the senator said, "No." The State's attorney said, "That is all"; and took him out of the room. That is the only question Holstlaw was asked; that is all that was inquired into. In 10 minutes Holstlaw was indicted. For what? Will any lawyer say he could have been convicted on an indictment of that kind—for testifying that he had not solicited an appointment not in connection with anything else, not to prove that something else that he had said was false, but, "did you write a letter?" He was indicted within 10 minutes. The sheriff took him into custody.

The sheriff said to him, "You are in a bad box." That is the substance of the statement. I am not attempting to give the exact language—"and you had better get a lawyer." Holstlaw consulted him about a lawyer, and the sheriff recommended the firm of Gillespie & Fitzgerald. Gillespie and Fitzgerald came over to his hotel that night. But I am getting ahead of my story.

Holstlaw sent the sheriff to tell Mr. Burke, the State's attorney, that he wanted to go back before the grand jury and change his testimony; that he had forgotten about writing the letter, but now he remembered that he did write a letter soliciting an appointment, and he wanted to go back and change his testimony on that point. Now, what did the State's attorney say? "Tell him I will not let him come back and change his testimony or go before the grand jury unless he will tell all about the Lorimer deal." There was nothing about the Lorimer deal in connection with the Johnson letter. That referred to a furniture deal—furniture to equip the legislative halls. Holstlaw was one of a committee appointed by the legislature to buy the furniture. He was not taken to Springfield on anything, so far as could be observed from the testimony, except the furniture deal. But when they got him on the letter and the sheriff told him he was in a bad box and that he had better get a lawyer, and Holstlaw asked permission to go back to change his testimony, the State's attorney said, "No; he can not come here unless he tells all about the Lorimer deal." Then he said he did not know anything about any Lorimer deal, and upon the sheriff's advice he got these lawyers.

They came and talked to him that night and asked him to their office the next morning. These were lawyers—real lawyers—men in the active practice every single day; they knew the law; and if they knew anything they knew that Holstlaw could not have been convicted for testifying as to that letter, because it did not mean anything, it did not pretend to be anything, it did not refer to anything.

They were supposed to be his lawyers. If they had been doing their duty to their client under their oath they would have told Mr. Holstlaw, "Well, we are sorry you have been indicted, but the best thing for you to do is to give a bond, then when the State's attorney calls the case, we will try it, because you have not committed any offense against the law, and they can not convict you, and they can not put you in jail on this charge." But did they do that? Oh, no. They took him over into their office, and they led him to believe that he was in a bad boat. They went over and saw the State's attorney. They made three trips over there, seeming to be greatly interested, making strenuous efforts to help Holstlaw out. They had to go three times to the State's attorney's office. Finally they came back and told Holstlaw, "If you will make a statement about the Lorimer deal, we can get you immunity on the indictment." And so Holstlaw sat down and made a statement to the effect that he met John Broderick the night before the election, and Broderick said to him, "We are going to put LORIMER over to-morrow," or something to that effect; that is the substance of it at any rate; and Holstlaw said, "Yes; and I am going to vote for him, too"; and then he said that Broderick said to him, "There is twenty-five hundred dollars for you."

Now, who are these lawyers? I am going to call attention to but one of them—Gillespie. He is the man, he testified, who drew the Holstlaw statement. He is a prominent lawyer in Springfield, and an able man at the law, at least such is his reputation. I do not know anything about him personally. When he was on the stand Judge Hanecy asked him if he was employed by the Tribune, and he said "no." Then the judge asked him this further question:

And did you not tell Judge Monroe that you were retained by the Chicago Tribune in those matters?
Mr. GILLESPIE—

This is Holstlaw's attorney—

No, sir.
Mr. HANECY. Did you ever tell anybody else that?
Mr. GILLESPIE. No, sir.

Who is Judge Monroe? Judge Monroe is a prominent lawyer in Springfield, and a man of good reputation. I am not very well acquainted with him, but I know of his reputation. He is a warm, close personal friend of the lawyer Gillespie, and they handle many cases together. There is no animosity between them.

Judge Monroe was put on the stand. Now, let me give you Judge Monroe's testimony:

Mr. MONROE. The conversation came about by Mr. Gillespie asking me if I was getting any business out of these bribery cases. In answer to that I told him that I was not. I said: "Are you getting any of it?" He said that he was getting into it, or something like that; that was the expression, that he was getting into the business.

Now, mark what Judge Monroe said:

I said, "How did you get in?" He said he got in for the Chicago Tribune through Gov. Deneen.

This is Holstlaw's lawyer. Judge Monroe said that Gillespie told him he got in for the Chicago Tribune through Gov. Deneen.

I said, "How did you come to get in that way?" He said—

Now, listen to this—the attorney for the Tribune—

He said that he had taken Mr. Holstlaw's confession, and that was about all that was said about it.

That was the testimony of his friend Judge Monroe, a man that practiced with him and worked with him, a close, bosom friend of his, when he was put on the stand.

Judge Monroe wrote a letter here that I received last March, a year ago, or I think the latter part of February, stating to me the substance of what I have stated here, and saying that I might show it to Senators if I chose. He said he did not want to have it put in the record, because Gillespie was his friend; but if it would help any to show it to Senators I might use it in that way. He was summoned before the committee. I showed the letter only to one Senator, or probably two, and that was after the vote was taken in my case. That is my recollection of it.

It does not stop there, Senators. You recall that Gillespie testified before your committee that he had never told this to anybody. When he was asked about Judge Monroe, he said:

No, sir.
Did you ever tell anybody else that?
No, sir.

Here is the testimony of W. H. Dillman:

Mr. DILLMAN. Mr. Gillespie said that he represented a Chicago paper. * * * The Chicago Tribune, the paper that was fighting Mr. LORIMER. * * * He was referring to the scandal that had come out; that he had gotten employment as a lawyer; and that Mr. Holstlaw had made his confession to him. * * * He said he was just employed by this Chicago paper.
Mr. HANECY. The Chicago Tribune?
Mr. DILLMAN. Yes, sir; to get evidence along that line.

That is what Mr. Dillman testified.

Who is Mr. Dillman? He is a lawyer and a banker, as far as I know a man of very high reputation, and a warm, close, personal friend of Mr. Gillespie and Mr. Gillespie's client.

And that is not all. The morning before Judge Monroe and Mr. Dillman went on the stand they came into my office in the Senate Office Building and they asked me for God's sake to see the chairman of the committee, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and ask him to excuse them, because if they went on the stand they would have to testify, as they did thereafter testify, that Gillespie was their warm, close, personal friend, and if they should testify, as they would testify if called, proceedings would be instituted against Mr. Gillespie for disbarment, and he would be disbarred. And because they were his warm, close, personal friends they did not want to be put in the position of bringing about the disbarment of Mr. Gillespie. They were both lawyers, and they knew what the consequences would be if Gillespie was ever taken before the Supreme Court on the testimony they would be compelled to give.

Now, Holstlaw did not testify before the grand jury that his statement was correct. He just signed it, when the immunity was given to him for perjury for saying that he had not written a letter to Mr. Johnson. Mr. Holstlaw has testified in season and out of season that when he voted for LORIMER he voted for him without any hope of reward; that he had told his friends and his neighbors, Democrats and Republicans, weeks before

LORIMER was a candidate. It amounted to a statement that before LORIMER was generally talked about as a candidate he had made up his mind that if he ever got an opportunity he was going to vote for LORIMER for United States Senator, and that all the people he talked with, Democrats and Republicans, told him it was the right thing to do, except one Democrat, who told him he thought he would be making a mistake. Now, I do not care whether the Democrat told him he was making a mistake or not, the facts are that the Democrat was urging him not to do it, and he told him he was going to do it. Holstlaw says John Broderick talked with him the night before LORIMER was elected, and he told Broderick he was going to do it. All this testimony is in the record here.

Holstlaw testified, as the record shows, that he went to Gillespie. Gillespie prepared the statement, Holstlaw signed it, and he got immunity after he signed it, and on the stand he swore that he would have done almost anything to go home a free man—anything to go home a free man. He said that when he got the money Broderick handed it to him. He was asked if Broderick told him what the money was for, and he said, "No." He did not say it was Lorimer money; he did not testify that he got it for his vote for LORIMER. He said that Broderick did not tell him anything about it. If you were a juror and trying Broderick, would you have convicted Broderick on that sort of testimony? Knowing all the facts, Holstlaw's lawyer, who knew the law, would have told him that the indictment was not worth the paper it was written on, if he had been acting solely in the interest of Holstlaw, but the fact is that Gillespie was in the employ of the Chicago Tribune at the time that he wrote Holstlaw's statement, that he got his employment from the Chicago Tribune through Gov. Deneen, that he went back and forth three times to the State's attorney's office trying to make Holstlaw think it was a hard thing to get freedom for him, and finally Holstlaw made the statement. No kind of inquiry could make Holstlaw say that he voted for LORIMER because he was promised money; that he voted for LORIMER with the hope of any kind of reward. All the testimony shows that Holstlaw told the people in his own district time and time again, long before LORIMER became a candidate, that if ever he got a chance to vote for him he would, and they agreed, all but one, that it was the right thing to do.

When John Broderick said to him, "We are going to put LORIMER over to-morrow," he told John Broderick, "I think we are." Mark you that statement; this is his sworn testimony. "I think we are, and I am going to vote for him." Broderick had not offered him any money; he had not indicated that he was going to offer him any money. Holstlaw testified that Broderick did not even ask him to vote for LORIMER, but Holstlaw told him that he was going to vote for LORIMER, and Holstlaw said that Broderick said, "There is $2,500 for you."

When you consider Gillespie, when you consider the statement, or the indictment that was not worth the paper it was written on, when you consider that the State's attorney sent word to him that he would not let him correct his testimony unless he came in and told about the LORIMER deal, will you believe that he was not coerced? Will you believe that he did not add those few words because his lawyer wanted it that way and told him that was the only way he could get out of the indictment for perjury? Will you believe that Holstlaw was not third degreed?

The four cases that I have discussed here are the four alleged confessors—the men who, it is claimed, were bought to vote for LORIMER. Not one of them except Charley White testified that he was ever offered anything for his vote for LORIMER. Beckemeyer said he had no idea that he would ever get any reward; that he voted for LORIMER because George Alschuler pleaded with him to so vote; and he did not make up his mind to do so until a few minutes before he did vote. Link said he himself had promised LORIMER; that he was LORIMER's friend; that the people of his district were for LORIMER, and were for him because they thought LORIMER was trying to bring about an improvement of the Mississippi River that would be of more value to Madison County, where he lived, than any other thing or all other things that could be done for the people of that county. He testified he had no hope of reward. He testified that he had no promises. He testified that he never received a dollar for voting for LORIMER. He testified under oath three times that he was compelled to testify that he received money from Browne and Wilson; and that he was threatened, unless he did, that he would be sent to the penitentiary and would lose his wife and home; and that he then told the prosecuting attorney that he would go before the grand jury and lie if he had to, but that he did not want to. He said that the money that he did get, when he testified that he did get money, he got for something else; he did not know what it was; and that he would not have taken money for his vote for LORIMER. That was Michael Link's testimony. It may be misconstrued and misstated, but nothing can change it.

Holstlaw's story I have just told you. Then what have we left? Charles A. White, who received, according to his own testimony, $3,500 from the Tribune for the testimony he gave.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LORIMER. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Illinois has been talking now for five hours. It is a physical impossibility for him to conclude his remarks to-night. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the motion by making it 8 o'clock to-night. ["No!" "No!"]

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah makes a motion that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow. The Senator from Kansas moves to amend that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening. Does the Senator from Kansas insist on his motion?

Mr. CURTIS. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to amend made by the Senator from Kansas.

The motion to amend was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Utah that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m., Friday, July 12) the Senate took a recess until Saturday, July 13, 1912, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 12, 1912.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Eternal One, in whose infinite wisdom, power, and goodness rests the destiny of men and of nations, make us wise, we beseech Thee, in our generation, that we may live to the full measure of Christian manhood, and thus round out to completeness our character and so fulfill our earthly mission that when the call comes we may be prepared to enter upon the new life fully equipped for the duties which await us there; and Thine shall be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of national good-road building.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on national good-road building. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the bill H. R. 19276, with a report thereon, has been referred to the Private Calendar. It is a bill that disposes of public lands and should be on the Union Calendar. I ask unanimous consent to have that change of reference made.

The SPEAKER. If it disposes of public lands, the rule is to send it to the Union Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker—well, I do not know; this bill provides for the conveyance of a particular tract of land to a particular individual.

The SPEAKER. Of course the Chair does not know what is in the bill.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. That is true, but this disposes of public lands.

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, it is the disposition of public lands, but there are many bills on the Private Calendar, Mr. Speaker, providing for the disposition of public lands to particular individuals. That is what this bill is. I do not care what calendar it goes on, but I suggest the gentleman ought to consult with the Speaker or whoever assigns these bills before he makes the request for the change, because there are a number of bills on the Private Calendar of the same character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Tennessee to let the matter stand until the Chair can investigate the matter.

Mr. MOON of Tennessee. Very well.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole——

The SPEAKER. This is pension day.

Mr. POU. I will say, Mr. Speaker, under the rule I understand a motion will be in order for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to consider bills on the Private Calendar subject to the right of the Committee on Pensions. I make that motion, and if there is no business on the calendar which the Pensions Committee desires to consider, then that motion I make will be in order.

The SPEAKER. Why, of course, if there is no pension business then the motion is in order.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, there is pension business.

The SPEAKER. There is pension business, the committee notifies the Chair.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to ask unanimous consent. The Chair will read clause 6 of Rule XXIV:

On Friday of each week, after the disposal of such business on the Speaker's table as requires reference only—

That has been disposed of—it shall be in order to entertain a motion for the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House to consider business on the Private Calendar in the following order: On the second and fourth Fridays of each month preference shall be given to the consideration of private pension claims and bills removing political disabilities and bills removing the charge of desertion.

Now, the motion is to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House consider as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the bill H. R. 25598, being No. 221 on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill which he names shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think we had better go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of private pension bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of pension bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. RUCKER of Colorado in the chair.

CORNELIA BRAGG.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill (H. R. 25598) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia Bragg be taken up for consideration.

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether that is the first pension bill on the calendar, but I suggest, under the rule, that they be called up in order on the calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] that, as the Chair understands the rule, they should be called up in order.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Then I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

CATHERINE WISE.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 20362) granting a pension to Catherine Wise.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20362) granting a pension to Catherine Wise.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Catherine Wise, widow of John Wise, late of the United States Military Academy Detachment of Field Artillery, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Amend, page 1, lines 6 and 7, by striking out the words "United States Military Academy" and the word "Field."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry of the committee which reported this bill, as to whether this is to inaugurate a new policy of the Government. This is a bill to pension a widow of a soldier of the Regular Army who is not entitled to a pension under the existing law. I believe it has not been usual to do that. It may be a very desirable thing to do. It might be a very desirable thing for the beneficiary if we would pension the widow of a clerk in one of the departments who had died. Here was a soldier at West Point who never served anywhere else, and finally died, and it is proposed now to pension his widow, although the Pension Office found he did not die from disability incurred in the service.

Is it to be the policy of the Pension Committee to pension the widow of every soldier of the Regular Army who asks for a pension but who is not entitled to it under the general law, and does the committee propose to bring in a special bill in each of those cases? We have a general law governing that subject. We pass a great many private bills for soldiers and widows of soldiers of the Civil War, and I would like to inquire whether it is to become the policy of the Pension Committee to adopt the same plan concerning widows of soldiers of the regular service that Congress has adopted in reference to widows of soldiers of the Civil War? Because, if we are to commence that, it would be much more economical to simply provide by general law that every widow of every soldier of the regular service shall be entitled to a pension. There are no circumstances disclosed in this case which would not be disclosed in almost every other case, unless it be the length of service.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think I am entitled to a response from the Pension Committee, or somebody representing it, on that subject, if they desire to have this pension bill passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Illinois that the Chair has not any power to call upon anybody to express their opinion.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think it was due to a misunderstanding as to what committee the bill belonged to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] desire to answer the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not heard him. I want to know exactly what bill the clerk has there.

Mr. MANN. I appreciate the fact that the committee has been asleep. I think they were asleep when they reported this bill out.

The CHAIRMAN. I will say to the gentleman from Alabama it does not behoove the Chair to repeat what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said. The Chair is sorry the gentleman from Alabama did not hear him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will confess I was not giving attention to him. I did not think the pension bills had been reached. I thought the invalid pensions were under consideration, and I did not give the gentleman from Illinois the usual attention I give to everything else he says.

Now, I would be very glad to know what objection you have made to the bill H. R. 20362.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question? This bill now pending is one to pension the widow of a soldier of the Regular Army who was not able to bring herself within the general law on that subject. The soldier was in service at West Point, I believe, during his entire service. Now, what I asked was whether it is to be the policy of the Pension Committee, when a Regular Army soldier passes away leaving a widow who is unable to bring herself within the provisions of the law granting her a pension, to report a special bill in such a case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman asked the question whether I believed the Pension Committee has that power. I think so.

Mr. MANN. No; the question whether it is the policy of the committee, whether that is to be their policy.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That, I believe, is the policy of the committee. That is the policy. Wherever an injustice is done by a strict enforcement of the law according to technicalities, upon the discovery of that fact the Pension Committee generally recommends relief if the facts and environments and circumstances justify the same. That is the general policy. This case, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will see by reading the report, has been very carefully considered and the facts set out.

Mr. MANN. I have read the report, but I can not find any exhaustive consideration of the subject, although, of course, I do not doubt but that the committee has given it consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman may not be aware of the fact that we have reported bills of this character heretofore. We thought this widow was entitled to a pension of $12.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not see myself any special circumstances in the case which would differentiate it from any other case of a widow of a soldier of the Regular Army. It may be desirable to grant them all pensions, but if we are to grant them all pensions it ought to be done by general law, and they should not be required to come before Congress in special bills.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, the gentleman from Illinois understands the fact that the Committee on Pensions was brought into existence some years since for the reason that the Pension Bureau in its administration of the general law in certain cases had rejected applications for pensions upon technicalities. For instance, it frequently occurred that in cases connected with the Mexican War and other wars a pension could not be granted on application unless the service of the soldier had been of a certain length of time. For instance, unless the soldier had served 60 days in the Mexican War and in the Civil War—which we do not have control of—90 days, and in the Indian wars 30 days, pensions could not be granted under the general law. Now, when it can be shown that the soldier served 25 days or 29 days only, the application would be rejected in the Pension Bureau. But under such conditions the Committee on Pensions had the right to look into that fact and give a pension, notwithstanding the soldier had served not more than 25 or 29 days. Such technicalities were and are disregarded by our Pension Committee.

Mr. MANN. That is all true; but——

Mr. RICHARDSON. There is no general law on the subject at all.

Mr. MANN. The attitude of Congress in the past in relation to soldiers and the widows of soldiers serving in war has been quite a different policy from that with respect to soldiers and widows of soldiers who served in the Regular Army but not in any war. The soldier in this particular case served in no war. He died from old age or from a complication of diseases, probably resulting from old age, but in no way connected with his Army service.

Now, I can understand that if a widow desires a pension it may be desirable to give her a pension. But is it to be the policy of the Committee on Pensions and the policy of Congress to grant a pension upon application to every widow of every Regular Army soldier when the widow can not bring herself within the terms of the existing law? And if not, what is there in this case to plead especially for a pension?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, if the gentleman from Illinois will allow me to suggest, this statement about this widow is to the effect that she is the widow of John Wise, who at the age of 22 years enlisted in the detachment of artillery at the United States Military Academy. That is the basis of her claim for a pension and that is set forth in this statement. I can not repeat all of the facts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says he thinks this is an exceptional case. Is that it?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Well, I would not say it is an exceptional case. I am disposed to believe that wherever a widow like this brings herself within the purview of the law and fails to get a pension thereunder on the stated facts there set forth, I expect for myself and for the Committee on Pensions that under these circumstances a pension would be recommended. The gentleman can consider that either as a general policy or as a policy affecting specific cases, either way he pleases.

Mr. MANN. Then I understand it is to be the policy of the Committee on Pensions that wherever a soldier or a soldier's widow can not obtain a pension under the general law it is the duty of the committee to report a special pension bill granting a pension to that soldier or to his widow?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; I did not say that in that exact language.

Mr. MANN. That is practically what the gentleman said.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say when a widow comes in and brings a fair and reasonable statement of her case and puts it before us, I think it is right and proper that we should grant her application.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have a good many cases in my district where a fair and reasonable statement of the case could be presented, and yet I have never been led to understand that special pensions could be granted in those cases.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, in this case the War Department records show that this soldier was treated October 21 and 22, 1868, for diarrhea; February 16 to 20, 1871, for rheumatism; February 1 to 7, 1872, for contusion; February 16 to 19, 1872, for dysentery; July 9, 1872, to —, for boil; July 20 to 30, 1875, for incised wound; May 28 and 29 and July 23 to 27, 1878, for intermittent fever; March 29 to April 25, 1880, for contusion of left arm, swinging hammer, received while drilling rocks in line of duty; October 26 to 31, 1880, for lumbago; March 8 to 12, 1887, for contusion, left side, cause, misstep and fall in line of duty, cured. The records show also that "he died September 29, 1910, at Highland Falls, N. Y., from hypostatic pneumonia, three cerebral hemorrhages"; age given as 66 years.

It further appears that the immediate cause of death was uremia and exhaustion following a series of apoplectic seizures, covering a period of two years; that he had on the left side three ribs which had been broken and which had healed, with some deformity, and a large linear dent in the left parietofrontal region; that he had an immense hydrocele, which was tapped several times and finally obliterated by operation; that he was rather peculiar, but whether that was natural or was the result of the injury to his head shown by the scar they could not say, and whether this could have had any connection with the apoplexy could not be stated.

If he had died from any injury received in the service, his widow would have been entitled to a pension under the law. If his death had in any way been of service origin, she would have received a pension; but the medical officers of the Pension Bureau claimed that the death could not be accepted as the result of any disability of record, and that it was not a probable result of his military service; and yet it was certainly a possible result, following all those ailments and difficulties which he had had in the service, as I have stated.

His widow is blind in the right eye and almost blind in the left, and from feebleness of age and chronic rheumatism she is helpless to a degree requiring frequent and periodical aid and attention of another person. She has no income and is dependent on relatives for her support, which they can ill afford.

Mr. RICHARDSON. She is certainly entitled to a pension.

Mr. OLMSTED. It was not shown that the soldier's death from the alleged hypostatic pneumonia as the sequel of apoplectic attacks, nephritis, uremia, arteriosclerosis, and exhaustion was due to any cause arising during his military service; but while it can not positively be shown that all those things resulted from his service, yet it is quite possible that they did, and it seems to me, under all the circumstances of the case, that the committee was justified in finding that this was an exceptional case, taking it out of the general rule, and a case in which this pension might reasonably be allowed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think, clearly, under the gentleman's statement about the combination of troubles from which the soldier suffered and met his death, the widow is certainly entitled to this pension.

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not myself see why the widow of a Regular Army soldier should not be pensioned the same as the widow of a volunteer soldier, but I agree with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that, save in very exceptional cases, we ought not to grant it to one unless we do to all; but this seems to me such an exceptional case.

Mr. RICHARDSON. We can not adopt that fixed rule, and there is no necessity for it before that committee, because we must be governed by the specific facts that bear upon the cases, and the facts are different. You might find one widow who had a good income. Ought she to be pensioned like this helpless impoverished widow?

Mr. OLMSTED. I say this is an exceptional case, in which it appears to me that the widow is fairly entitled to this small pension.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the report of the committee on the second page says:

> From the foregoing history of this case your committee believe the soldier's death was caused by his military service. They respectfully recommend the allowance of pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The report also shows that he was retired as a private in 1895, and that so far as the War Department records disclose, while he was treated for divers and sundry diseases or ailments, he was treated for no disease or ailment after March, 1887; so that if the report of the committee is accurate, he was in the service from 1887 to 1895, and there was no record in the War Department of his having been treated for any ill or infirmity during that time. Then he was placed on the retired list, and if he was subject to various diseases in the meantime, in any manner connected with his service in the Army, the reports and the facts fail to disclose it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not believe I have ever been instrumental in preparing a report that showed more diseases than does this report.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes; but the last treatment shown in the records of the War Department was in 1887, 23 years before the man died, and how from that record it can be concluded that he died of diseases that were caused by his military service the report does not disclose and I fail to perceive.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman has probably overlooked the affidavit of Dr. Blanchard, who says in an affidavit executed June 14, 1911, that the immediate cause of death was uremic exhaustion following a series of apoplectic seizures covering a period of two years. Can not the gentleman connect that with the latter part of the statement made on the first page of the report, which shows that he was treated for diarrhea, rheumatism, contusion, dysentery, boils, incised wounds, intermittent fever, and a contusion of the left arm; can not the gentleman connect that with some of these diseases? Can not he see how these diseases might bring about the death of the soldier?

Mr. RODDENBERY. According to the record these troubles were all 20 years or more prior to the services rendered by the physician.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman must know that in the case of soldiers where they have some of these diseases they will develop causes of death 25 or 30 years after.

Mr. RODDENBERY. And then, furthermore, this soldier never served in any war.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Did not he join the Army?

Mr. RODDENBERY. Yes; but he never served in any war, according to the report. His entire service was at West Point.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then it was because he did not happen to be in any battle.

Mr. RODDENBERY. His widow applied for a pension November 14, 1910, under the act of April 19, 1908, which provides a pension for widows whose husbands rendered service in the Civil War. That claim was rejected December 9, 1910, on the ground that the soldier's service was not rendered in the Civil War. Then she applied for a pension April 19, 1911, under the general law, which provides pensions for widows whose husbands died of a cause originating in service in line of duty. That claim was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions July 18, 1911, on the ground that the soldier's death from the alleged hypostatic pneumonia, as the sequel of apoplectic attacks, nephritis, uremia, arteriosclerosis, and exhaustion was not shown by the record or other evidence to have been due to any cause arising during his military service.

Now, with that record the committee asserts that they conclude that he did die of a disease contracted in the service. I see no evidence on which they base their conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk reported the other committee amendments, which were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MARY BRADFORD CROWNINSHIELD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1152) granting an increase of pension to Mary Bradford Crowninshield.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Bradford Crowninshield, widow of Arent Schuyler Crowninshield, late rear admiral, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is due to the committee where a bill grants a large pension to have some explanation in regard to it. What reason is there for pensioning Mrs. Crowninshield at the rate of $50 a month? I do not recall that the admiral ever had any very strenuous service. He had a good many battles with other men in the department. He was here during the Spanish War. As I understand, $50 a month is the limit which the Pension Committee will report in any case for a widow's pension. I suppose it is not intended to provide that limit for every person.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is that the limit? It seems to me that I have known cases where the pension was larger than that.

Mr. MANN. That is the limit which the Pension Committee will report.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. We have increased the pension on the floor sometimes.

Mr. MANN. We increased the pension for Mrs. Schley the other day on the floor to $75. It seems to me that the limit of the pension ought to be reserved for special cases.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say, on behalf of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, that this bill providing a pension for the widow of Admiral Crowninshield was introduced and passed in the Senate, and has had the careful consideration of our committee. I am rather astonished at the gentleman from Illinois not knowing who Admiral Crowninshield was.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I did not say I did not know who he was. I know very well.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Then I misunderstood the gentleman. Admiral Crowninshield served in the Civil War, and also during all of the years between that and the Spanish War, and during the Spanish War. His record is first class. His widow is in needy circumstances and she ought to have this small amount of pension. It is in about the same proportion that widows of soldiers and sailors of similar rank receive.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I was not present when the committee reported this bill, but it appears from the report that this officer contracted this disease while he was in the service some years before his discharge and death. The widow was his wife for a good number of years, from 1860 down to the time of his death. The only fault I can find with the proposition is that she is not given enough. If I had been present in the committee at the time, I should have voted for more. I hope the bill will pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Bradford Crowninshield, widow of Arent Schuyler Crowninshield, late rear admiral, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JAMES A. DICKINSON AND OTHERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 25713) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of James A. Dickinson, late of Company K, Sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of James Campbell, late of Company C, Tenth Regiment United States Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of Joseph G. Long, late of Capt. Cone's company, First Regiment Florida Mounted Volunteers, Florida war with Seminole Indians, and pay him a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of William S. Smith, late of Company K, Twenty-first Regiment Kansas Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

The name of Jackson A. Watkins, late of Company D, Fifth Regiment United States Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $6 per month.

The name of Peter Peterson, late of Company A, Sixth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

The name of James B. White, late of Company A, Thirty-fourth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of William J. Abrams, late of Troop C, Second Regiment United States Volunteer Cavalry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $6 per month.

The foregoing bill is a substitute for the following House bills referred to the Committee on Pensions:

H. R. 6758. James A. Dickinson.	H. R. 13616. Jackson A. Watkins.
H. R. 11529. James Campbell.	H. R. 19388. Peter Peterson.
H. R. 12515. Joseph G. Long.	H. R. 22679. James B. White.
H. R. 13066. William S. Smith.	H. R. 24257. William J. Abrams.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no general debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of James B. White, late of Company A, Thirty-fourth Regiment United States Volunteer Infantry, War with Spain, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 2, line 24, by striking out the words "in lieu of that he is now receiving."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CORNELIA BRAGG.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 25598) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia Bragg.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Cornelia Bragg, widow of Gen. Edward S. Bragg, late a brigadier general of the United States Army during the late Civil War, and pay her a pension at the rate of $100 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] ought to make a statement in regard to this bill and in regard to Gen. Bragg.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, some time during this session of Congress the Congress passed a bill providing a pension of $100 per month for Gen. Edward S. Bragg. The bill became a law by the approval of the President on the 19th day of June, and on the 20th of June Gen. Bragg died. Cornelia Bragg was married to Gen. Bragg some few years before the Civil War. She is a war widow. She has lived with him continually from the time of their marriage until his death. She has been a most faithful and devoted wife to the noble old general. She has been his constant aid and companion during all of these years. She is now nearly 83 years of age, feeble, helpless, without any income, without any property excepting the humble home in which she lives. She has at best but a few years more to live, for she will soon follow her noble husband to the grave.

The bill as read provides a pension of $100, but there is a committee amendment reducing that amount to $50 a month. I think the amount is too small, yet it seems to be in accordance with the custom of Congress in providing for the widows of generals of his rank. I do not think it is necessary in this House, in which Gen. Bragg served four different terms with distinction, to say anything further in respect to the bill. He was a friend of the soldier and the enemy of the coffee cooler and camp follower. Although entitled to it, he never during his lifetime asked for a pension. He was granted a pension through the courtesy of Senator Spooner of Wisconsin in 1906, but that was without his knowledge, and he refused to accept it for several months thereafter, but finally did accept it because of his needy circumstances. I think, in view of the honorable record of Gen. Bragg, that no student familiar with the history of the Civil War desires or needs an explanation, and I think in view of the circumstances that the small amount allowed for Cornelia Bragg is well deserved by her. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not be adopted. This widow is the widow of a general with whom she lived for all these long years, and it was the practice in the case of those generals who died earlier to give at least $100, and in many cases more was granted. She has arrived at that age when she can survive only a few days, weeks, or months more at the best, and I think it is due to her and to the memory of Gen. Bragg and what he did in that terrible war to give her at least $100 instead of the mere pittance of $50, which will not support her and pay for the nurses and watchers who will be needed while she does live. I hope the amendment will be voted down. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 6, by striking out after the word "of" the word "General."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 7, by striking out the words "the United States Army" and inserting in lieu thereof "United States Volunteers."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 9, by striking out the words "one hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 20.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. Ask for tellers.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers on the question.

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I want to say here is an evidence of what we are coming to. In the case of Mrs. Schley the committee stood firmly by the action of the Senate committee and refused $150, and the gentleman from Illinois was the man who broke the precedent by giving $75. You see where this is going to now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order that there is no quorum?

Mr. MANN. I did make that point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman now make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. I made the point of order before.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Can not I ask for tellers on the question?

Mr. MANN. If the Chair has finished his count, I would like to have an announcement of the result.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair finds there are 94 Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will therefore call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

During the roll call,

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MARTIN of Colorado). The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. I do not know whether the House understands this roll call is to disclose a quorum or whether we are to vote "yea" or "nay" on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The purpose of the roll call is to disclose whether or not a quorum is present.

After the roll call,

The SPEAKER resumed the chair, and Mr. RUCKER of Colorado, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, finding itself without a quorum, he had caused the roll to be called, and that 238 Members answered to their names, a quorum.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DENVER, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for an indefinite period on account of important business.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER designated Mr. LLOYD to preside as Speaker pro tempore for to-morrow, Saturday, July 13, 1912.

CORNELIA BRAGG.

The committee resumed its sitting, with Mr. RUCKER of Colorado in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division on the vote. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are demanded.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

Mr. LANGLEY. Is that a committee amendment, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to discuss that amendment for a moment. I wish to say this: I believe that if the Members of the House understand what the amendment is they will vote for it. It is an important matter and has recently been passed upon. It is a good custom if it is honestly and faithfully observed, because it applies to all widows of admirals and generals. I held in my hand the other day some seventy and odd of such bills when the question came up here that the Pension Committee of the Senate had allowed Mrs. Schley, the widow of Admiral Schley, the sum of $50. The Pension Committee of this House that had charge of this bill sustained the Pension Committee of the Senate, but after an earnest speech, full of eloquence and sentiment, as I was told, the Senate overrode its own committee and fixed Mr. Schley's pension at $150. I did not think then and I do not think now it was right, although the suggestion was made to me by the various gentlemen here as chairman of the Pension Committee that we allow an amendment of $75, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] had offered.

I said it was breaking that custom and making a line of demarcation against those widows that was unjust and unfair, and I did not think this House would stand for it. But it did. I predicted it then, that having violated that custom, sacred as I thought it was, that a number of instances would follow where it would be asked by worthy widows of distinguished admirals and generals, "Why could you not give us $100 just as well as you do any of the distinguished widows?"

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why, yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Quite a good many of us came into the House after this question was raised, and there is confusion in the minds of a good many Members as to just what this proposition is, and there is so much confusion in the House that many of the Members did not hear the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON]. I want to ask him if I have a correct understanding of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Alabama is out of order. The matter has been settled so far as debate is concerned. If the gentleman from Alabama will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman from Alabama asked the privilege of speaking.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. Was there any order entered by the House closing debate?

Mr. LANGLEY. The demand for tellers makes it necessary to take a vote over again.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement about the status of this matter.

Mr. KENDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON] may proceed for 10 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I was asking the gentleman from Alabama a question, and with his permission I will continue it. Am I correct in the understanding that this was a proposition to grant a pension of $100 a month, and that there is now pending an amendment reducing that pension to $50 a month?

Mr. SIMS. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; a committee amendment, to make it $50 a month.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; but the trouble is that the gentleman who is in charge of the bill offers to leave it at $100 a month.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, as a member of that committee, if the gentleman will allow me, let me state that the bill as introduced, if I remember aright, provided for $100 a month.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. And our committee thought it best to follow the usual custom in such cases and fix the amount at $50 a month. This is a committee amendment, reducing the amount provided in the original bill.

Mr. KENDALL. It is a Senate bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is correct, I have no doubt, as stated by the gentleman from Kentucky, and all that I am interested in, Mr. Chairman, is that there shall be justice and uniformity of treatment.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it a Senate bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No; a House bill.

Mr. KENDALL. How does it come before the House, then, with a committee amendment reducing it to $50?

Mr. LANGLEY. It came from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and this is a committee amendment reducing the amount that was provided in the original bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Is this a Senate bill?

Mr. LANGLEY. No; this is a House bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to understand from the gentleman from Alabama to whom he yields.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KENDALL] asked a very pertinent question; but when the gentleman from Iowa or any other gentleman asks the question, and this bill comes in here with an amendment at $50 a month instead of $100, as originally introduced, if he will refer to the rules of the House and the rules governing the action of the committee he will ascertain, if any bill is introduced and reported back to the House with a change, that the committee amendment must be adopted. In other words, if he should introduce a bill allowing $1,000 a month the committee would report that identical bill with an amendment, say, at $25 a month.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is exactly the case here. This is not an omnibus bill, but an individual bill.

Mr. KENDALL. The committee has reported the bill and recommended that the bill be passed with the rate fixed at $50 a month.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes. If we vote on it, we will vote for an amendment which makes it $50 a month for the widow.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. COOPER. This widow is 82 years of age, is she not?

Mr. LANGLEY. She is about that age.

Mr. COOPER. She is 82 years of age past, I am informed by my colleague, Mr. BURKE. The testimony is uncontradicted that she has no income at all. Is that true?

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; that is true, I presume, from the statements made.

Mr. COOPER. And the testimony is that she is the widow of Gen. Bragg, the commander of the Iron Brigade, one of the most justly celebrated brigades in all history. Is not that true?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have no doubt it is true.

Mr. COOPER. That was the brigade which history declares held Stonewall Jackson's whole division at Gainesville, one of the fiercest battles of the war, for more than an hour, and helped save the Union Army from what seemed certain disaster. The heroism of that brigade on many a blood-stained field won for it an immortality of renown. And yet the poor widow of its heroic commander is to be pensioned at the rate of $50 a month, when every Member of the House knows that no woman of her age, without other income, can live in these times as the widow of a Union veteran ought to live on only $50 a month. She will be obliged to have the attendance of another person, and for this she can not pay; and yet the Government of the United States, the richest Nation the world has ever seen, is quibbling about giving her a pension large enough to maintain her in comfort.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. COOPER. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not think that is a proper statement.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. The gentleman's argument would indicate that in his judgment every widow should have at least $50 a month.

Mr. COOPER. That is what I do believe if she is more than 80 years old and without income. This widow is more than 80 years of age and destitute of income.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is what the House has always refused.

Mr. COOPER. I do not care how often or how long the House has refused. It is never too late to do justice to the widow of a Union soldier. A bad precedent never makes good law. Penurious, ungrateful, pinchbeck, alleged economy does not weigh an atom, in my judgment, against the just claims of the widow of a hero like Gen. Bragg, of the Iron Brigade. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think that is all true, but——

Mr. COOPER. My attention has only just been called to this. I knew nothing about it until a moment ago, when I inquired of my colleague and of the gentleman from Illinois as to what was before the House. I shall never knowingly vote to give only $50 from the Treasury of the United States to the widow of a private soldier nor to the widow of an officer when, in either case, the widow is more than 80 years of age and practically helpless. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. How does the gentleman establish the line of demarcation——

Mr. COOPER. I do not establish any line of demarcation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have listened to the gentleman's questions carefully, and I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. COOPER. When a widow of any gallant Union soldier, officer or private, is so aged as to be unable to earn a living, I will vote to pay her enough money out of the United States Treasury to keep her honorably, in comfort and free from care, until she goes to her grave.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then I will ask the gentleman this question: How will he make a line of demarcation as to the widow of an admiral who has not the reputation, fame, honor, and glory among the people of the Nation that Admiral Schley made in this country for himself? Will the gentleman make a difference in money between them? That is the question I want him to answer.

Mr. COOPER. I will make no line of demarcation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You are bound to make it.

Mr. COOPER. I am not bound to make it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. You are, when you give the widow of one admiral $150 a month and another $75 or $80, and the records of this Government show that the widows of brave and gallant soldiers who fought for the flag of the Union are by a uniform custom receiving $50. Why do you not increase them? Our committee try to maintain justice and fairness without discrimination between these good women, and for that reason, as chairman of the Pension Committee, when the case of Mrs. Schley came up, and it was proposed to give her $150, our committee stood strongly against it because it was violative of a custom that was right and fair and just to the equally deserving widows of other distinguished men.

Mr. COOPER. I was not aware that the Congress of the United States had heretofore voted only $50 a month to so aged and poor a widow as is the one named in the pending bill.

Mr. ANDERSON of Minnesota. Twelve dollars in some cases.

Mr. COOPER. I was not referring to the general law. I mean that I am not aware of a special act having been passed in such a case which limited the pension to that amount.

Mr. KENDALL. Is it not ordinarily true——

Mr. COOPER. But if that be true, I am in favor of doing what is plainly right now, and of giving to this woman, helpless in her old age and within sight of her grave, enough to support her in comfort, as becomes the widow of a Union soldier, until she shall pass across the dark river.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Regardless——

Mr. COOPER. And the fact that heretofore Congress may not have dealt justly by another aged widow will not suffice to justify us if now we deal unjustly by this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, this Congress, at the present session, passed a bill giving to Gen. Bragg himself a pension of $100 a month. That bill became a law on the 19th day of June last, and on the next day Gen. Bragg died, at the age, I think, of over 84 years. He never received any benefit from that act. The proposition now is to give to this old widow the pension that had just been voted by this Congress to Gen. Bragg, and I am surprised that any gentleman on the other side of this House, especially, should oppose any honor that may be shown to Gen. Bragg or his aged widow. There never was a braver soldier; there never was a man deserving more from his country than Gen. Bragg. [Applause.] To that widow, who is now more than 82 years of age, and who is without property and helpless, we are proposing to give the pension that Congress had already voted to the general himself, and from which neither he nor she ever received any benefit.

I hope this amendment will not be adopted, but that this House, with unanimity, may agree to give to this aged widow what she needs for her comfort and support during the few days that she is to remain upon this earth. [Applause.]

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised at the gentleman [Mr. FULLER] who just closed his remarks referring to "this side of the House," the Democratic, on the subject of pensions of this character. That is unfair and unkind. I can say for myself that there would be no hesitancy on my part, and has been none since I have been a Member of the House, to honor the Federal soldiers of the Civil War and their widows.

But this is a different principle. It is a question of justice between these widows of distinguished soldiers. It makes no difference how grand the record of Gen. Bragg was in the Civil War. There is no question about that; but I predicted the other day that if you broke down this custom of granting to this class of widows $50 you would destroy the whole thing, and all these good women would be led to come in and ask for a different and increased pension. Here we have one to-day, and they will come in numbers, trooping along, as they ought to come, if you make a distinction between them. This bill does not come from the Pension Committee, it comes from the Committee on Invalid Pensions; but it is the principle I am contending for, and doing justice among these widows of the old soldiers.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] a question. I understood the gentleman to allege, as a matter of policy, that we ought to give the widow of a soldier the same pension that the soldier himself received while living.

Mr. FULLER. I did not state that as a matter of policy, but in this case I think it is a matter of common justice.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman thinks that this is an exceptional case?

Mr. FULLER. I do, on account of the age of the widow and the distinguished services of the soldier.

Mr. SIMS. And the gentleman voted for $100 for Gen. Bragg, who had himself and his wife to take care of, and he thought that was amply sufficient.

Mr. FULLER. It was not amply sufficient.

Mr. SIMS. It was all the gentleman voted for.

Mr. FULLER. It was all we could get the House to give.

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman think there is any discrimination in regard to the widow when he voted that $100 was enough for both of them, and now the proposition is to give $50 to one?

Mr. FULLER. It was a pittance for both. I never said it was enough for both. It is a little thing for this great Nation to do to give this widow the pension that we voted to Gen. Bragg.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this debate is out of order. The committee was dividing when the point of no quorum was made.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that there was no order closing debate, and the universal rule of parliamentary law and the rule in this House is that until debate is closed by order of the House debate is in order until the negative vote is taken on the final vote.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMS. But, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be taken off of the floor by any point of order.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order that debate was closed and the House was dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia that the Chair was inclined to agree with the gentleman from Virginia, but he has since been convinced that he was wrong, and as the gentleman from Illinois is usually right, the Chair will overrule the point of order. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] has the floor.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that I am not making an objection to this particular pension, but I think the committee should not be overruled without an opportunity to be heard. The bill was reported by the committee of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] is a member.

Mr. FULLER. But I was not present when the report was made.

Mr. SIMS. I have been on the Committee on Pensions and I have had some experience. Many times it used to occur that amendments were offered on the floor of the House of which the committee had had no opportunity to consider, and an appeal would be made to the sympathy of Members when the committee had had no opportunity to consider it. Now, the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions must have general rules, and whenever a bill is reported from that committee and the House thinks it is not sufficiently large, it seems to me that the proper motion would be to recommit the bill and let the committee reconsider its action and give the committee an opportunity to do what it deems wise. I think the gentleman from Alabama is correct. If these widows are allowed different pensions by special acts—if they are granted pensions in excess of the sum allowed by the committee as reported—every one will come in here and ask for an increase of pension by private act. Besides, under the general law we have always given the soldier himself a greater pension than his widow.

Mr. FULLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. FULLER. If the bill were recommitted, the probability is that this widow, like her husband, would die before she could have any benefit from the pension.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think the gentleman's committee is subject to a charge that it does not act diligently.

Mr. FULLER. But we are in the closing days of this session.

Mr. SIMS. And where does the gentleman get such encouraging information—that we are in the closing days of this session? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, we recently passed a law, general in its nature, providing for an increase in pensions. The highest amount carried under that law for a soldier of three years' or more service in the Army, of old age, was $30 a month for himself and his wife. We have recently passed, without the knowledge of the House, a bill granting a pension of $100 a month to Gen. Bragg. It was news to every Member of the House, I think, that the bill had been passed, except perhaps the gentlemen upon the committee. Gen. Bragg has died. That bill carried $100 a month for the support of himself and his wife. There is a general rule of Congress, of the committees both of the House and the Senate, that they will not grant a pension for more than $50 a month to widows. In the course of my service here I have had numerous applications from widows of generals living in Chicago pointing to the day when Congress passed pensions for widows at the rate of $100 a month and insisting that they were entitled to the same amount.

I prefer to grant larger pensions to widows of soldiers who now get not to exceed $12 a month and give them $20, and less to the widows of soldiers who receive $100. [Applause.] Therefore I shall vote for the amendment to reduce the amount to $50 a month, knowing that if that bill passes the House it has a chance to become a law and the widows will receive that amount of money during their lifetime.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do this for the purpose of affording myself the opportunity, debate having been exhausted under the rules, to speak briefly on the merits of this bill. I desire to support the amendment reported by the committee, and I am free to admit that I am speaking against my sentiments and in obedience to my judgment. I am a member of the committee that reported the bill. I trust that I am not seriously violating the rule regarding committee proceedings when I say that it was upon my motion that the amount proposed by the bill as originally introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] was reduced from $100 to $50 a month. We thought, after discussing the matter fully, that $50 a month was a sufficient amount, and that it was in accordance with the usual custom which has prevailed heretofore in similar cases. The sympathy of every kind-hearted man is naturally appealed to by the statement that has been made here, that Mrs. Bragg is past 81 years of age, and but for the principle involved that fact alone would induce me to vote for the $100 rate. But, Mr. Chairman, I am satisfied that most Members have not been advised fully as to the facts of the case. The evidence before our committee showed that Mrs. Bragg owns a residence valued at $5,000. That would be regarded in the mountains of Kentucky, where I live, as a rather palatial home. It is a finer home than any widow of a Union soldier in my congressional district possesses, so far as I am informed. I can recall the cases of scores of widows of Civil War veterans who live in my district who occupy log cabins that are not worth $25. Some of these widows, who married the soldiers since June 27, 1890, are not receiving any pensions at all. Nearly all of those who are on the rolls receive only $12 a month, and they are old and unable to earn a support, and most of them are in actual need of some of the necessaries of life which this pittance of $12 a month will not procure for them.

I agree with the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that we ought to concern ourselves more with cases where actual poverty and need exist and less with bills granting a rate of pension which to these poor widows would be a magnificent income. I do not believe this House ought to increase the amount over that recommended by the committee. I think the action of the committee was right, and I think the people of the country will approve of it, not because they do not honor the memory of Gen. Bragg, not because they do not appreciate to the fullest the spendid service which he rendered to the country in the hour of its peril, but because they believe that the Congress of the United States should exercise a little more justice, a little more equity, a little more uniformity, than it sometimes does in the distribution of the gratuities that are granted by the Government to its soldiers and their widows. [Applause.]

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LANGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I am a member of the committee, but I was absent when this matter was brought up.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am sorry the gentleman was not present. He ought to have been.

Mr. SULLOWAY. And so am I—much more so than the gentleman. I want to ask him if this widow has any other property than the home in which she lives?

Mr. LANGLEY. So far as I am advised, she has no cash income.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Does the gentleman know of the widow of a general, who was his wife during the war, with the rank and record of Gen. Bragg, who is not drawing $100 a month at the present time, if she is living? Has not that been the fact for long years? This talk about a custom of paying only $50 a month is of no force and never was a fact. Let the gentleman look at the record, and he will find that some widows were granted $500 a month—yes, all the way from $100 a month to $5,000 a year.

Mr. LANGLEY. My information is that has not been the general practice. If the gentleman has evidence to the contrary, let him submit it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LANGLEY) there were—ayes 67, noes 56.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order it is too late to ask for tellers.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is too late.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers [Mr. RICHARDSON and Mr. BROWNING] reported that there were—ayes 77, noes 53.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the additional committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 9 and 10, strike out the words "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills favorably with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will withhold his motion for a second.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The parliamentary inquiry is, Is it not in order to call up on the calendar those bills removing charges of desertion or bills which have been similarly treated in recent years—bills providing that the pension laws shall be made applicable in certain cases where there are charges of desertion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois that he is advised that in the House the motion was made to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider pension bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MANN. I understand that is the way the Speaker put the motion, but I believe that is not the way it was made, and it is not the proper motion; but I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the committee rise and report the bills favorably, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUCKER of Colorado, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration pension bills on the Private Calendar and had directed him to report back to the House the bill H. R. 20362 with amendments, the bill S. 1152 without amendment, the bill H. R. 25713 with amendments, and the bill H. R. 25598 with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

CATHERINE WISE.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 20362) granting a pension to Catherine Wise.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER. I desire at the proper time, if this is the proper time, to ask for a separate vote upon the Bragg amendment. I did not hear what this bill is.

The SPEAKER. The bill comes up in its turn.

Mr. COOPER. I did not understand the name of this bill, and I wished to be on the safe side.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MARY BRADFORD CROWNINSHIELD.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 1152) granting an increase of pension to Mary Bradford Crowninshield.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

GRANTING PENSIONS TO CERTAIN SOLDIERS AND SAILORS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25713) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The amendment was read.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CORNELIA BRAGG.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 25598) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia Bragg.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "of," strike out the word "General."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the words "the United States Army" and insert in lieu thereof the words "United States Volunteers."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "one hundred" and insert in lieu thereof the word "fifty."

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a yea-and-nay vote on that amendment, which decreases the amount to $50 a month. First, I ask for a division on that. I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. COOPER. And I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear the last remark.

Mr. COOPER. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. MANN. Has the vote been ordered taken?

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. COOPER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. On the roll call those in favor of the amendment will vote "aye" and those opposed will vote "no."

Mr. RICHARDSON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. In voting on the question of a quorum, if you vote "aye" you vote for the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The vote is on the amendment.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I say it is on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. That is what the Chair stated. On this vote it was not a question of voting "present" only. It is a question of voting "aye" or "no." Those in favor of the amendment will vote "yea" and those opposed will vote "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 125, nays 78, answwered "present" 8, not voting 178, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A quorum being present, the doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On lines 9 and 10 strike out the words "in lieu of that she is now receiving."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENDALL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KENDALL. I rise to suggest that in view of the fact that the amendment has been adopted striking out those words, the title ought to be amended.

The SPEAKER. That will be done after the bill is passed. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Cornelia Bragg."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. On what bill?

Mr. LANGLEY. On this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON, a motion to reconsider the votes whereby the foregoing pension bills were passed was laid on the table.

REMOVAL OF CHARGES OF DESERTION.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House to consider bills on the Private Calendar having for their purpose the removal of the charge of desertion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar removing political disabilities and bills removing the charge of desertion. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, with Mr. RAKER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills to remove political disabilities and charges of desertion. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to the fact that only bills which have for their purpose the removal of charges of desertion are now in order, and they should be called in their order on the calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Bills to remove charges of desertion and political disabilities are in order.

Mr. HAY. There are no bills on the calendar to remove political disabilities.

Mr. MANN. Who is representing these bills, and which is the first one?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am representing H. R. 606.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report that bill.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, have any memorandum from the calendar, or otherwise, to indicate the order of these bills?

Mr. HAY. I made a memorandum for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS]. I marked his calendar, showing which were the bills to remove charges of desertion.

Mr. MANN. I think they ought to be taken in their order.

Mr. HAY. Of course.

Mr. MANN. I ask that they be called in their order.

BARKLEY S. DENISON.

The first business was the bill (H. R. 11627) to correct the military record of Barkley S. Denison.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to correct the military record of Barkley S. Denison, late of Fifty-third Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge from said regiment: Provided, however, That no pay, bounty, or other allowances shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the report on this bill gives the facts very fully, and unless there is some request for further explanation I will ask that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the word "late," in line 5, down to and including the word "regiment," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "A first lieutenant in the Fifty-third Regiment Kentucky Volunteers, so that he shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States on the 6th day of August, 1863."

The amendment was agreed to.

The following amendment was read:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "bounty," insert the word "pension."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN TREFFEISEN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 606) for the relief of John Treffeisen.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged officers, John Treffeisen, who was captain of Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 24th day of October, 1862.

With the following amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged officers, John Treffeisen, who was captain of Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 24th day of October, 1862."

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have an explanation of this bill, as the report gives no information whatever.

Mr. MANN. The report in this case is:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 606) for the relief of John Treffeisen, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment in the nature of a substitute.

I have no desire to reflect on the able committee which reported so fully on the subject, but it does seem to me that we ought to know some reason for removing the charge of desertion, or some fact in regard to it.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that the charge was not desertion.

Mr. MANN. Then the bill is not in order under the rule.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. It is akin to that, because he was dismissed the service, and it is for the purpose of reinstating him as far as possible. I have conferred for the last two years or more with the War Department concerning this claim.

For 50 years there lay in the archives of the office of the War Department a certificate from a Surgeon General of the Army that accounted for the absence of this man for three days. After his wardrobe had been burned up somewhere between here and Culpeper, on the afternoon of the day that he got permission to come to Washington to get clothing, he walked 8 or 10 miles to this city. He came to the Prescott Hotel and was there taken ill. He had been in battles from day to day for a week before that. He had been living upon roasting ears of corn, and he was taken violently ill before he reached Washington. He went to the Prescott Hotel. He was due to return to his regiment at 7 o'clock that evening. When he returned upon the third day, a battle was in progress, which continued for three or four days afterwards. He was a German. He could not speak the English language very clearly, nor could he understand it very well. He had received a military education in the old country, and his education in that service appealed to the defenders of our country. This was his second enlistment, both times as captain. The colonel of the regiment was mortally wounded during his absence, and the lieutenant colonel of the regiment, with whom he possibly had been at outs, although that is not fully disclosed, was in command. The War Department records show that instead of being absent without leave, the charge that was made against him and upon which he was found guilty was of not reporting his absence. No pen, pencil, nor paper was at his command. He assumed that when he handed the doctor's certificate to the commanding officer that it was in place of and would answer for his report concerning his absence, and so it would have appeared to any of you.

There never was a clearer case of injustice having been done an old soldier, and the War Department agrees in that. This man is only asking now what is his just due. He is 82 years of age. I have been anxiously waiting for this bill to pass before he passes to the other side. He has a large family. His wife died only a few weeks ago, and therefore she was not able to enjoy the privilege of seeing this justice done him. He has been thought so well of by his comrades that he has been chosen commander of the Grand Army post a number of times since he has been out of the service. He is asking nothing of this Government in the way of a pension. He is asking simply to be relieved from this odium, and if I had the time to read what the War Department says concerning this case and the affidavits that he himself has made Members would understand the cause I plead for. His comrades, when they learned of this, were utterly astonished and surprised that he had been dismissed from the service. The fact was that they were constantly in battle in and around between here and Culpeper, and no time was given, even if he knew that it was necessary, to do any more than to put in this certificate. It is very doubtful from the examination of the war records that the certificate of the Surgeon General was discovered. That reads as follows:

SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington City, September 8, 1862.

Captain Jno. Treffeisen has been under medical treatment in this city—is this day discharged, & will return to his regt. fit for duty.
MEREDITH CLYMER, Surgeon Volunteers.

That was on the 8th, and on the 9th, when he reported there and was asked for this certificate, he turned it over to his commanding officer and supposed that was all he had to do. He was cited to appear before a court-martial soon afterwards, but the evidence is so meager that it is not determined that the certificate of the Surgeon General was ever presented to the board, showing the reason for his absence.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. FOSTER. He was court-martialed for not returning to his command within the time the leave would have expired?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. That was the charge made, but he was only found guilty of not reporting in writing his absence. He was court-martialed for not putting in writing the cause of his absence, and yet that cause appeared in the Surgeon General's certificate, and nothing he could have written would have conveyed more information.

Mr. FOSTER. There is a law which says that when a man is not able to return to his command on account of physical inability, that when he files the evidence under the law he now gets an honorable discharge, although he might have been discharged as a deserter.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I am not sure about that.

Mr. FOSTER. This is the situation here. In this case the War Department could not issue to him under the law an honorable discharge for the reason that he was court-martialed and discharged from the service for his inability to return to his command before his leave of absence had expired.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Not quite that way, because the usual order would be to reinstate him, but the regiment having gone out of the service, the war having been over, such order could not be given by the War Department.

Mr. FOSTER. What I am getting at is this, that under the law a soldier has now, if he could show that he had leave of absence for 30 days, say, and failed to return within 30 days, in order to secure a discharge he must file an affidavit showing physical inability to return to that command within the time. If he does so he is granted an honorable discharge, although he is marked on the record as a deserter. But in this case it is because he was court-martialed, and for that reason they would not remove the charge against his record.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; and I want to state furthermore what the War Department said about my bill that I sent down for approval. It says:

With regard to your proposal to introduce a bill for the relief of the said John Treffeisen it should be stated that it is impossible to discharge the officer now because both he and the organization of which he was a member passed out of the military service of the United States and beyond military control more than 40 years ago, and that any change of the records to show a different state of facts with regard to his separation from the service will be a falsification of those records and will be an attempt, if embodied in any bill for relief, to exercise the power of overruling and reversing a valid judgment by statute.

It is easily possible, however, without any alteration of historical records or without attempting to exercise the power to overrule or reverse a valid judgment by statute to confer upon Capt. Treffeisen or any person claiming under him any right, privilege, or benefit to which he or such other person would be entitled if it were a fact that he was honorably discharged from the military service of the United States. Legislation with that end in view is the most that can now be done for the benefit of the officer in question, and in view of the facts shown by the record of his trial it would seem that some measure of the character suggested may well be enacted for his relief. If you take the same view of the matter and desire to introduce a bill for the relief of the officer it is suggested that the following form be adopted.

Then follows the form which is now the substitute for the bill.

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. What rights, privileges, or benefits does an honorably discharged officer have as distinguished from an honorably discharged private?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I really do not know. I will say this, that I have an affidavit here from this old man that he never expects to put in an application for a pension. That is not the object that he has in view. It may be possible that he may be entitled to it, for aught I know. I made no examination in regard to that because he has made a disclaimer. All in the world he wants is to have this stain removed from his name.

Mr. KENDALL. This is not a proposition to correct the record or to clarify the record so far as his case is concerned. It is to confer affirmative rights upon him. What are the rights that you are about to confer?

Mr. FOSTER. It exempts him under the civil-service law and also as to the right to homestead.

Mr. KENDALL. It will give him the same standing in the civil service and to make homestead entries that he would have had if he had served through his term and been honorably discharged. Is that the idea?

Mr. MANN. Oh, there is nothing about the civil service that this man would acquire.

Mr. FOSTER. In the case of a discharged soldier the age limit of 45 years does not run.

Mr. MANN. How old is that man?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. He is over 80 years of age.

Mr. KENDALL. And he has a large family?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. He has a large and a very worthy family.

Mr. KENDALL. Dependent upon him?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Absolutely. There are two or three of his children I think who are school-teachers.

Mr. KENDALL. It would scarcely be suspected that a man 82 years of age would have a very large family dependent upon him.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Some of his children are pretty old citizens, themselves.

Mr. KENDALL. I am not antagonizing the measure at all the gentleman will understand, but I was a little curious to know what the rights, privileges, and benefits contemplated here for an honorably discharged officer were as distinguished from the benefits that accrue to an honorably discharged private.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, as I said before, my attention has never been called to that, nor in my judgment is that the purpose that is sought to be accomplished.

Mr. KENDALL. That is the whole purpose of the bill as I understand it. It is to restore him to the rights, privileges, and benefits.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I would say not altogether, if this record was read in the light of the circumstances surrounding the case at the time of his dismissal.

Mr. KENDALL. He was dismissed as the result of a court-martial.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. As the result of a court-martial, because he did not make a written report of his absence.

Mr. KENDALL. Was he served with a notice of the sitting of the court-martial?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; and he appeared. He said he was absolutely dumfounded. He had handed in his doctor's certificate and he supposed that that was all that he had to do. At that time the most they had to do was to be upon the fighting line both day and night.

Mr. KENDALL. He told that to the court?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not know. The record is meager about that.

Mr. KENDALL. But they seem to have discharged him nevertheless.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; they did.

Mr. KENDALL. I suppose that was during the Civil War and before hostilities had been concluded.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes; it was in 1862.

Mr. KENDALL. This man, I take, is a man of very much more than ordinary intelligence. He was a captain commanding a company?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. KENDALL. What reason is there for the long delay in these intervening years, without seeking some method of having this difficulty removed?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I do not know. I am inclined to think that possibly one of my predecessors presented a bill upon some occasion some time ago.

Mr. KENDALL. Was it unfavorably reported?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. No; it was never unfavorably reported, but it was never acted upon. He has gone along in that slow, easy-going way of his, of course always resting under the belief, possibly, that at some time the Government would remove what he regards as a stain, and anybody, on referring to this record and considering the circumstances of the assembling of the court, seeing the doctor's certificate and the affidavits of the comrades, knowing his gallantry in the service and how profoundly sorry and surprised his comrades were at this action, would never for a moment come to the conclusion that there had been a proper adjustment of his case.

Mr. KENDALL. So surprised that the court-martial had acted as it did?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. So surprised that the court-martial had acted as it did. Now, I trust that this bill——

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Has this bill been referred to the War Department for a report upon it?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman have that report read in his time?

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] does great injustice to his usual alertness, for the main part has been read.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that these bills have been frequently vetoed, and I think the President, as a rule, has acted upon the recommendation of the War Department when he has vetoed a bill of that sort, and before we pass it I would like to hear what the department has to say upon it, if it is not too long.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will read the report.

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. This is an acknowledgment of the letter I sent to the department.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 30, 1911.

Hon. A. W. RUCKER,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 28th instant relative to the case of John Treffeisen, who was dismissed from service as a member of the Fifty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry for absence without leave. You state that a recent examination of the records of this office indicates that the officer was unjustly dismissed, and request an opinion relative to the matter in order that you may use the same before the committee when you present a bill for the relief of the officer, which you intend to introduce. With regard to the matter in question I have the honor to inform you as follows:

The court-martial records show that Capt. John Treffeisen, Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, was on October 7, 1862, arraigned before a general court-martial and tried on the charge of absence without leave, it being specified that, having obtained leave of absence from his regimental commander on September 4, 1862, to visit the city of Washington to purchase clothing, with the understanding that he was to return by 7 o'clock the same day, he did not join his regiment until the morning of September 10, 1862.

Capt. Treffeisen stated to the court that when he received the pass on September 4 or 5, 1862, it was near noon; that the distance to the city of Washington from the station of his command was 6 or 8 miles, and that, not being well, he required nearly all the afternoon to get there, and it was impossible for him to return at the hour stated; that the next day he was detained in his room on account of sickness until late in the afternoon, when he reported to a medical officer of the Army as being unable to return to his regiment; that the officer took his name and lodging place and visited him at his lodging every day until September 8, when he, the said Capt. Treffeisen, advised the officer that he thought that he was fit for duty and would like to go to his regiment; that he reported to the Surgeon General's office before leaving and received a certificate. That certificate is now on file in this department and reads as follows:

"SURGEON GENERAL'S OFFICE,
"Washington City, September 8, 1862.

"Capt. Jno. Treffeisen has been under medical treatment in this city; is this day discharged and will return to his regiment; fit for duty.

"MEREDITH CLYMER, Surgeon Volunteers."

Capt. Treffeisen stated to the court that the certificate quoted above was not received until late in the afternoon of September 8, 1862, and that on the next morning he started for his regiment, which he reached on the following day (the 10th) and reported to the colonel. Upon consideration of the statement referred to above and of another statement to the court made by the commanding officer of the Fifty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers to the effect that Capt. Treffeisen was absent from September 4 to September 10, 1862, and that he, the said Treffeison, had failed to make a written statement concerning his absence, as directed, the court found the said Capt. Treffeisen guilty of the charge of absence without leave during the period mentioned and sentenced him to be dismissed the military service of the United States.

As the sentence of the court was duly confirmed and the officer dishonorably dismissed the service pursuant to the terms thereof, it is beyond the power of the War Department to revoke, modify, or set aside the sentence, it being a well-established principle of law that there can be no revocation or modification of the sentence of a general court-martial that has been lawfully carried into execution, no matter how unjust or unmerited the sentence may be deemed to have been.

It is therefore beyond the power of the War Department to do anything to or in behalf of Capt. Treffeisen in the matter of changing his record or status as an officer dishonorably dismissed the service of the United States.

With regard to your proposal to introduce a bill for the relief of the said Capt. Treffeisen, it should be stated that it is impossible to discharge the officer now, because both he and the organization of which he was a member passed out of the military service of the United States and beyond military control more than 40 years ago, and that any change of the records to show a different state of facts with regard to his separation from the service will be a falsification of those records and will be an attempt, if embodied in any bill for relief, to exercise the power of overruling and reversing a valid judgment by statute.

It is easily possible, however, without any alteration of historical records, or without attempting to exercise the power to overrule or reverse a valid judgment by statute, to confer upon Capt. Treffeisen, or any person claiming under him, any right, privilege, or benefit to which he or such other person would be entitled if it were a fact that he was honorably discharged from the military service of the United States. Legislation with that end in view is the most that can now be done for the benefit of the officer in question, and in view of the facts shown by the record of his trial it would seem that some measure of the character suggested may well be enacted for his relief. If you take the same view of the matter and desire to introduce a bill for the relief of the officer, it is suggested that the following form be adopted:

"A bill for the relief of John Treffeison.

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged officers John Treffeisen, who was captain of Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 24th day of October, 1862."

Very. respectfully, F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant General.

Mr. MANN. Then I would like to ask the gentleman again, as I understand the gentleman was asked by the gentleman from Iowa, what are the rights, privileges, or benefits to an honorably discharged officer which this officer would acquire by the passage of this bill? As I understood the gentleman, he says that he does not know.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I would defer to him more than I would to anybody in this House to answer any question which I did not know myself, but that was not the object I had in the introduction of this bill, to have any benefit that might be derived, but the main object was that it would be a solace to him in his old age and also a help possibly to those of his family who may live after him to have this stain removed, and I believe the record in this case shows that if any one of the gentlemen of this House had been upon that court they never would have found this man guilty. It goes without saying that not a man in this House would have done it, so I believe the court-martial was actuated by some other motive than now appears, and can only be referred to some improper motive and did not warrant the act of dismissal.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, it is very easy to reflect upon the motives of a court-martial which was held 50 years ago, and I think it quite out of place to do so and that only upon an ex parte hearing on behalf of a man who complains that he was injured by a court-martial. Here is a bill reported to the House, with a substitute for the entire bill, without a line of information in the report, and when we ask what will be accomplished by the bill, it being expressly the purpose of the bill to grant certain rights, privileges, or benefits, the gentleman says he does not know what they are. There is no information about the bill in the report and when it is called up on the floor we can not ascertain what it will accomplish.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would just let me read an affidavit here from the comrades alive who were members of his company at the time, referring back to the time of these occurrences, as well as the affidavit of Capt. Treffeisen himself and his recognition by the Grand Army of the Republic, and I know he will agree with me that there was a grave miscarriage of justice in this case. I ask the Clerk to read those affidavits.

The Clerk read as follows:

AFFIDAVIT.

STATE OF COLORADO, Jefferson County, ss:

I, John Treffeisen, was born in Germany in 1833 and became a naturalized citizen of the United States in 1859. I have resided at Golden, Colo., ever since 1879, and before that in Pittston, Pa., from 1856 to 1878. From Pittston I enlisted on the first call of volunteers made by President Lincoln in April, 1861, for three months' service. After the expiration of that service I was honorably discharged at Harrisburg, Pa., July 29, 1861.

About September, 1861, I commenced to recruit a company for the Fifty-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered in as captain of Company C January 18, 1862, under Col. Meredith, Lieut. Col. Hoffman, and Maj. Smith.

Early in the spring of 1862 the regiment was ordered to Washington, and from there became part of Gen. McDowell's Corps, King's Division, Doubleday's Brigade, and later on became a part of Gen. Pope's command. In the retreat from Culpeper the regiment took part in all battles and skirmishes, including the second battle of Bull Run.

In coming near Washington I asked for leave of absence for a day to get me some clothing, as all our baggage fell into the hands of the enemy near Manassas and were burned.

Col. Meredith was wounded in our first engagement in our retreat from Culpeper, so Lieut. Col. Hoffman was in command at the time I asked for leave. Lieut. Col. Hoffman promised me a horse, so that I could get back in time, but failed to do so, and the pass had to be countersigned by the brigade commander, which took almost until noon, so I walked to Washington, about 10 miles.

On coming near Washington I was taken sick as the result of our great retreat from Culpeper, when we had to eat whatever we found. (Green corn tasted good then.) I stopped at the Prescott House that night, and could not return before the expiration of my pass. In the morning a doctor from some hospital visited the hotel, as there were several officers sick there. I did not ascertain their names or that of their regiments. I made myself known to the doctor, and he ordered me to stay a few days for rest, but I told him that I would be reported as being absent without leave, and he told me that he would fix it all right. So on the third day he brought me a certificate, explaining the cause of my absence. The following morning I got back to the regiment and reported myself to Lieut. Col. Hoffman. I produced my doctor's certificate, but the colonel did not accept or even look at it, but accused me of staying away purposely, using these words: "I know all about it." So the charge was preferred, "Absence without leave."

In connection with the charge of "absence without leave," the charge of disobedience for not making a report of my absence when asked by the acting adjutant, Healey, in the evening of the day of my return. Our army was continuously under marching orders in Maryland. The engagement at South Mountain and the Battle of Antietem were in progress, and so, under the circumstances, it was then neglected. Neither the adjutant nor Col. Hoffman ever said anything more about it, and I did not understand that besides a verbal report it was necessary to make a written report. I did not realize what it meant for not making my report in writing until it was brought up before the court, and then I was surprised and could not make amends for it any more.

I was always thinking that my verbal report would be so stated in the regimental report on that day I returned. This of course made the case worse, and in my astonishment did not make much of a defense. Whether Col. Hoffman had any ill feeling toward me I could not say, as he had always been very friendly toward me; although in an engagement a few days before the second Bull Run the regiment flag was lost, as the color sergeant skedaddled during the evening and a few more of my company, amongst them my first lieutenant then acting as adjutant that day. In retreating from the field of battle, the regiment was somewhat broken up, as it was dark. Picket line was drawn up and they opened fire on us. That night I gathered about 250 men from the regiment. Next morning I found the balance of the regiment about a mile in the rear from where we camped that night. I mentioned this incident, which might have caused some ill feeling toward me. (I would not say that it had.)

The etiquette of military law was not so strictly observed among us Volunteers. We were all citizens of the United States alike, keeping discipline as near as we could.

As I am nearing fourscore years and am on the end of my journey, would like so much to have the stain removed.

JOHN TREFFEISEN.

Personally appeared before me John Treffeisen, who is known to me to be the identical person whose signature is subscribed to the above statement.

Know all men by these presents:

That we, the undersigned members of Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Infantry of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and others of the same regiment, remember of the dismissal by court-martial of Capt. John Treffeisen, charges of absence without leave. It was rather a surprise to the whole company and regiment for so small an offense as absence of only three days on account of sickness, proven by the doctor's certificate, when, in fact, we were all played out on our retreat under Gen. Pope from Culpeper to Washington, having some severe battles and other skirmishes and being very short on rations—green corn was our daily ration. And we further testify that Capt. Treffeisen was always on hand when duty called him.

[SEAL.]

JAMES R. STANLEY,
Post Commander.
BEN F. SNYDER,
Post Adjutant.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I now ask for a vote, and I want to see the face of the man who votes against this bill. Furthermore, I want to say that I want to see justice done to these old soldiers. You young men can never appreciate the trials, sufferings, hardships, and privations to which they were subjected, but the time is now ripe and the occasion is here for the registration of your temperaments in such matters.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to the gentleman reading an affidavit, but as far as I am concerned, while that may be the best evidence that can be produced, I have very little confidence in an affidavit prepared by some interested person concerning facts which occurred 50 years ago. The Members of this House would not agree upon what occurred here 15 minutes ago, yet you undertake to say that after the tribunal which heard the case 50 years ago passed upon the facts which were presented, and the accused was there in person, that they did not know what they were doing, and you find it out now from an affidavit which some interested person prepares and gets people to sign to tell them they remember so-and-so.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. I ask, Mr. Chairman, that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further general debate, the Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The bill was read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 and insert the following as a substitute for the bill:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon honorably discharged officers, John Treffeisen, who was captain of Company C, Fifty-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 24th day of October, 1862."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill as amended will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. J. Res. 121. Joint resolution authorizing the use of certain unexpended balances to defray expenses incident to parting and refining bullion; to the Committee on Appropriations.

HERMAN HAUPT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 20613) for the proper recognition of services rendered by Herman Haupt during the Civil War.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, that is not one of the bills marked by Chairman HAY. The next one marked is Calendar No. 127.

The CHAIRMAN. That is on the calendar regularly, and is in order to be taken up first.

Mr. MANN. Neither one is in order.

Mr. SIMS. The Chairman of the committee [Mr. HAY] marked the calendar and left it with me and asked me to call attention to it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not know anything about what bills have been collected on the calendar for consideration. It may have been an entirely proper procedure.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that the only bills which can be called up now are bills removing the charges of desertion or bills to that effect. This bill has nothing to do with the subject.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That has been my understanding, Mr. Chairman, and I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not frankly think——

The CHAIRMAN. Just a moment. The Chair understands this bill is not under the order of the House. It is not for the purpose of relieving desertion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. No; it is nothing of that kind.

The CHAIRMAN. We will mark that bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the rule is to confine the committee to the consideration of the bills removing the charge of desertion, or providing some fellow shall have a pension, whether he deserves it or not, that does not come under that class.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] just left the calendar marked.

The CHAIRMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] if this is one of the bills that it is desired to bring up.

Mr. SIMS. It is Calendar No. 127, which is one marked by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. SLAYDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Has there been an order or a rule that only bills should be considered that undertake to relieve men from charges affecting their military record?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the order of the committee.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, this is a bill that ought to be passed, I think; but it is not in that category.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it ought to be passed, even though it is not in that category.

Mr. FOWLER. It says, "To correct the military record."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] on this bill if he insists it shall be taken up.

Mr. SIMS. I make no insistence about it. I will say it was marked by Chairman HAY as a proper bill to be considered today. I have no interest in it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill, and then we can consider whether it is a proper one to be taken up in the committee or not.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

An act (S. 4778) to correct the military record of John T. Haines.

Be it enacted, etc., That John T. Haines, deceased, who was a captain in the Eleventh Regiment United States Cavalry, and who was nominated by the President for appointment as major of Cavalry to rank from the 3d day of March, 1911, said nomination being confirmed by the Senate after the death of said Haines, which occurred after his nomination, shall hereafter be held and considered to have become a major of Cavalry in the service of the United States on the 3d day of March, 1911, and to have held that office until the date of his death; and the President is hereby authorized to issue a commission as major of Cavalry in the name of John T. Haines with rank to date from March 3, 1911.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is a bill that can not be called up under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN J. TROXELL.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5135) to correct the military record of John J. Troxell.

Be it enacted, etc., That the order dismissing Lieut. John J. Troxell, Fifty-second Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers, from the United States service be, and the same is hereby, revoked and set aside, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause such revocation to be entered in the military record of said Lieut. John J. Troxell and to issue to him an honorable discharge, to date from the 23d day of October, 1863.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not got to that point yet. If there is no general debate desired, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] ought to give a little explanation of this bill. From reading the report it does not seem to me there has been a very strong case made.

Mr. WILLIS. Does the gentleman mean as to facts involved or the form of the bill?

Mr. MANN. As I understand, the gentleman proposes to offer an amendment to put the bill in the usual form?

Mr. WILLIS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I would like just a brief statement. I do not wish to detain the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, the report the committee has made on this bill is a very fair statement of the facts in the case. They are substantially as follows, as I recollect them. I have gone over the evidence with care, as I am sure the committee did. Now, the facts are simply these: Lieut. John J. Troxell was acting quartermaster on or about September 1, 1863, at the time when the division of the Army to which he belonged was nearing Elktown, Tenn.

At the crossing of Elk River, near Elktown, Tenn., it appears that a wagon train became hopelessly stalled in going up a steep bank, as described here in one of the affidavits, namely, the affidavit by Col. Holmes, who commanded the regiment, and, as the colonel rather jocosely put it, the mule team "seemed to lose their sense of loyalty." At all events, the wagon train was stalled. The road was narrow and the progress of the army was blocked.

Just at this time the general in command of that division—Gen. McCook—came up. I presume the Members know somewhat of the record of "the Fighting McCooks." Gen. Dan. McCook was one of them, and far be it from my purpose to say anything derogatory of his splendid record as a soldier, but his best and most intimate friends admitted that at times he would fly into an ungovernable and unreasonable passion and accuse everybody of various offenses when they got into trouble. When he came up there and tried to get this mule team "into a sense of loyalty" and found he was not successful he immediately began to curse the lieutenant and abused him roundly as is stated in the record here.

The attack was so severe that when it was repeated a little later Lieut. Troxell tendered his resignation as an officer of the Army at the suggestion of Gen. McCook, and had every reason to believe that his resignation was accepted, since it was asked for by Gen. McCook.

Some time later—I believe in the year 1896, or somewhere along there—when Troxell sought to secure a pension he found in the records of the War Department, upon his application, that his resignation had not been accepted, and that Gen. McCook had made charges against him, charges that were not presented to Lieut. Troxell at all, charges to the effect that he was guilty of drunkenness, and that he was drunk upon the occasion when the wagon train was stalled and when the difficulty with Gen. McCook occurred.

It is shown by abundance of testimony, by the testimony of Col. Holmes, in command of the regiment, the testimony of Maj. Blackburn, the testimony of a large number of his comrades—I have all the affidavits before me here—that Lieut. Troxell was not drunk, and had not been drunk, and was not a drinking man at all, and that there was no such charge against him at the time that he was drunk or had been drinking. That charge seems to have been a sort of afterthought. At all events his resignation was not accepted, and it was recommended by Gen. McCook in a spirit of rage that he be dismissed the service. That action was had.

Subsequently when this question came up in 1896—I was right in regard to the date—a bill for the relief of Troxell was introduced by Congressman Bromwell, of Cincinnati, Ohio, in whose district Lieut. Troxell at that time resided. Mr. Bromwell had some correspondence with the department, and the letters are set forth here in the report, which in part is as follows:

[House report, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs have considered the bill (H. R. 2206) to correct the military record of John J. Troxell, referred to them, and report as follows:

John J. Troxell, now 73 years of age and a resident of Cincinnati, Ohio, was enrolled as a private of Company H, Fifty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, in May, 1862, Col. Daniel McCook being colonel of said regiment, and was on the 23d day of May, 1862, appointed by said McCook quartermaster sergeant of said regiment and was afterwards promoted first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster on the 20th day of November, 1862, which position he filled until October, 1863.

On or about September 1, 1863, at the crossing of Elk River near Elktown, Tenn., one of the teams in Troxell's charge as quartermaster became stalled by reason of the mules getting stuck in the mud in ascending the bank and for a while interfered with the passage of the troops. Although this was no fault of Troxell's, Col. McCook, who was then commanding the brigade, came up, fell into a great passion, and cursed and abused Troxell outrageously. Lieut. Troxell protested against this treatment. A few days after, when the regiment had reached Stevenson, Ala., McCook sent for Troxell and again cursed and abused him to such an extent that Troxell, in self-respect, stated that he would be compelled to tender his resignation. Col. McCook ordered him to hand it in at once, which he did. After handing in his resignation to McCook the latter ordered him to leave the regiment immediately and sent an officer to Troxell's quarters to take possession of his effects, not allowing him to take any of his books or papers and refusing to give him any receipt therefor. Troxell, in pursuance of McCook's orders, started toward Nashville, Tenn., but was stopped by an officer belonging to the headquarters of Gen. Morgan, of the Union Army, who, after hearing Troxell's explanation, ordered him to return to McCook, stating that McCook had no authority to order him away until the resignation had been accepted. He accordingly went back and again reported to Col. McCook. The latter became furious and stated that he would see who was the superior officer. McCook again ordered Troxell out of camp, and the latter having again reported to headquarters and explained the situation was passed through the lines and returned to Cincinnati.

Troxell assumed that his resignation had been accepted and that he had received an honorable discharge, and knew nothing to the contrary until September 10, 1896, when, in response to an inquiry to Col. Ainsworth, he discovered for the first time that instead of his resignation having been accepted as he supposed Col. McCook had preferred charges against him and caused him to be dishonorably discharged on the ground of drunkenness. Nothing was said to him at any time of any such charge, and as a matter of fact, he had never been drunk while in the service, and a number of affidavits of comrades, some of whom are still living and men of high reputation and standing, verify his statement that he was never known to be under the influence of liquor during the entire time that he was in the service. These affidavits are set out in full as exhibits attached to this report.

Lieut. Troxell having, in 1896, applied for a pension was for the first time made aware of the condition of his record by its rejection by the Commissioner of Pensions on the ground of his having been dishonorably discharged on a charge of drunkenness. Troxell immediately communicated all the circumstances to his Representative in Congress, and the latter wrote to Col. Ainsworth for an official statement of the record in the case. This was furnished November 15, 1897, and is as follows:

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, November 15, 1897.

Hon. J. H. BROMWELL, M. C.,
Cincinnati, Ohio.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 12th instant, received to-day, in which you request to be advised whether or not John J. Troxell, formerly first lieutenant and quartermaster, Fifty-second Ohio Infantry Volunteers, was tried by court-martial prior to his dismissal from service, I am directed by the Secretary of War to inform you that it is shown by the official records that the tender of resignation of John J. Troxell, first lieutenant and regimental quartermaster, Fifty-second Ohio Infantry Volunteers, was forwarded by the commanding officer of the Fourteenth Army Corps to the headquarters of the Department of the Cumberland October 22, 1863, with the recommendation that he be dismissed the service, and that he was dismissed the service in orders from the headquarters of that department, dated October 23, 1863. It does not appear from the records that he was tried by court-martial previous to his dismissal from service.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army,
Chief Record and Pension Office.

On this report from Col. Ainsworth, showing that there was no record of any court-martial in the case and that Troxell had been dismissed the service in orders from the headquarters of the department of the Fourteenth Army Corps, dated October 23, 1863, Troxell's Representative, Mr. Bromwell, of Ohio, addressed a communication to the Judge Advocate General of the Army on the 2d of December, 1897, of which the following is a copy:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 2, 1897.

Brig. Gen. G. N. LIEBER,
Judge Advocate General, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GENERAL: I wish to know whether on or about October 22, 1863, there was any regulation of the Army which permitted the summary dismissal from the service of an officer (first lieutenant) by a department commander without trial by court-martial, and will be obliged to you if you will furnish me that information.

My particular object in desiring this information is to enable me to decide whether it will be proper for me to introduce a bill for the relief of such officer. The certificate of Col. Ainsworth in the particular case referred to shows that said officer tendered his resignation, which was forwarded to the department headquarters by the commanding officer of the Army corps to which he belonged, with the recommendation that he be dismissed the service and that he was dismissed the service by orders from headquarters dated the next day. Col. Ainsworth says "It does not appear from the record that he was tried by court-martial previous to his dismissal from the service."

By furnishing the above information you will greatly oblige,

Yours, truly,

J. H. BROMWELL, M. C.,
Second District, Ohio.

To this Gen. Lieber replies as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL,
Washington, December 4, 1897.

Hon. J. H. BROMWELL, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Replying to your letter of December 2, 1897, I have the honor to say that there was no law or regulation specifically authorizing department commanders, during the War of the Rebellion, to dismiss commissioned officers without trial by court-martial, but such dismissals were made, sometimes unconditionally and sometimes subject to approval of higher authority, and I believe that the War Department has uniformly held that it is not within its power now to change the record or the status of persons so dismissed.

By section 17, act of July 17, 1862 (12 Stats., 590), the President was authorized and requested to dismiss any officer for any cause which, in his judgment, rendered him unsuitable for or whose dismission would promote the public service.

Very respectfully,

G. NORMAN LIEBER,
Judge Advocate General.

In this report it is shown to be a somewhat doubtful question whether an officer has the right to have a subordinate officer dismissed from the service without any sort of trial or court-martial.

I call the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill received the foregoing favorable report in the first session of the Fifty-seventh Congress. The report of the present committee, which is here set forth, is very largely a copy of that original report, and properly so. I call attention especially to the last paragraph of the committee report, where it is stated:

It would seem, therefore, that without any authority of law, on charges which had never been presented to Troxell for answer, and without any opportunity for defense against the charge of drunkenness, a dishonorable dismissal had been substituted for the resignation which he had tendered and had every reason to believe had been accepted. With one exception (that of Maj. C. H. Blackburn), all of the comrades who file affidavits herewith submitted are still living and recall distinctly the incidents in connection with Troxell leaving the Army. It may be added that they are also of good character and entirely reliable. Troxell took the first opportunity after learning of the error in his record to bring the matter to the attention of Congress by bills introduced in the Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses, but owing to the pressure of other matters before the committee these bills were not passed or considered until the present time.

The committee, in view of all the evidence before them, feel satisfied that Troxell's dismissal was without authority of law, that he has been treated very unjustly, and that his record should be corrected as provided for in the bill.

And this report is adopted by the present committee. I do not know whether I have covered the matter about which the gentleman from Illinois desired information.

Mr. RODDENBERY. I should like to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. We have not yet reached that stage. If there be no further general debate, the Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill with the following committee amendment:

Amend, by adding after the word "sixty-three," in line 10, the following: "Provided, however, That no pay or back pension or other emoluments shall accrue to said Troxell by reason of the passage of this act."

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute for the entire bill. This meets the objections that were raised before as to the form of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the soldiers' home for disabled volunteer soldiers, or any branch thereof, John J. Troxell shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from military service of the United States as lieutenant of Company H, Fifty-second Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 23d day of October, 1863: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "prior," add the words "or subsequent."

Mr. RODDENBERY. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is not to interfere with the reinstatement of this soldier so that his military record may go down in history correctly, as contended by gentlemen who are sponsors for the bill. It is perhaps unfortunate that in time of war high temper may manifest itself and that a soldier under those circumstances may be summarily dismissed or in some way his record not clearly appear. To that extent the corrections of these records often commend themselves to the good judgment of the House.

The proviso in the substitute of the gentleman is that in the straightening out of the record of this soldier no back pension shall accrue to him by reason of the passage of the act. The amendment I propose adds that "no subsequent" pension shall accrue to him by the passage of this act. If the gentleman simply seeks to give to this man Troxell a correct military status, the amendment I offer does not interfere with it.

If, however, the gentleman, under the guise of correcting his military record, is laying the foundation to get for him in the future a pension, then the amendment I propose will, of course, be objectionable to him. If it is solely and only to do military justice—to correct the result of an imprudent act of 40 years ago and give to this soldier a correct record—my amendment will not in any manner interfere; but I repeat again that the purpose of my amendment is to allow the correction of the military record of the soldier and at the same time provide that in the future no pension shall inure or accrue to him. I think it is proper in this case, because, so far as the report shows, he was in the Army only about a year. He was associated with the grub-dispensing department most of the time. There is no evidence that he sustained any hardships, and the report shows that the first time he encountered any actual service it arose by high water, when the mules got stuck in the mud. The soldier at once flew into a fit of anger, cussed out the whole machine, and flung up the job. He ought not to draw a pension for that public service.

Mr. WILLIS. If there is any reason why the record should be corrected, if as a matter of fact John J. Troxell was unfairly dismissed from the service, this House should so determine. There is no reason at all, in my judgment, why he should not be allowed to get a pension in the future.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he knows of a single instance in his experience in this House where a bill that carried on its face a declaration that it was intended to correct the military record, and usually supported by argument that it was to remove the stain for the benefit of the children, was not really designed to secure a pension?

Mr. WILLIS. I can not answer the gentleman's question, because his experience has been so much more extensive than mine; but he must concede that, so far as this proposition is concerned, I have been perfectly frank.

Mr. SLAYDEN. While the gentleman's frankness was not necessary to enlighten the House I commend him for it. A man who undertakes to get mules that are stuck in the mud in crossing a stream out of a situation is better entitled to a pension than many who are getting it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the bill as originally introduced in the House provided that the order dismissing this man from the service be, and the same is hereby, revoked and set aside. When this bill came up on the Private Calendar some days ago and that calendar was being called by unanimous consent the bill went over on objection. I objected to the consideration of it, because I do not think it is the province of Congress 50 years after an order is entered to pass a law revoking and setting aside the order. It would be a good deal like passing a law providing that the sun did not rise this morning. You can not change the fact. You may pass bills from now until doomsday on this subject and the fact still remains that an order was entered. Now the gentleman offers a proper proposition to the House, that in the administration of the pension laws this man shall be entitled to the benefits of the pension laws without attempting to falsify history. As that is the purpose of the bill I hope that his substitute may prevail without inserting the amendment offered by my friend from Georgia, which would render it valueless to pass it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

FREDERICK H. FERRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 21524) to correct the military record of Frederick H. Ferris.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Frederick H. Ferris shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a second lieutenant of the Seventy-fourth Regiment United States Colored Infantry on the 28th day of February, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH W. M'CALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 20339) for the relief of Joseph W. McCall.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon officers of the Volunteer Army in the Civil War, Joseph W. McCall shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as assistant surgeon of the Second Regiment West Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry (subsequently known as the Seventh Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry) from the 15th day of September, 1862, to the 15th day of October, 1862, and as assistant surgeon of the same regiment (Seventh Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Cavalry) from the 1st day of March, 1864, to the 15th day of March, 1864, and to have been honorably discharged from said service on the date hereinbefore last named: Provided, That no pay or other allowances shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this bill is not in order at this time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the bill may not be, strictly speaking, in order under the rules by which bills are in order to-day, but I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not make the point. Dr. McCall is 80 years old or over, and this is only a slight amendment to his record, and no pay or allowance follows. He is the father-in-law of the clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. James C. Courts. He is a very strong Republican, and his son is mayor of the city of Huntington, who was also a soldier in the Spanish War. While I am a Democrat and these people are Republicans, they are all honorable people, and I hope no mere technical objection will be made against the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

This bill proposes to allow this man service for 30 days at one time and 14 days at another. Perhaps it is 15 days. It says from the 1st of the month to the 15th of the month. I will leave the lawyers to wrestle out whether that means 14 or 15 days. But what good will it accomplish? The man has an honorable discharge from the service, the report says, although it says that he was never mustered into the service. What does this accomplish?

Mr. SIMS. He actually served from the 15th of September to the 15th of October, in fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the man has an honorable discharge?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order that I made.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; but from the former rulings of the Chair we must treat all alike. It seems to me that the Chair himself ought to pass on these bills.

Mr. SIMS. This is not a bill to remove a charge of desertion per se.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the gentleman from Tennessee may proceed.

Mr. SIMS. I will ask unanimous consent that I may proceed with the explanation of the bill and have it considered.

The CHAIRMAN. Very well.

Mr. MANN. What would be accomplished by the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Nothing, except to show that the doctor did serve one and a half months more than is shown by the record. The fact is that he served 1 month and 15 days longer than the military record shows.

Mr. MANN. What good does that do?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know, only that the old gentleman wants his record to be correct. The proof is ample that he did this service.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, he was not mustered in during that time, so that the bill will not show it as it is.

Mr. SIMS. The bill says to appear as though it was.

Mr. LANGLEY. He actually performed the service?

Mr. SIMS. He actually served this month and a half.

Mr. BUTLER. He did serve the time?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. And this is simply to make that service appear on the record?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. And make up this record and make it complete?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. He does not get a cent out of it and does not ask for a cent.

Mr. MANN. Oh, this bill passes because of the statement which the gentleman made, which has no relation to politics. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. And also because the gentleman from Tennessee is a Democrat.

Mr. SIMS. And that he is the father-in-law of the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, who is nearly the whole House of Representatives.

Mr. MADDEN. And the gentleman from Tennessee might add that the clerk also comes from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Of course.

Mr. LANGLEY. Oh, the gentleman always takes care of Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. I suppose that is a matter of general presumption and assumption.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further general debate, the Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM K. HARVEY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5763) for the relief of William K. Harvey, alias William K. Hall.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, William K. Harvey, also known as William K. Hall, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private in Company B, Seventh Regiment California Volunteer Infantry, on the 18th day of August, 1898: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I recall, this bill is to remove the charge of desertion growing out of the Spanish War.

Mr. KAHN. It is.

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to have some explanation of it.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, William K. Harvey enlisted in the Seventh California Volunteer Infantry Regiment on the 11th of May, 1898, at the Presidio in San Francisco. He enlisted for the purpose of going to the front to fight for his country. As a matter of fact, he learned that his regiment would not be ordered to the front. The regiment had been given orders two or three times to go to the front, and then the orders were revoked. When he finally learned that the regiment would not go to the front, on the 18th of August, 1898, he left the regiment and immediately applied under the name of William K. Hall for enlistment in the First Regiment Colorado Volunteer Infantry, in order that he might go to the front and fight.

Mr. MADDEN. What became of that regiment?

Mr. KAHN. That regiment went to the Philippine Islands, and this man served in all the skirmishes and battles in which that regiment participated. He was mustered out of the service with that regiment and received an honorable discharge.

Mr. MADDEN. Under what name?

Mr. KAHN. Under the name of William K. Hall. There is evidence to show that William K. Hall and William K. Harvey are one and the same person. The War Department says that the bill in its present form does not mutilate the records of the department, and they have no objection to its passage in that form. I ask now that the bill be read for amendment.

The bill was read.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that will be the order. There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I believe that completes the number of bills for the Committee on Military Affairs.

ROBERT ROSS.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, Speaker CLARK was mistaken awhile ago about the nature of the bill to which I called attention. He was under the impression it was a Senate bill.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the number?

Mr. FIELDS. Calendar 183, House bill 21315.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it the gentleman's contention that the bill comes under the order of the House to consider these bills?

Mr. FIELDS. It is my contention that it is of the same nature of the bills that have been passed here, and it should be acted upon at the present time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21315) for the relief of Robert Ross.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to remove the charge of desertion now appearing in the military record of Robert Ross, late of Company B, Sixty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the Army of the United States.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, the bill has been amended by the committee, and I ask to have the amendment read, which is in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, before we begin the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule, we would like to have an explanation and have some general debate on the bill.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill for the relief of Robert Ross, who enlisted on the 1st day of August, 1861, and the records show was mustered into the service on October 31, 1861; that he was with his command from that time until the 31st of May, 1862, when he was captured at Chickahominy, was confined in Richmond, Va., on the same day, sent to Salisbury, N. C., June 3, 1862, paroled September 13, 1862, and returned to his company October 10, 1862. He received a severe wound in the Battle of Fredericksburg, Va., on December 12 to 13, 1862, by shell contusion of the shoulder, and was admitted to a general hospital at Washington, D. C., on December 18, 1862. And he is charged by the records with having deserted therefrom on December 28, 1862, 10 days after he was admitted to the hospital. The proof in this case, Mr. Chairman, shows that this man was taken from the hospital by his brother. The proof shows that he was unconscious until a day or two before his brother appeared at the hospital and took him to his home in Allegheny County, Pa., and the proof shows to the satisfaction of your committee that this soldier was not able to return to the service during the war, and it shows further——

Mr. SLAYDEN. In that connection, Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question? Did this man take any steps while he was in that weakened physical condition to communicate with the authorities and submit certificates from physicians and others that he was in a physical condition that made it impossible for him to return?

Mr. FIELDS. The proof does not disclose that fact.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did he make any effort to collect any pay for his services during that time?

Mr. FIELDS. He makes the statement he did not know it was his duty to report and he was in a very bad condition, and, as we all know, it is easy for a sick man to overlook a point which may seem to him a point of small concern at the time, but which may be very vital to the case as it now stands. But the proof shows that he was never able to return to his command, and the proof further shows that he is to-day a cripple and unable to support himself as the result of the wound received in the Battle of Fredericksburg.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. As I recall this bill, the man was captured and imprisoned for a time and afterwards went back into the Union service and was wounded and sent to a hospital at Washington.

Mr. FIELDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. His brother came here and took him home?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes, sir; and the proof shows he was not able to return to the service, and the proof further shows that for three or four years after the close of the war he was an invalid.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is the only one strictly under the rule and the most meritorious one in the bunch.

Mr. SLAYDEN. How could his brother remove him from a hospital in Washington without the consent of the authorities?

Mr. MANN. They had the consent.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then the military record ought to show that.

Mr. MANN. Let me say to the gentleman, I went over to Montauk Point and got my brother away from the camp after the Spanish War. I had some experience with the Army officers. For instance, they had issued him a new suit of clothing which he never had worn at all. They ordered that taken away from him and burned for fear that it might communicate yellow fever coming from Cuba, but he came out of the camp wearing the suit that he had worn all through Cuba, by consent of the Army officers. And there were a number of other specimens of the same kind. I am not at all surprised that they let this soldier out of the hospital without making a memorandum of it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is to be presumed that in 40 years' time they have advanced a little in intelligence.

Mr. FIELDS. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that he did get out of the hospital, and as to how he got out that is none of our business; but he got out. And his brother did what I would have done under the circumstances. If my brother were wounded and in a hospital and I felt I could do more for him at my home, I would go to the hospital and remove him to my home if I could. I contend, sirs, that his brother did a patriotic act and that this man who went on the battlefield and offered his life as a sacrifice that the Union might not be dissolved should not be refused a pension in his old age. The proof shows he is not able, by reason of this wound, to support himself. The proof shows also, and to my own knowledge it is a fact, that he is crippled in the left shoulder and is not able to work.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. This soldier, I understood the gentleman to say, never returned to the service after he received this wound?

Mr. FIELDS. That is what the proof shows.

Mr. MANN. After he had been in prison.

Mr. BUTLER. After he had been discharged from the Confederate prison?

Mr. FIELDS. After he was removed from the hospital at Washington.

Mr. KENDALL. This soldier, after his release from the prison, went back to his command.

Mr. BUTLER. I want to know something. The soldier was removed from the Washington hospital and conveyed by his brother to Allegheny, Pa.?

Mr. KENDALL. That is not to be considered against him.

Mr. BUTLER. That is not to be considered against him, of course. Can the gentleman tell me why there was this long delay? The soldier must have known when he returned to the service he would be charged with desertion.

Mr. FIELDS. I am glad the gentleman brought that point up. I heard the same question asked to-day. We all know how difficult it is to get through a very great number of claims in one session of Congress, and we all know that there have been many claims of this character. This man had his claim in the hands of my predecessor, and it is my opinion that he has had it in the hands of every Representative from my district since he has been a citizen of the district, which has been since a few years subsequent to the Civil War.

Mr. BUTLER. That is long enough. That ought not to be charged to the soldier.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I want to be recognized for a moment. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing about the service of this soldier and nothing about the merits of the case. The record is not a very clear or very strong one; but I do want to take issue with one statement that the gentleman made. It is no business of this House to know how the man got out of the hospital. It is the business of this House to try to protect the Public Treasury by keeping the record straight.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman has misunderstood me.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, the gentleman said that. I could not misunderstand that.

Mr. FIELDS. I meant to say that in the proof that was furnished it was not our business or the business of the claimant. That is what I had in mind. If they let him out, it was his business to go.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But the record shows that he deserted from the hospital, and the gentleman says it is no business of Congress to know how he got out.

Mr. FIELDS. Well, his brother came and took him out. What I had in mind was the fact that he was taken away, and it was not our business to question how he was taken away, because the proof shows that he left the hospital.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, I want to make it clear, Mr. Chairman, that, in my judgment, it is the business of the Congress and of the House to know the facts in all these cases. We are asked to open the doors of the Treasury to unnumbered thousands of people charged with the military crime of desertion. As a matter of fact, this man had had considerable experience in the Army. He knew the nature of the offense of desertion. He must have known that it was his duty, if he was sick and in the hospital, to remain there unless removed with the permission of the authorities, and he must have known that he should have reported from time to time, and that he should have returned to the Army for discharge if unable to continue in the service, or to have resumed his service in the Army if able.

The gentleman makes another statement in his speech that, perhaps, explains why it is so easy to pass these bills, I may say, almost regardless of their merits. The gentleman says: "Those of us who come from pension districts know these difficulties." I have never noticed that gentlemen from pension districts have had difficulty in getting their claims through. If such a Member will only ascertain from the Commissioner of Pensions that this Government has paid out more than $4,200,000,000 since 1865 for pensions, and that now, nearly 50 years after the war closed, we are in the way of paying out approximately $200,000,000 a year more, almost entirely in consequence of the Civil War, he will be compelled, I think, to reach the conclusion that there are no great obstacles to getting pensions. And when one wants to have a record made straight; when one wants to know whether a man has been removed from the hospital by fraud; when one wants to know whether a charge of desertion against a soldier is well or ill founded, he ought to be able to get that proof somewhere. That is all there is in this case.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] referred, and I thought rather facetiously, to "gentlemen who represent pension districts." I want to say to the gentleman that I represent a pension district, and that my activity in pension matters is influenced largely by that fact. But I do not think I would take the extreme and adverse position that some gentlemen of this body take against remedial legislation for the old soldiers unjustly charged with desertion, even if there was not a veteran in my district.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill. The case stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FIELDS] is a strong one, and it is on "all fours" with many cases in my district. He has simply been a little more fortunate than I have been, presumably because he is a member of the committee and has succeeded in getting this bill before the House. I have been trying for six years, but without success, to get the Committee on Military Affairs to report a bill granting relief to an old soldier in my district who served over two years and a half. During this long service he was engaged in many battles. He reenlisted as a veteran volunteer, then went home on furlough, was taken sick, and could not get back to his command, nor could he get word back to his command explaining why he did not return, and as a result he was charged with desertion, and that charge still stands.

Many gentlemen do not seem to understand the conditions which surrounded soldiers in the border States like Kentucky. Oftentimes they were cut off from their commands, and it was utterly impossible for them to return, and to undertake to do so meant the sacrifice of their lives.

I have no doubt that many of them did not realize that unless they reported the cause of their absence they would be charged with desertion. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas that, so far as I am concerned, I think the committee is wrong and is doing a great injustice to many old soldiers by failing to act favorably upon these bills. Some gentlemen excuse it upon the ground that the general law on the subject affords them relief; but this is not the case. This law is narrow, and when applied to many cases that I know of is utterly ridiculous. For example, it requires that a soldier charged with desertion must not only show that he was prevented from returning to his command by reason of disability, but that such disability was contracted in the service and line of duty. But in many cases—in fact, I think in the majority of cases—especially where men were permitted to go home on furlough or leave of absence, the disability which prevented their return was not contracted in the service and line of duty, but originated after they started home or after they got home. A case like this does not come within the provisions of the general law, and yet the charge of desertion in such a case is just as unfounded and as unjust as if the disability did originate in line of duty. I know of a case where a soldier was prevented from returning to his command because he was a prisoner of war, and yet the general law does not provide relief in such a case as that. These instances serve to illustrate the truth of my statement—that the present law upon the subject is narrow, unjust, and, as applied to some cases, ridiculous.

There is a splendid field open to the committee of which my friend from Texas is a member to provide relief by special legislation in many meritorious cases which the general law does not reach. I am sorry that the gentleman from Texas takes the extreme view that he does of these cases, and I wish he felt a little more liberally inclined toward the old soldiers. I do not wish to inject politics into this discussion or into the discussion of any private measure of this kind, but I venture to say that the gentleman is not doing his party any good by taking this stand; nor do I think his colleagues from the South are helping their cause any by taking a like attitude which, in the main, they have done. I undertake to say that the South is deprived to-day of the honor of having a nominee for the Presidency in the person of the honored Speaker of this House because that distinguished gentleman has dared to champion more liberal pension legislation for the soldiers of the Union. But for that fact I believe that the Hon. CHAMP CLARK would be to-day the Democratic nominee for the Presidency, and might have been the next President of the United States. I do not see how any man could sit at the Baltimore convention, as I did, and listen to the roll calls and note the way in which States like Texas, Georgia, Alabama, and the Carolinas scurried away from the opportunity which was afforded them of choosing a southern man for President, nor analyze that vote, without reaching the same conclusion; and, while Bryanism had its share in the result, I still believe that the prime cause of the defeat of my distinguished friend from Missouri was as I have just stated it, and I believe the soldiers of the country know it, too. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further general debate the Clerk will report the bill for amendment under the five minute rule.

The bill was read.

With the following committee amendment:

Amend, page 1, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting as a substitute, the following:

"That in the administration of the pension laws Robert Ross, now a resident of Ryan, Ky., shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a private of Company B, Sixty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, on the 28th day of December, 1862, and that a certificate of honorable discharge from the United States Army be issued to him: Provided, That no pension, emoluments, or allowances of any description shall accrue by reason of this act prior to date of approval thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the several bills to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RAKER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry House bills, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, some with and some without amendments, and with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills do pass.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

The bill (H. R. 21524) to correct the military record of Frederick H. Ferris was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title will be so amended.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. SIMS, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present. It is perfectly evident to the Chair that no quorum is present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, July 13, 1912, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATOR FROM ILLINOIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution No. 315, submitted by Mr. LEA May 20, 1912, as follows:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

Mr. LORIMER. Mr. President, when I concluded my remarks last evening I was discussing the testimony of Holstlaw, and I stated that Link, Beckemeyer, and Holstlaw had always testified everywhere, in court and before the two committees appointed by the Senate to investigate the charges in this case, that they had never been promised or had any hope of any reward for casting their votes for me. But in order that there may be no doubt in the mind of any Senator as to whether or not I placed the correct construction on their testimony I will read it. This is the question by Judge Hanecy to Michael Link:

Q. Did you ever receive any money from Lee O'Neil Browne, Bob Wilson, or R. E. Wilson, whatever his name is, or anybody else, or from any source whatever, or did you receive any other thing of value at any time from anybody because you had voted for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was there ever any consideration moving to you, or to anybody for you, or for your benefit, in any place, from any source whatever, with the understanding that you were to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator, or if you had voted for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator, any consideration of any kind?—A. None whatever.

Q. Did you vote for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator for any other reason than that you liked him, and that you favored and that your people favored the things he favored in relation to the deep waterway from the Lakes to the Gulf?—A. That is why I voted for him.

That is the testimony of Michael Link. He is the man who has been heralded all over this country as one of the men who confessed that he was bribed to vote for LORIMER; and that impression has been sent out over this country by Senators who, had they been interested in establishing the truth, could have known that Michael Link testified in effect to this statement that appears in this record, twice in the Browne trial and once before the Burrows committee.

At no time and at no place did Michael Link ever testify that he ever received one dollar for his vote for LORIMER. Yet it has been charged for two and a half years, and has been repeated, parrotlike, on this floor, that he confessed that he was bribed to vote for LORIMER.

Let me say further that I challenge any of the minority of the committee to refute the sworn testimony of Michael Link. You are here now, and I appeal to you to refute it now if you can.

Now, the general impression is that Beckemeyer testified that he was bribed by Browne to vote for LORIMER. The average person in the country holds the opinion that Beckemeyer was approached by Browne and was bribed to vote for LORIMER. I think the testimony will show that Beckemeyer and Browne did talk about LORIMER's candidacy, but Beckemeyer testified that it was not Browne who persuaded him to vote for LORIMER, but that it was George Alschuler, Senator Hopkins's neighbor, a Democrat from Aurora, who went to the general assembly for no purpose other than to try to defeat Senator Hopkins.

Let me go just a step further. How did George Alschuler happen to go to the general assembly? I think it well for Senators to know the history of his candidacy and the reason for it.

Congressman COPLEY, now a Member of the other body, lives in Hopkins's town, Aurora. There had been a feud for a long time between the two men. Alschuler and COPLEY were personal friends. COPLEY went to Alschuler before the Democratic primaries time after time and pleaded with him to become a candidate for the general assembly for no other purpose than to defeat Hopkins if he could do it or to help in the defeat of Senator Hopkins if he could.

I do not think that appears in the record, but that is the truth. After much persuasion on the part of Congressman COPLEY, George Alschuler went to the legislature, and it is shown by the testimony in this record that George Alschuler devoted all of his time to persuading and pledging members of the legislature, Democrats, that at any time when it was possible to defeat Hopkins they would do so.

Luke was one of the men who was opposed to Hopkins, just as George Alschuler was. He was just as bitter toward Hopkins as George Alschuler was. Those men worked all the session constantly among the Democrats creating a sentiment through which if the time ever arrived Democrats would cast their vote for any man to beat Senator Hopkins. So George Alschuler, according to Beckemeyer's testimony, just before he cast his vote pleaded with Beckemeyer to keep his pledge that had been previously given to vote for a Republican whenever an opportunity presented itself to beat Senator Hopkins for United States Senator.

I am going to read Beckemeyer's testimony. Beckemeyer is the man who said that Lee O'Neil Browne gave him a thousand dollars and said, "Here is your Lorimer money." That is all there is in this testimony that in the slightest degree could create any suspicion of any kind that Beckemeyer ever testified that he was bribed to vote for LORIMER. I make this statement with reference to Beckemeyer based on what the record shows. This is a question to Beckemeyer:

Mr. HANECY. You knew the morning that Senator LORIMER was elected that you were going to vote for him, did you not?

That is the morning LORIMER was elected.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No; I will say that I did not.
Mr. HANECY. You did not know that?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir.
Mr. HANECY. When did you first know that you would vote for Senator LORIMER before you did vote for him?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. I can say that when I first made up my mind definitely to vote for Mr. LORIMER was at the time of my last talk with Mr. Alschuler, just a very few minutes before my name was called on the roll.

Will some member of the minority of that committee refute this statement? If you can, do it now, so that Senators may know who tells the truth concerning this record. Let us not have discussion over it after a while. The minority members are here in the Chamber; let them refute it now if they can.

Mr. BECKEMEYER. Our exact conversation I do not know, Mr. Hanecy, but he was rather, in a begging way, persuading me to stick and vote for LORIMER, as I had intimated before I would. I was wanting to quit then and not vote for him.

It is Alschuler he is talking about, who had pledged him during the winter to vote for anybody, Democrat or Republican, to beat Hopkins.

Now listen to this:

Mr. HANECY. You told Mr. Alschuler early in the session of the forty-sixth general assembly that you were going to vote for anybody to beat Hopkins, did you not?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. I think I did; yes, sir. I did.

Can language be plainer than that? Can anybody misunderstand that ordinary English?

Mr. HANECY. Mr. Alschuler was very much opposed to the reelection of Senator Hopkins, was he not?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. He certainly was very bitter against Hopkins.
Mr. HANECY. And that was a personal as well as a political feeling that existed, growing out of their close proximity to each other in their native town?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. It was a very bitter personal affair, as I understood from Mr. Alschuler.

Not Lee O'Neil Browne. He testified on the stand before this committee—and he never changed his testimony on that question—that he had not determined until they almost reached his name upon the roll call to vote for LORIMER, and then only after George Alschuler had persuaded him to do so.

Now, as to whether or not he was bribed, whether or not a pledge or a promise was made to him before he cast his vote for LORIMER:

Mr. HANECY. That was an investigation, as I distinguished it from a trial. [To the witness.] Mr. Beckemeyer, up to the time that you say you got the $1,000 from Lee O'Neil Browne, did Lee O'Neil Browne or anyone else, directly or indirectly, offer you or promise to pay you any money or other thing of value if you would vote for Senator LORIMER, or give you anything if Senator LORIMER was elected?

And here is Beckemeyer's answer:

No, sir.

Nobody had promised him anything, either before or after LORIMER was elected, for his vote for LORIMER. I repeat, this is Beckemeyer's testimony, and nobody who knows will claim that Beckemeyer was endeavoring to aid LORIMER in his testimony.

Mr. HANECY. Did Lee O'Neil Browne, at any time or at any place, before Senator LORIMER was elected on the 26th day of May, 1909, ever tell you that he or anybody else would give you any money or other thing of value afterwards, if you did vote for Senator LORIMER?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir.
Mr. HANECY. You did vote for Senator LORIMER for United States Senator, did you not?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. Did you vote for him because of any promise, agreement, or understanding, directly or indirectly, from anybody or from any source, that you would receive anything of value for voting for him, or after you had voted for him?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir.

Now, here comes your jack-pot insinuation.

Mr. HANECY. Were you willing to vote for Senator LORIMER for United States Senator without regard to any money or compensation or other thing of value being given to you by anybody?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did do it; yes, sir.

He was willing to so vote. He answered the question, "I did do it; yes, sir." It is as plain as the noonday sun that when Beckemeyer testified he testified that he did not have in his mind any thought of any sort that would lead him to believe or to think or to hope or to suspect that anybody at any time would give him anything for his vote for LORIMER. That is the testimony of Beckemeyer, the man who was debauched into desecrating his home in order that he might be driven to say—what? When before the grand jury three times he would not testify that Lee O'Neil Browne gave him a thousand dollars for his Lorimer vote, but when he left the grand jury for the third time somebody put it into his mouth and he testified to it in the trial of Lee O'Neil Browne that Browne said to him, "Here is your Lorimer money." Here is his testimony; but Beckemeyer, who is willing to say anything to save himself and his home, said that Browne added to it, "Here is your Lorimer money." Nobody will ever make me believe that to be true, and especially will they not make me believe it to be true as long as that testimony of Beckemeyer that I have just read to you remains undisputed and unrefuted in the record in this case:

I did do it; yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. What is that?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. I did do it; yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. Were you willing to do it all the time?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. Yes, sir.
Mr. HANECY. Was there anything in the way of money or compensation or anything of value moving to you, or anybody else for you, that was held out to you or promised to you, or indicated to you in any way, by Browne—

Not only Browne—or anybody else—

The limit was off; did anybody indicate to him—

or from any other source, to induce you in any degree—

Not to positively settle the question with him, but in any degree—or from any other source, to induce you in any degree to vote for WILLIAM LORIMER for United States Senator on the 26th day of May, 1909?

Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir.

Did you know how completely this man had testified?

Mr. HANECY. Did you know, or did you think, or did you believe, or had you any indication that if you did vote for Senator LORIMER for United States Senator that you were to be paid anything of value afterwards, or that anybody else was to receive anything for you, or on account of your vote for Senator LORIMER?
Mr. BECKEMEYER. No, sir.

It was never in his mind in the remotest degree at any time, either before or after, that he would be rewarded for his vote for LORIMER, or that he wanted reward, or that he expected that he might be rewarded. It was far from his mind that he would be bribed or was being bribed when George Alschuler, who gave up the whole winter trying to defeat Hopkins, persuaded him to vote, as he had promised, for LORIMER.

Mr. BAILEY. Was George Alschuler the Alschuler who was once the Democratic nominee for governor of Illinois?

Mr. LORIMER. No; George Alschuler is the brother of Samuel Alschuler, who was the candidate of the Democratic Party for governor of Illinois in the campaign of 1900.

Now, for Mr. Holstlaw's testimony, as it appears in the record:

Did you, at any time during that session, declare to anyone that you were willing to vote for a Republican for United States Senator?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I did not; not until late. Very late I did. I declared to some of my friends at home that I intended to vote for some Republican if we could not elect a Democrat.

Mr. MARBLE. How long before the time of the actual election was that; do you know?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I think probably four weeks—three or four weeks at least.

This is Holstlaw—

Mr. MARBLE. To whom did you make that declaration? First, just what was the declaration? Did you say what Republican you would vote for?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I think I first said that I would vote for some Republican rather than stay there very much longer; and finally I think I said that if I ever had an opportunity I would vote for Senator LORIMER.

Mr. MARBLE. You think you said all of that down home?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I think I did; yes, sir.

Mr. MARBLE. To whom did you make the first statement that you were willing to vote for a Republican?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I think the first statement I made was to J. B. Lewis, editor of the Democrat, in Salem.

Mr. MARBLE. And to whom else?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I think I told Mr. Bell.

Mr. MARBLE. Who is Mr. Bell?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. Mr. Bell is a merchant in Salem.

Mr. MARBLE. Do you know his initials?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. J. J. Bell.

Mr. MARBLE. Anyone else?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I told some of my friends at home, but I do not remember whom I did tell.

Mr. MARBLE. Do you recall who it was that you told that you would vote for Senator LORIMER if you got the opportunity?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I told Mr. Lewis that I would.

Mr. MARBLE. Anyone else?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I am not positive, but I believe I told Mr. Eddings—John Eddings, of our place. I think I did.

Mr. MARBLE. Of Iuka?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. Yes, sir; and I also told Capt. Schofield that I intended to vote for some Republican if we could not elect a Democrat.

Mr. MARBLE. You do not remember mentioning Senator LORIMER's name?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I do not think I did at that time.

Mr. MARBLE. Were these Democrats in your district to whom you talked?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. Yes, sir; all Democrats except one.

Mr. MARBLE. Who was the one?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. Mr. Eddings.

Mr. MARBLE. Did they concur in your view of the situation as to what you should do?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. They all did except Capt. Schofield.

* * * * * * *

Mr. MARBLE. Did you have any conversation with Mr. Broderick?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I did not.

Mr. MARBLE. You did vote for Senator LORIMER?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I did.

I think perhaps I am not reading the testimony as fully as I should, for I am of the opinion that Mr. Holstlaw must have meant at this time to convey the impression that he did not talk to Mr. Broderick at the time he was then discussing.

Did you have any conversation with Mr. Broderick?

This was when he was making up his mind to vote for a Republican, and this is what he said:

I did not.

His mind was already made up to vote for a Republican. He so testified.

Mr. MARBLE. Had you voted for a Republican before that?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I had not.

Mr. MARBLE. Did you believe what Senator Broderick told you when he told it to you?

Mr. HOLSTLAW. In regard to what?

Mr. MARBLE. In regard to the $2,500.

This is all from Mr. Marble's examination.

Mr. HOLSTLAW. I did not think very much about that, because I intended to vote for LORIMER anyway.

He never talked with Broderick when he was making up his mind. He made up his mind before he spoke to Broderick or Broderick spoke to him. When Broderick said "there is $2,500 for you," as Holstlaw testifies and as Broderick denies, Holstlaw said he did not think very much about it—

Because I intended to vote for LORIMER anyway, and that did not have any influence whatever with me.

He testifies that it did not have any influence whatever with him; that he had intended to vote for LORIMER anyway.

Now, listen to this statement:

Mr. MARBLE. You would have voted for Senator LORIMER if John Broderick had not spoken to you the night before?

The night of the 25th is the day he said Broderick told him there would be $2,500 for him, and Mr. Marble asked him the question:

You would have voted for Senator LORIMER if John Broderick had not spoken to you the night before?

And he answered:

I would, most assuredly.

This is the third alleged confessor; this is the man who it is charged was bribed to vote for LORIMER. Can anbody believe that if he had not been put through the third degree he ever would have stated that Broderick said to him, after he told Broderick that he was going to vote for LORIMER, and before Broderick asked him, according to his own testimony, to do so, that "there is $2,500 for you."

Have you ever stopped to think of the fallacy of the situation? Link, Beckemeyer, Holstlaw—two of them with their minds made up weeks before that—were going to vote for LORIMER, telling everybody with whom they conversed upon the subject, freely and openly, that they intended to vote for LORIMER; and that after they had made up their minds, after they had told everybody what they were going to do, according to their own sworn testimony, that somebody was going to come along some time afterwards and give $1,000 to Link and Beckemeyer and $2,500 to Holstlaw? What sort of economy is that? What sort of logic is that? Will anybody think that men who will give bribes, men who are boodlers, men who are in legislatures for the money they can make out of it, will give the money away when they are in possession of it and when there is no obligation of any kind on their part to give it away—that they will give it voluntarily to men who voted on the subject as freely as the best friends I had in the Illinois Legislature? Can you work out that logic? Can you yourselves believe it? Not for a moment.

Now, what is the testimony of Gillespie, the man who drew the Holstlaw statement. Let us see what he claims Holstlaw said as to whether or not he was bribed to vote for LORIMER. The chairman to Mr. Gillespie:

And still you understood from what he had previously told you that the payment of that money was not an inducement to vote for LORIMER, but he intended to vote for him in any event.

Now, that question is plain enough. Anybody could understand it. And here is Mr. Gillespie's answer:

Yes, sir. He stated he had intended to vote for Mr. LORIMER, and he thought he might just as well get the money as not.

Senator JONES. But he gave you the impression that the money was no inducement to him to vote for LORIMER.

Mr. GILLESPIE. Yes; just as I have stated.

Senator JONES. Well, why did you not suggest that that statement go in?

Meaning that the statement go into Holstlaw's so-called confession. It was not in the so-called confession.

Mr. GILLESPIE. I did not undertake to control his statement in any particular.

He did not undertake to control his statement in any particular, but this is the way Mr. Gillespie testifies that the statement was made up. He said he talked it all over with Holstlaw, and that then he drew the statement; that when he had talked it all over with him, and Holstlaw had made that statement to him, then he drew it himself and Holstlaw signed it. His answer is "I did not undertake to control his statement," when the only statement that Holstlaw made was the one that was drawn up by Gillespie—this man who was the attorney for the Tribune when he accepted employment from Holstlaw whose interests were opposed to the interest of the Tribune crowd who wished to establish corruption on the part of those voting for LORIMER.

Mr. HANECY. If you saw that he was not stating it just as he had stated it to you——

There is an interruption.

Mr. GILLESPIE. If he could have dictated the statement we would have permitted him to dictate his own statement.

When we found he could not do that, we examined him, as I have stated.

So it was on the examination that Holstlaw stated that he was going to vote for LORIMER anyhow.

Senator JONES. But, acting as his attorneys there, you did not deem it of importance to suggest to him that the language he had expressed did not correctly state what he had before expressed to you.

Mr. GILLESPIE. No; I did not consider it of any importance.

Holstlaw's interest was not an important matter to Gillespie, because Gillespie was employed by the Tribune to cooperate with the sheriff's office and the State attorney's office to apply the third degree to Holstlaw, and if he had put what Holstlaw said into the statement it would not have been as valuable to his employers—the Tribune—as he drew it.

This is heralded as a prosecution on the part of the people and for the people to banish corruption, but the very fountains of justice were corrupted, and lawyers of previous good reputation were employed as decoys to secure statements from an unsuspecting client that he had committed the crime of bribery and who at the same time arranged for immunity for perjury or any other crime committed by the person making the statement just so long as he would swear to something which might point to corruption in my election.

Does that look as though there was no conspiracy? I am not giving you my views, Senators; I am not stating to you what I think about it, but I am reading it from the cold type in the record, from these witnesses themselves, the men on whom they rely to remove LORIMER from this Chamber. Were they prosecuted afterwards? Did anything happen to any of them afterwards? Was anybody sought out for corruption in the legislature and prosecuted afterwards? No; but "swear that you got money to vote for LORIMER, and it matters not what else you have done, you are as free as the air to go and go forever without any punishment for any crime that you yourself say you have committed."

Did the Tribune try to prosecute anybody for crime? Oh, no. Did Wayman prosecute Beckemeyer? Did he prosecute Link? He tried to convict the man who White testified had bribed him, and if Wayman had convicted Browne, then the Tribune would have brought proceedings in the Senate to oust LORIMER from his seat on the ground that his election was corruptly secured by a man then on his way to the penitentiary.

If I had not myself, a month after this story was out, introduced the resolution for an investigation, there never would have been one, after Lee O'Neil Browne was acquitted, brought to this body by anybody representing the Tribune. It was not until after the Senate had sent to the committee a resolution I had introduced, asking for an investigation, not until the Senate was under way and the Tribune thought they would lose ground if they did not come here and say something, that they sent their handy man, Albert Barnes, the president of the Uplift Municipal Voters' League, consisting of about 10 men in the State of Illinois, under the domination of the Tribune, to make a statement that he himself swore he got from the Tribune, and that he, himself, did not have the facts to substantiate the affidavit that he made and sent to this body.

Of course this has no earmarks of conspiracy. This looks just like the people rising up in their might, determined that corruption shall no longer influence the election of United States Senators; only the people. Oh, if all the people in this land could know the story as it is written in this book they would drive that band of hypocrites out of the country, and the day will come when the people will know the truth. If God spares me years and strength they will know it from one end of the land to the other.

I have said about all I am going to say about these four witnesses, but what I have said, what I have read, was from the record, and I challenge anybody to point out by the record that I have not stated the truth without anything added to it or anything taken from it.

I can understand how people can be led astray. This is not the only attempt to drive a Senator from this Chamber by a conspiracy. It is not the only attempt to drive a Senator from this Chamber through a conspiracy who sits in this Chamber now. And as they started it it was very much more a complete case against a Senator than any testimony which has been given by Charles White in this case, and surely it would have confused Senators if the truth finally had not been brought forth.

I refer to Senator PERCY, of Mississippi. Do you know the history of his case? He voted against me. I am not his champion, nor have I the slightest feeling in the world against him, because I believe that he voted his convictions on the misinformation which he had at that time and on which he based judgment. I would not have a man in this body, if I controlled it, who would not vote his convictions, but I would have him know the facts before voting on an important question like this.

Senator PERCY was a candidate for United States Senator before the Mississippi Legislature. A senator, a member of that body, named Bilbo, stated before a grand jury that a man named Dulaney came to him and asked him to help elect Senator PERCY. He said if he would help him and vote the way he wanted him to vote, he would give him a thousand dollars, and would pay it to him in installments, $500 before and $500 after the election. Bilbo claimed that he received $150, the first payment, and that he took it over to his room and put it in the sweatband of his hat. Then he went to the Democratic caucus, and when he got there Dulaney asked him to vote for some person other than PERCY, who received 2 votes, and he said that he did so. He said the next day Mr. Dulaney gave him a package of money and said, "Here is $150." He said he counted it and found only $145. He went to the caucus again, and again the next day Dulaney gave him $50, and he said he took all the money and put it in his pocketbook and kept it there.

Then they caucused again. Senator PERCY was nominated, and after the nomination he was elected. Bilbo said that after PERCY was elected he went to Dulaney's room and he got $300 more. That was $645 in all. He testified that he was a friend of Gov. Vardaman and that he wanted to help Gov. Vardaman.

If he had wanted to help Gov. Vardaman, when he got the first $150 and went to the caucus, it was his place to rise in the caucus with the $150 in his hand. He said he was only doing it as a detective to catch these corruptionists. He should have risen in the caucus and said, "Here is $150 I got from Dulaney to help elect PERCY. He wants me to vote for Mr. So-and-So and I am not going to do it. I am going to find out what is going on here. PERCY's friends are trying to corrupt the legislature."

Did he do that? Oh, no; he did not do it. He did do, he says, what Dulaney asked him to do. Then he went to him again and got the other $150, and they had the next session of the caucus. Did he rise and say, "Now, I have $295 here"? No; he sat there with $295 in his pocket, he says.

Then they had another caucus. When he went back to that caucus he had the extra $50 in his pocket. That made $345, and he said he voted as Dulaney asked him to do. He did not rise and say "I have got $345 here that I got from Dulaney to help elect PERCY." No; he just voted, and he permitted the caucus to nominate Senator PERCY.

The legislature met the next day. According to his testimony he still had the $345 in his pocket. He, with $345 of corrupt money in his possession, allowed that legislature, without a protest from him, to elect Senator PERCY, when he might have risen in the legislature, handed the money to the speaker or laid it down on the desk, and said: "There is the money that I received to vote for PERCY. I am not going to vote for him. You had better have an investigation of this matter before we elect anybody to the United States Senate and see if they have not attempted to corrupt other members of this general assembly besides myself." Did he do that? No.

PERCY was elected. Then Bilbo said he went further. When he had caught this man for bribery three times, when he could have stopped PERCY's election, he said that he went back to Dulaney again and got $300 more, when it was all over and he had not helped; that is to say, he had not voted for PERCY. That made $645 that he collected. He said he took $145 and put it in his pocketbook, took the balance home and gave it to his wife and asked her to keep it for him and for her to be sure not to allow any change of the bills, because he wanted to use the identical bills that he had received.

Then he went before the grand jury. The foreman of the grand jury testified in the Dulaney case that Bilbo swore that the money which he produced before the grand jury were the identical bills that he got from Dulaney and with which Dulaney either did or tried to corrupt him. Dulaney was indicted. The foreman of the grand jury turned the bills over to the sheriff, and the sheriff took the numbers of them, took a description of them, so there could be no doubt when this money was presented in the trial of the case that the sheriff was producing the same identical bills that Bilbo produced before the grand jury and on which Dulaney was indicted.

Then came the trial. You say people will not do wrong. Do you say people will not do wrong, that they will not try to get even with their enemies by destroying them forever and ever? But what was the result of the trial? The money was brought in, and it was laid down on the table, and on investigation it was found that some of the bills Bilbo said he had received from Dulaney were not made, were not printed, were not in circulation until after the date when he swore he received the money from Dulaney. The modesty of Senator PERCY prevented him from telling that story to the United States Senate, but that is the fact. That is what the record in the case shows.

Now, suppose that had not been discovered. That was the turning point in the case. Suppose they had not discovered that these bills were made after he swore he received them; Dulany would have been sent to the penitentiary—I believe he would. Then they would have come here to the United States Senate and asked for an investigation. They would have brought the money with them.

I am reminded by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] what I had forgotten, that the only reason why they investigated these bills was because some of them happened to be very new bills—brand-new bills—and that attracted the attention of somebody, and they made the investigation, and they discovered it. If they had been carried around in the pockets of some people, perspiring for two or three days or a week, that would not have been discovered. But supposing they had not discovered it, Dulany would likely have gone to the penitentiary. They would have been here asking for an investigation. They would have presented a transcript of the record of his trial and conviction, and probably the proper paper from the warden of the penitentiary to show that he was there. They would have brought the bills with them. They would have laid them down before you: "There is the money. He did not take it because he wanted money. He took it because he wanted to purify politics in Mississippi. He wanted to catch the corruptionists."

How would Senator PERCY have answered? What would he have said? "Here is the money. Look at it. That is what I got." What could you have done? What could I have done with such testimony as that? Yet because the few bills happened to be new and it was a suspicious circumstance; somebody investigated it and they found that they were made after Bilbo said he received them, and that ended the case, and that is why there was no contest brought before the Senate to unseat Senator PERCY.

That I state without any official authority, but what they were trying to do was to destroy PERCY.

Now, how does that work out? They thought they would beat PERCY in the caucus, and they were defeated. PERCY was here. He had his enemies in Mississippi just as I have mine in Illinois. They were determined to find some way to destroy him, and they concocted that scheme after he was here and got the man indicted. They thought they would send him to the penitentiary just as the Tribune thought they would send Lee O'Neil Browne to the penitentiary. When they got him there they would have been here just as the Tribune would have been here if Lee O'Neil Browne had been sent to the penitentiary; and the Tribune never would have been here if I had not introduced the resolution myself for an investigation into this matter, because Lee O'Neil Browne was not convicted, and they had no testimony to present in this case except the testimony of White, and if they could not make the White testimony stick, then what was the use of coming to the Senate of the United States? If they could not make it stick back there in Chicago, where they control all the newspapers, where the public sentiment was so strong against LORIMER—if they could not pick 12 men there that would convict Lee O'Neil Browne, why should they come here?

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] suggested in a very, very veiled way that it would be impossible on account of the bipartisan system to convict any politician in Chicago, the inference naturally being that the crowd that ran with LORIMER controlled the jury system.

But the facts, Senators, are these, that the best men in Chicago are on our bench, about 30 in all, judge of the county court, judges of the circuit court, judges of the superior court. The jury commissioners, the men who select the names of those who are going into the box, the men who control the drawing of jurors, are three men who are appointed by the judges.

When the inference is to be drawn from an insinuation made that the jurors were corrupt and that because on account of the bipartisan condition in Chicago it is impossible to convict a politician, it amounts to a statement that the judges on the bench in our county are not honest men, but that they are corrupt. That is where it works its way to.

With this testimony that they would have had in the case of Senatory PERCY, the money in hand, White comes here. He said he got the money; he said he got $1,900; he said he spent it all in debauchery, in getting drunk, in riotous living. He brought no money here; but he said that he went into the legislature to find out who was corrupting the legislature, to take the money, and to expose the corruption. When does he expose it? After all that money is gone; after he is broke; after nobody will give him employment, except that which he refused, that I secured for him.

Then he started out to get money. How much? Seventy-five thousand dollars. He did not get that from LORIMER. Then he went to the Chicago Tribune. Fifty thousand dollars was what he then wanted. They all swear that he got $3,500. Look at the difference in the testimony—Bilbo, with the money in his hand, and it was discovered that he was a conspirator trying to destroy the life and the reputation of one of Mississippi's best citizens. Compare it with the man who gets paid for swearing to a falsehood that he had received a thousand dollars to vote for LORIMER.

Do you think, will you say, that we have not disproven what White said? I think the record will show that it has been disproven. He hung his whole story on the statement that nobody had ever talked to him about LORIMER's candidacy. He claims he never said to anybody he would vote for LORIMER until he told it to Lee O'Neil Browne, when Browne, he said, bribed him. We have not got the bills, disproving the claim as they had in the Percy case, but we have got the testimony of Representative Shaw, the man who led the fight against LORIMER among the Democrats; who, everybody admits, was a truthful witness; who had a reason to talk to White about it; and he testified that he talked to White and pleaded with him not to vote for LORIMER, but White said, "If I ever get a chance I am going to vote for BILL LORIMER." He told John O'Neil a week before LORIMER was elected—and I do not think anybody will dispute or question John O'Neil's testimony—that he was going to vote for LORIMER; he told a motorman that he had worked with, whom he met in Chicago, and whom he invited to come down to the Briggs House on Sunday morning of the 23d of May, on the day before he said that he met and talked with Browne in his room, and he told him he was going to vote for LORIMER. There you are!

I said that White told me 10 days or a week before I was elected that he intended to vote for me, and he himself volunteered the statement. Suppose you say that I have a motive for perjuring myself—nobody has ever questioned my word until this day—but did not White have a motive for perjuring himself? He had $3,500 for his perjury. You say I have a seat in the Senate. While I regard it as the greatest honor that the people can confer upon one of their citizens to give him a seat in this Chamber, I doubt if I appreciated it or do now appreciate it any more than White appreciated money, no matter where or how he got it. So, then, the motives, if you want to put it that way, are equal. Charles A. White swore on the stand that he was a liar and a perjurer; I at least did not do that; and my word should be as potent with Senators as is the word of a man who on the stand swears under oath that he is a perjurer.

Oh, it is an easy matter to destroy a man. How easily Senator PERCY would have been destroyed; and he is not the only man who has enemies in his State, either; he is not the only man who sits in this body against whom false charges have been brought.

I have looked over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and will call the attention of the Senate to an instance of what people will do in this world. Those who favor turning LORIMER out seem to think that everything that White said that would injure LORIMER must be the truth; that, of course, there was no reason for him telling anything but the truth; and therefore his statements were true. But we have evidence that another Senator was maligned. Why? I do not know; I have not been able to ascertain; but the RECORD shows the sworn charges, and the subsequent history is evidence that he was maligned.

If Senator CRAWFORD is in the smoking room, I wish a page would invite him to come into the Chamber.

[After a pause Mr. CRAWFORD entered the Chamber.]

Mr. LORIMER. While you were absent, Senator CRAWFORD, I called the attention of the Senate to the effort on the part of the enemies of Senator PERCY, of Mississippi, to destroy him by trying to send a man to the penitentiary for trying to bribe a member of the Mississippi Legislature to aid in electing Senator PERCY, and how, with the evidence they had on hand, if he had not been able to refute it, they would have absolutely destroyed him. I said there was another Senator in the United States Senate—as showing that all men are not free from conspiracies—who had a conspiracy, as this record would indicate to me, concocted in his State to destroy him, and I wanted to have you in the Chamber when I read the affidavit; and as I read it I should like to have you think of this foul effort to destroy you and compare it with the testimony in this case on the part of White to destroy LORIMER, and see if you can find any sort of analogy in these affidavits by these men who, as they stated, were, first of all, willing to do anything in the world to get money, and then, to get more, willing to do anything else. Here is the affidavit:

COUNTY OF BEADLE, State of South Dakota, ss:

Thomas H. Thompson, being first duly sworn, on his oath deposes and says: I am 23 years of age, having been born June 21, 1882; am clerking for my father, Thomas Thompson, in a men's clothing store in this city (Huron).

In the fall of 1903 Julian Blount, who is a stenographer for Crawford & Taylor, lawyers, in Huron, S. Dak., came to me and asked me if I did not wish to go with him and take up a claim—

Referring to Government lands—

I asked him, "Where?" and he replied, "In Walworth County." He told me I could make $100 for my right and have all my expenses paid; that if I took the claim Mr. COE I. CRAWFORD would pay the expenses and give me the $100 when I made proof. He said that Harry Lampe and Floyd Valentine had taken a claim under the same conditions before.

I told him I had not used my right, and that I would go. We—Valentine, Lampe, and Blount—started for the land some time in the early part of November, 1903. We went to Bangor, where Blount and myself filed on land. We drove out to CRAWFORD'S ranch before filing on the land and looked it over. Mr. COE I. CRAWFORD'S brother met us at Java, I think, and drove us out to the land. We then went to Bangor to the courthouse and made the filing. I do not know before whom we filed nor do I remember the description of the land. Couple of months later we made another trip from Huron to the land and stayed overnight. Valentine, Lampe, and Blount, and myself went on this second trip. Mr. COE I. CRAWFORD accompanied us from Huron to the ranch and paid our expenses and railroad fare on this trip.

The improvements on the land I filed on consisted of a shack 8 by 8 feet, 6 feet high. I do not know who built the shack.

The next trip I made was in the fall of 1904. The three young men named above went with me on this trip, or, rather, the three young men went the day before I did. I was sick and did not leave until the day following, and when I got to Aberdeen Julian Blount met me and said there was nothing to do and that I could go back home. I did not see Mr. CRAWFORD on this trip. Mr. CRAWFORD paid my expenses on this trip also.

Several months after I filed Julian Blount came to my house and gave me a check for $50. This check was made out by Mr. CRAWFORD.

About a year ago—I can not recollect the day—Harry Lampe came in the store and said, "Let us go up to CRAWFORD'S office and get the balance of our money." I went with him, and, as I understood it, Mr. CRAWFORD said we were not to prove up on the land and that I should sign a relinquishment. I remember signing a paper at that time or what I supposed was a relinquishment. Mr. CRAWFORD was busy at the time and did not say much else about the land. He paid me the balance of the money on the deal, $50, in the form of a check, signed by the firm name of Crawford & Taylor.

I have not been up to the land since, nor has Mr. CRAWFORD talked to me about it since I received the money. The land I slept on and on which I filed is about 2 miles from his ranch house. I do not know whether it is in his pasture or not. My only idea in filing on the land was to make $100. I had no intention of making my home on the land or of giving up the business I was engaged in in Huron.

THOS. H. THOMPSON.

Sworn and subscribed to before me this 26th day of February, 1906, in room 53 of Kent's Depot Hotel, Huron, S. Dak.

M. D. MCENIRY,
Special Agent General Land Office.

That purports to be an affidavit, a sworn affidavit, stating that this man violated the law. If true, he would have been indicted and probably would be now in the penitentiary. Is it true? All the circumstances surrounding it deny the truth of that affidavit. A grand-jury investigation was had in that neighborhood. The jurors were selected from the people in that community. If my memory serves me right, it was a Federal grand jury. If my memory serves me right, the district attorney, or somebody that was trying to prosecute, was piqued because he did not succeed. The grand jury called in the witnesses and they testified; and the grand jury returned a "no bill," and they cleansed the skirts of this Senator from the charge of corruption.

But take the affidavit there, naked, as it stands, without knowing more of it than just the reading of it, and what would be your natural conclusion? That there must be something in it; that there must be some foundation for it, or no man would charge it, because it would be perjury, and he might be sent to the penitentiary if he should be convicted of perjury. But a jury of the best men of the community investigated this charge, and they said there was nothing in it.

Has Charles White made any kind of a statement before your committee stronger than that affidavit? I think not. And yet you are to turn a man out of his seat on testimony no stronger than the testimony that would have destroyed that Senator, and he would not have been here if a jury of his peers had believed that he was capable of that act.

"They have conspired against a man for nothing," LORIMER says. "Nobody would do such a vile thing as he claims," you answer. You have the record of Senator PERCY'S case. You have that affidavit, and you have the judgment of a jury of disinterested men that stamps it untrue. And yet Senator CRAWFORD would turn me out of this body on the testimony of a man who, according to the evidence we have, is more foul than he who made that affidavit.

I will not believe, on the sworn statement of a man who swears he was corrupted and knew he entered into a corrupt deal, that the testimony of that sort of a man is as good as the testimony of any man whose word, whose reputation for truth and for veracity has never been challenged, much less successfully attacked. And so they might, as the Senator from Indiana says, stack "mountain high" affidavits like that they have in the record against Senator CRAWFORD, but in the face of the results they will never make me believe that he corrupted a man to make a few dollars or to get land that did not and could not honestly under the law belong to him.

I do not ask for the Senator's vote. I am not pleading with the Senator for his vote. But I am asking him if, in all reason, with that awful experience that he had, similar to this that I am having, excepting only that all the press of the land was not trying to destroy him—with that experience, does he not think he ought to weigh carefully, thoughtfully, meditate long and often, before he votes to destroy his fellow man on testimony like that?

Why, Senator, if you had lived in my city, if for 25 years you had refused to bend your knee to the trust press of the town, if they had searched your record from the cradle until the moment you entered this Chamber to try to find just one act, no matter how trivial, on which they could base a slander through which they might destroy you, and in the end a creature like this man White, a man who would sell his soul for money, had made that affidavit in Chicago, the circumstances being the same, oh, how they would have jumped for it. Oh, how they would have grasped it. And controlling the State's attorney as they did John Wayman, controlling the most powerful law officer of the State as they controlled John Wayman, what happened to Lee O'Neil Browne would have happened to you. They would have gotten more perjury, as they did in this case. They would have indicted you, as they indicted Lee O'Neil Browne. That you would have been discharged on the trial of the case I have not the slightest doubt. But your reputation would have been assailed; and where the people did not know you they would have thought of you as they think of me—that I am the vilest, foulest creature on the earth—because they have been misinformed.

Yes, Senator CRAWFORD, that is what would have happened to you; and as far as they could they would have destroyed you. They never would have finally succeeded any more than they succeeded in convicting Lee O'Neil Browne of buying White's vote for LORIMER. But you would have had these awful assaults, and I do not know whether you could have lived under them or not. I hope you would have had the courage, and I hope you would have been fortified with the truth and the knowledge that it was known to you at least, and to your God, that you were not guilty and never had been guilty, in which case a clear conscience would have given you the strength to go on and on and on, and fight the battle of a man to clear your name from such foul—oh, such foul, foul persecution.

No, Senator CRAWFORD; vote as you did before; have your name recorded among those that vote to drive me hence, and I shall not believe then that you are that kind of a man. But surely, surely having gone through what you have gone through I am entitled, at least from you, to a fair consideration of the evidence. If anything, it ought to be in your mind that I am entitled to the benefit of the doubt instead of charging me, as you did in your speech last year, with being capable of organizing the Illinois Legislature for "dark-lantern purposes."

Senator, there was nothing in the record to justify that statement. But "dark-lantern purposes" was passed from mouth to mouth all over the land. It was taken from your speech, and thousands upon thousands of people got the impression that LORIMER was a man that went out in the dark of the night with a mask on his face, a gun in one hand, and a dark lantern in the other, despoiling the people of their property and of their rights, and that because he was that sort of a character he had debauched a legislature and bought a seat in this body. And, of course, if it be true, he should be driven from this body—not by a divided vote, but by the vote of every Senator occupying a seat in this Chamber.

I wish now to call the attention of Senators to what actually has been going on for the last two and a half years in this case. I want to call your attention to things that you have never thought of, and surely have you never thought of them in connection one with the other.

Charles A. White made the affidavit. You have his story. When I spoke in this Chamber on the 28th day of May, 1910, there was no evidence anywhere that Charles White was paid for his testimony. Nobody knew except those who were prosecuting this case that Charles White had ever received one dollar. But I knew the situation in Chicago. I knew my enemies. I knew that there was nothing under the sun to which they would not resort to destroy me; and I knew that Charles White was paid for his lies, and I stated it from yonder desk in this Chamber.

Then in the trial of the case the evidence came out that Charles White had been paid $3,500, and the contract was secured from him on the stand. Probably I should not say this, because it is not in the record, but it is no fault of mine that it is not in the record. I do not believe that the contract produced by Charles A. White was the original contract. I was informed that a man named Semmes saw the original contract, and that the original contract provided that Charles A. White was to get so much money for his testimony down, and at the end of the trial, if Lee O'Neil Browne was convicted and sent to the penitentiary, he was to get the balance of it. Then after a consultation they discovered if that ever was shown they could all be sent to the penitentiary for conspiracy, and they withdrew the contract and drew up the one that was presented to the committee. Semmes was a street car man. We have looked high and low all over the country for him. We have not been able to find him. Whether that statement is true or not I can not tell, but true it is we have tried to get Semmes to find out whether or not it was a true statement.

White gave the affidavit. White swore against Browne twice. White swore in the investigation twice.

Then what came next? They had not put Browne in the penitentiary, and they had not driven LORIMER from this Chamber. The evidence they had had never connected LORIMER with anything unlawful nor with any wrongdoing. So, to prove that LORIMER really was a corrupt man and that he was capable of doing things of this sort, they organized another conspiracy. We have never had an opportunity to go very far into this, but we have enough to show the conspiracy.

Keeley, of the Tribune, testified on the stand that a man named Glavis came to him and told him he could get books, papers, or records that would show that LORIMER, when a Member of Congress, was acting corruptly, and if he was acting as they said, he should be in the penitentiary.

They gave the man $750. Mr. Keeley said so. Mr. Keeley said it was to procure the records that would prove the charge. It went on I do not know how long, but finally Glavis, for some reason or another, did not make good. Members of the committee were charitable enough to say that they thought Mr. Keeley had been fooled—buncoed, so to speak. That is what Mr. Keeley said, and the members of the committee were charitable enough—and I do not blame them for it, because they do not know these men. But let that stand on the testimony.

I have no doubt that there was a scheme to work up some such evidence as they worked up with White for which they had already paid $750, and in which Mr. Keeley said if they got it they were going to lay it before this investigating committee, I think he said, for what it was worth, and subsequently put it in the hands of the district attorney in Washington. Why in the hands of the district attorney in Washington? Why, unless to furnish an excuse to the United States district attorney here to indict LORIMER and to try to put him in the penitentiary? They were not satisfied with destroying him, driving him from this honorable body, trying to ruin him financially. That is not enough. He shall go to the penitentiary if we can get perjury enough to send him there. That is the plain, unvarnished truth, sustained, every suggestion, by the record.

Then what next? Things to their mind were not looking quite right. Evidence probably was not strong enough to cause the committee to report against LORIMER. So it had to be bolstered up. They had to get somebody to make it stronger, and whom did they get? A member of the Illinois Legislature? No. Anybody who ever had known anything about this case? No. They hired W. J. Burns, who calls himself "the great detective." W. J. Burns, who aided in putting a venerable United States Senator in his grave on testimony that the President of the United States now believes not to have been true. Keeley hired Burns to go to Canada, where young Mr. McGowan lived. Mr. McGowan is a young man, a citizen of Ontario, Canada, who was called to impeach the testimony of one Burgess, who gave a fantastic account of a conversation which he alleged took place in a smoking compartment in a railway train and in which C. F. Wiehe, of the Hines Lumber Co., was represented as boasting that he contributed $10,000 to a fund to elect LORIMER. McGowan testified that he was in the compartment at the time and that no such conversation occurred as that detailed by Burgess.

Burns said he went there to bring McGowan back to the United States, to talk to his father and get him to persuade the son to come back here to the United States and go before the committee and swear that he had committed perjury in his previous testimony before the committee.

Burns said he went to Toronto, and he called up McGowan's father, and he asked him if he was the senior McGowan, and the senior McGowan answered yes. "Well," he said, "this is Burns." He inquired "What Burns?" "Why, W. J. Burns." "Oh, you are Burns, the great detective?" "Yes." "What do you want?" "I want you to come over to Toronto." "What for?" "Why, your boy was guilty of perjury in the United States. He is a young man, too young a man to have a sin of that sort registered permanently against him." I am not giving you his exact language, but I state it on my honor that I am giving you the substance. He said, "I want him to come to the United States to go before the committee and tell them he lied and cleanse his soul." The old gentleman and he had a few more words and they rang off.

Now, just think of it! Going to the father to ask the son to come beyond the border to testify that he was a perjurer, which testimony would make him surely, if it could have been substantiated, a subject for the penitentiary. It mattered not whether he lived in the United States or in Canada had he given the testimony, for he might have been taken under our treaty from home, brought here, and prosecuted and sent to the penitentiary.

Who will believe that Burns went over there for any such purpose? Who that has a son would have urged him to make way quick for the penitentiary? What father would do that? But his father did not believe that his son was a perjurer, and he told "the great detective" that he would not come to Toronto.

Do you think Burns wanted the young man to come to the United States? Why, no; not at all. What they wanted to do was to scare the life out of the young man, give him to understand that if he did come, if he got over here, that finally he would land in the penitentiary.

Then what happened? The fake dictograph story never would have been discovered. Nobody would have understood it. He wanted to frighten the McGowan family to keep the boy at home, and he would come here with his two detectives and his stenographer who operated the dictograph for him. They would all have sworn, as they did, that McGowan had told them in the room in Toronto, where McGowan went to meet them as friends, that he had committed perjury before the committee, that what he said was a lie, that he got $1,500 for it, that he tried to get more, but that that was pretty good.

Two detectives swore to that, and to corroborate it they put on the stand the Burns stenographer, who, sitting in the other room, claimed he had taken shorthand notes when the McGowan conversation was alleged to have taken place. The receiver was hung under a table in this room, and the enunciator was over in that room [indicating]. Here is where McGowan and the other two men were sitting [indicating]. The detectives swores to a story. Naturally they corroborated each other. Then Sheridan, the Burns stenographer, went on the stand and read his notes, and he swore to them as being the original and identical notes which he had taken on that occasion; and, as he read them, they corroborated the statements of the two detectives.

It later developed that by chance—no, I will not say by chance; I believe the hand of God directed it—Blumenberg, the official reporter of the Senate, had talked for two or three moments with Sheridan on the morning of the day that Sheridan testified. Blumenberg had the impression, in common with almost everyone else, that the dictograph was a mechanical sound recorder. Much to his surprise he learned from Sheridan that the dictograph was merely a telephonic device, and that the conversation coming over the wire was listened to by the operator in the other room, who was supposed to take it down in shorthand. Finding that in the last analysis the device depended for its success upon the shorthand writer at the end of the wire—Sheridan in this case—he asked Sheridan what his experience had been. He learned from Sheridan that he was but 19 years of age; that he had been writing shorthand but two years; that he was not sure he could write 75 words a minute, when ordinarily a conversation among three men under the circumstances testified to would run from 175 to 200 words per minute.

When the Sheridan boy was on the stand—and he was only a boy—he testified to the conditions under which he took the alleged notes, which Blumenberg, after his years of experience, knew precluded all possibility of making an accurate report, even if the machine worked perfectly and the man at the other end of the wire was an expert shorthand reporter.

Briefly stated, the conditions were these: Sheridan used a headpiece such as telephone operators at a switchboard wear. This apparatus was defective, and he used his left hand to hold it to his ear. With his disengaged right hand he said he put down the conversation in his notebook, and to prevent the book moving on the table he weighted it down with a Bible. His explanation of how he turned the pages of his notebook upon which rested the Bible, while both hands were otherwise engaged, was not satisfactory, and he was asked to give a demonstration of his method before the committee. At his very first attempt to turn the page he tore it in two.

Everybody knows that Blumenberg is one of the best stenographers in the country. All the expert shorthand witnesses on the stand said so; some of them, I think, said he was without a peer; but at any rate he is one of the best stenographers in the world. Blumenberg said he himself could not do what Sheridan had sworn he had done. He could not understand how a boy, who had had only two years' experience with shorthand, who was about 19 years of age, could do things that a man who had had the experience Blumenberg has had was incapable of doing.

So Blumenberg stood behind Sheridan when the latter was on the stand, and he examined Sheridan's notes as the latter read them. When Blumenberg was examined by the committee he swore that Sheridan's notes resembled a child's copy book, and that unless Sheridan had had a great deal of time to make those notes, which Blumenberg characterized as having been drawn, Sheridan could not possibly have written them as he claimed he did; that nobody could do it. Blumenberg swore that in his opinion, after 30 years devoted to shorthand writing, Sheridan's notes were a fake, were fabricated for the purpose, and were not original notes.

Sheridan swore that there was much talk among McGowan and Kerr and Bailey, the latter two detectives; that it was on a great many subjects, but that he, Sheridan, disregarded all that was said except that which pertained to the Lorimer case; that he took only such parts of the conversation as applied to the Lorimer case. He had the book in his hand and he read from it, and he said: "These are the notes I took at the time."

Then congressional stenographers, in addition to Blumenberg and a professional shorthand writer in business for himself in Washington, were put on the stand. They fully corroborated Blumenberg's professional judgment, and swore that it was impossible for Sheridan to have done what he claimed to have done.

The committee asked Sheridan if he was willing to undergo a test. He said he was. So the committee arranged for a test. They put the receiver in one room and the enunciator in the other, and the committee and those carrying on the conversation sat with the official stenographers in another room. In one case Mr. Pierce, the clerk of Senator DILLINGHAM'S committee, conversed with Kerr and Bailey, the two detectives, and Sheridan in the other room was supposed to take down the conversation. He was to do in the other room just what he said he had done in Toronto, because he could do it so easily, so absolutely perfect, in copy-book style.

In the second test Mr. Ward, the clerk of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, with these two detectives, in the presence of the committee and of the stenographers who were employed by the committee, held a conversation, and Sheridan, in the other room, was again supposed to report the same conversation over the dictagraph. Sheridan could take, he claimed, anything he wanted to take, eliminate any part and put in any part, and not leave any sign that he had eliminated anything or that he was confused in any sense of the word. In other words, he could write it so that there would be no evidence in the notes of false starts or of striking out shorthand characters and inserting others, as men use a word and withdraw it and employ another.

Every stenographer who testified said it was absolutely impossible to select particular parts of a conversation and report them, because the stenographer could not tell, when the first words were uttered, what the conclusion of the sentence would be; that he had to take the first words of a sentence in order to report the whole sentence if it should turn out that the sentence related to the matter he was supposed to report; that if the stenographer did wait and when he heard that which assured him the three men were talking on the subject he was supposed to report, he could not go back and take the first words, because if he did he would lose all that followed. That is what the expert shorthand witnesses before the committee testified to.

After the test was made the result was printed. This paper [exhibiting] gives the result. Now, you will observe that the full columns contain the conversation had in the committee room as reported by the official reporter, and the other columns contain what Sheridan got of the same conversation. That is the record of the test of the dictograph stenographer, who never was confused in taking notes, and who takes notes under any and all conditions! There it is for Senators to look at, and from it for Senators to decide whether or not Sheridan was capable of doing what he says he did in Toronto.

Briefly stated, the result of the first test is that Sheridan failed absolutely to report the "strange voice." He did not record the words or convey the meaning of a single sentence spoken by Mr. Pierce. Sheridan gathered only 32 out of the 482 words spoken by Mr. Pierce on the Lorimer case. Yet the Chicago Tribune calls this a "triumph" for the forger of the Toronto notes! As a matter of fact, it proved conclusively that Sheridan's Toronto notes were a forgery!

The result of the second test was that Mr. Ward, the strange voice, spoke 770 words on matters pertaining to the Lorimer case, and of these Sheridan recorded only 56 words which conveyed the meaning expressed by the speaker. In both tests Sheridan recorded about 5 per cent of what was said by the unknown strange voice.

That is the man who could take up and leave off and go back and begin in the middle, or start at the end of any sentence and report it correctly! There could not be any mistake about him!

It seems hardly necessary to add, after this demonstration, that not a single expert witness was called to contradict Blumenberg and the other shorthand writers who so completely sustained him in his professional opinion as to the factitious character of the Sheridan notes.

Now let me quote to you from the report of the majority of the committee their conclusion with respect to Sheridan after witnessing both tests. They say:

> A dictograph had been secreted in a room to which Mr. McGowan had been invited by Messrs. Bailey and Kerr, from which a wire with a telephonic receiver attached led to an adjoining room where one Sheridan, another employee of the Burns Agency, was stationed to take down in shorthand any conversation which might be had in the other room relative to the Lorimer case. This young man, James E. Sheridan, afterwards appeared as a witness before this committee, with his original shorthand notes claimed to have been taken on that occasion, which he read into the record. Doubt was expressed as to his ability to hear and write under the conditions described, and a test of his ability to do so was made by order of the committee. Mr. Sheridan and Mr. Bailey were permitted to make all the arrangements for the same, so as to reproduce as nearly as possible the conditions under which the work was done in Toronto. They used the same instruments and expressed themselves as satisfied with conditions, but the results were so disastrous to the claims made by Mr. Sheridan in his testimony as to satisfy the committee that no dependence whatever can be placed upon his testimony.

No dependence whatever can be placed upon Sheridan's testimony, say the committee. The minority of the committee in their report are wise enough and discreet enough not to mention the Sheridan incident. So we have no defense of "the great detective's" story, nobody explaining away this failure of Sheridan to make the same sort of record before the committee that he swore he made in Toronto.

Now, what does the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] say in his remarks about McGowan? Why, he said that it was so sure and conclusive that McGowan was a perjurer that he did not need any more testimony; he would not sit and listen to the detectives; there was no use of doing it; he was convinced.

Well, of course, I am not a mind reader, and I do not know what was running through the Senator's mind, but every Senator has a right to guess, and I guess that the Senator knew that he would not dare to defend that record on the floor of the Senate, and he passed it in that way.

I will insert in my remarks at this point the result of the tests in parallel columns.

The matter is as follows:

FIRST TEST.

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER.	WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION.
Mr. PIERCE. How long have you two gentlemen been around the city?
Mr. BAILEY. Why, about two weeks, I think, I have been here.
Mr. PIERCE. Have you been around here as long as that, Mr. Kerr?
Mr. KERR. I believe I have been here for pretty nearly three weeks.
Mr. PIERCE. Three weeks. You have seen quite a bit of the sights around here?
Mr. BAILEY. Why, we have not taken in many sights; at least, I have not. I have not been anywhere, very much, since I have been here.
Mr. PIERCE. Of course you have been up around the Capitol, more or less?
Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I have been around the Capitol.
Mr. PIERCE. Been around the Senate Office Building? Have you heard any of the hearings around?

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER—continued.

Mr. BAILEY. No. I was in the Supreme Court, I think, one day—only one day.

Mr. PIERCE. You have not been around the Lorimer hearing, or the Interstate Commission hearing at all?

Mr. BAILEY. Only as a witness around the Lorimer hearing.

Mr. PIERCE. You were not in there yesterday afternoon, either of you gentlemen?

Mr. KERR. I believe I was in there yesterday morning.

Mr. PIERCE. You did not hear the testimony yesterday afternoon of the young lady witness? I believe that you were connected with that, Mr. Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; but I did not hear any of it.

Mr. PIERCE. You did not hear any of it?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I didn't hear any of the evidence at all in regard to that.

Mr. PIERCE. She made a very interesting witness, and some points that she brought out were very closely followed by all of the spectators. You both have been witnesses there, then, haven't you?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I was a witness there; I was on, I think, for two days, or probably a little more than two days.

Mr. PIERCE. You are a detective, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Why, I call myself an investigator. Some people call me a detective.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Kerr was there as a witness with you wasn't he?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes, Mr. Kerr.

Mr. PIERCE. He followed right on after you, as (if) I remember correctly?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; Mr. Kerr followed me on the witness stand, I think, if I remember rightly; yes.

Mr. PIERCE. You were on for more than one day?

Mr. KERR. No; I was only on one time. I believe that it was the understanding, however, that I should go on again; but I have not been advised definitely as to whether or not I will go on again.

Mr. PIERCE. That is, you are still retained here, are you?

Mr. KERR. I believe I am; but I am very anxious to get away.

Mr. PIERCE. Of course you are collecting your three-dollar fee, aren't you, along every day?

Mr. KERR. I have not been advised to that effect.

Mr. PIERCE. It is rather hard work, all right.

Mr. KERR. I certainly would prefer other employment, if I can call this employment. It is very hard to fill in the time.

Mr. PIERCE. You are anxious to get back, too, I suppose, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I am very anxious to get back. I have several matters that should be taken up. I should have been away from here—well, a week or more ago, at least—to take up a very important matter.

Mr. PIERCE. You are both anxious to get away?

Mr. KERR. I know I am.

Mr. PIERCE. How long is this conversation supposed to be carried along? Can you tell me, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I can't tell you the exact length of time, Mr.——

Mr. PIERCE. Do you know, Mr. Kerr?

Mr. KERR. Why, if we are to be governed by the actual time that the conversation took place in Toronto, I believe that the interesting part, or the part which pertains to the case, covered a period of about 20 minutes to a half an hour.

Mr. PIERCE. Twenty minutes to a half an hour?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. We will carry on the conversation that length of time, I suppose.

Mr. KERR. Why, I have not been instructed by any person as to the length of time that the conversation will go on here. I will say that we were in the room, though, about an hour and a half.

Mr. PIERCE. This testimony which Sheridan took—was that supposed to cover that length of time?

Mr. KERR. Why, Mr. Sheridan took very little of the total conversation that occurred in the room. The only conversation that he took was evidence that had to do with this case—that is, that was considered as incriminating evidence, as I understand.

Mr. PIERCE. As you understand?

Mr. KERR. Yes, sir.

Mr. PIERCE. You say you have been around the city quite a bit, Mr. Bailey, since you have been here?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I have not taken in many of the sights. I have been to the Capitol, and over to the Howard Institute one day; but outside of that I have not taken in anything.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION—continued.

Strange VOICE. You were not in yesterday afternoon, were you?

Mr. KERR. I was in yesterday morning.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not hear any of the evidence regarding that.

Strange VOICE. ———.

Strange VOICE. Made a very interesting witness—— (Break.)

Mr. BAILEY. (Break.) Two days and possibly a little more than two days.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Kerr followed me on the witness stand, if I remember.

Mr. KERR. I was only on one time. It was the understanding, however, that I should go on again, but I have not been advised as yet whether I will go on again. (Break.) I am very anxious to get away.

Mr. KERR. I have not been advised to that effect.

Mr. KERR. (Break.) Governed by the actual time the conversation took place in Toronto, I believe the interesting part, but the part which pertains to this case covers a period of about 20 minutes to a half hour. (Break.) I should say we were in the room about an hour and a half.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Sheridan took very little of the (break) conversation that occurred in the room. The only conversation he took was the evidence that had to do with this case—that is, incriminating evidence, as I understand it.

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER—continued.

Mr. PIERCE. Of course, it has been rather cold for sightseeing?

Mr. BAILEY. Not only that; I have been expecting to be called at any time before the committee, and I have been down here at the Senate House every day, practically all day.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Bailey has been along—Mr. Kerr has been along with you, I suppose?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; we usually have been together since we have been in Washington. We spent most of the time together.

Mr. PIERCE. There is quite a bit to see in the city. You have had plenty of time to get around.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I have seen most of the sights here on previous occasions. I have been here a number of times, and spent more or less time in Washington.

Mr. PIERCE. So that you are not very much interested?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I am interested, but at the same time it is not like a person that has never seen these things.

Mr. PIERCE. I really myself have not had time to get around at all, as much as I would like to.

Mr. KERR. I would like very much to go through the Treasury Department. I imagine that would be a very, very interesting trip.

Mr. PIERCE. Yes; I should think that it would.

Mr. KERR. I have been through the National Museum of Art over here, and the State capitol. Those are about the only two places that I have been, with the exception of the theaters, of course.

Mr. PIERCE. You did not mean the State capitol, did you, Mr. Kerr? You meant the National Capitol?

Mr. KERR. Yes; I meant the National Capitol.

Mr. PIERCE. You said "the State capitol," I believe.

Mr. KERR. Yes. No; I was wrong there. I meant the National Capitol.

Mr. PIERCE. Of course the correction will not be needed. You say that you have been more or less interested in the Lorimer case for some time, Mr. Bailey—three years?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, through my investigation, yes; since I have been working on this investigation, of course, I was more or less interested in it.

Mr. PIERCE. And the papers, of course, have been full of it; and you followed it through them only?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I have not followed it very closely, but I have read some of it, of course. I have not really followed it closely, though; in fact, I followed it very little until I took this matter up with regard to McGowan.

Mr. PIERCE. I have noticed the Chicago papers have been all full of the case, so I didn't know but you had followed it through that.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, you see, I spend very little time in Chicago. I am out around in other cities most of my time. I may get in Chicago over night and leave in the morning for some other place, or the next day, and I spend very little time in Chicago.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Cornelius suggests talking on the Columbus affair down there. I don't know whether it would be advisable to go on with that or would the committee desire us talking on that?

Mr. PIERCE. I don't suppose that they really would.

Mr. KERR. Probably not.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Kerr, you are on from Detroit, are you not?

Mr. KERR. Yes; I am in Detroit pretty much, although I am out of the city a lot. Detroit is my home. My residence is there.

Mr. PIERCE. And you came on here for this one case alone—that is, the Lorimer case?

Mr. KERR. Yes; I came over here from Toronto.

Mr. PIERCE. Have you been interested in the case before?

Mr. KERR. No.

Mr. PIERCE. From reading it in the papers, I mean?

Mr. KERR. What is that?

Mr. PIERCE. Reading it in the papers, I mean.

Mr. KERR. Oh, I have read considerable of it in the papers; yes.

Mr. PIERCE. In the Detroit papers or in the Chicago papers?

Mr. KERR. Oh, Detroit papers, or papers that I would get wherever I was, you know; mostly, though, in Detroit papers.

Mr. PIERCE. Are they as interested in the case as the Chicago papers?

Mr. KERR. What is that?

Mr. PIERCE. Are they as interested in the case as the Chicago papers?

Mr. KERR. Oh, no; there is very little in the Detroit papers on this case. They don't seem to pay much attention to the cases, although I read considerable in the Detroit papers of Mr.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION—continued.

Mr. BAILEY. During my investigation, yes. (Break.) I have been working on this investigation more or less. (Break.)

Mr. BAILEY. I have not followed it very closely. (Break.) I have not really followed it closely, though. (Break.) Took this matter up in regard to McGowan.

Mr. BAILEY. You see, I spend very little time in Chicago. I am (break) I may go into Chicago over night and leave Chicago. (Break.)

STRANGE VOICE. Have you been in the case before?

Mr. KERR. In the papers; yes.

STRANGE VOICE. Detroit papers?

Mr. KERR. Detroit papers, or papers I look at wherever—mostly all Detroit papers.

STRANGE VOICE. (Break.) Chicago papers.

Mr. KERR. Oh, no; there is very little in the Detroit papers on this case. They don't seem to pay much attention to this case.

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER—continued.

Carnegie's testimony in Washington. I don't know whether it was before the same committee or not, but——

Mr. PIERCE. I don't believe that was before the same committee.

Mr. KERR. I don't know. I don't think it was, however. I was very much amused when I read an article in the Detroit paper stating that Mr. Carnegie got a check, or something, for his time, and was going to have it framed.

Mr. PIERCE. What is that again? I didn't understand that.

Mr. KERR. Why, if I remember the article rightly, Mr. Carnegie got a check or a voucher for his fee as a witness, and I believe the article stated that he was not going to have it cashed, but was going to keep it as a sort of souvenir.

Mr. PIERCE. Preserve it, I suppose?

Mr. KERR. Preserve it; yes.

Mr. PIERCE. Have it framed?

Mr. KERR. I believe that he was going to have it framed; yes.

Mr. PIERCE. You fellows, when you go back, ought to get your money framed.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; we ought to. That's right. I haven't heard anything about getting any yet.

Mr. PIERCE. I believe that you have your expenses, don't you? You are witnesses in the case.

Mr. BAILEY. I don't know much about that. I don't remember ever collecting any witness fees or any expenses for anything that I testified on anywhere.

Mr. KERR. This is the first time I ever appeared before a committee, or the first time that I ever was involved either as a witness or had any charges put before me. I never had any court experience at all.

Mr. PIERCE. It must be very trying all right.

Mr. KERR. Oh, I was a little nervous when I first went on the stand, but after I was on there a short time I believe I was composed.

Mr. PIERCE. In following this Lorimer case, you say the papers all over the country have been more or less filled with the account of the hearings. You say, Bailey, that you never remember reading of it before you were employed by your agency?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes; I have read some of the testimony at different times, but I never followed it closely, you know.

Mr. PIERCE. Not closely at all?

Mr. BAILEY. No; not until after I took up this case, you know; this investigation. Then, of course, I followed it more or less closely; but there were times when I was on that investigation that I could not very well take it up. I don't think they had very much of it in the Regina or Moosejaw papers or any of those places. I don't think they had anything, in fact.

Mr. PIERCE. But, of course, through your interest in the case, after you were employed by these parties that were interested in it, you followed it pretty closely, didn't you?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I suppose you would call it closely. I read considerable of it when I was around where I could get papers, you know, that had much of it in.

Mr. KERR. But you did not read any of it when you were up in Canada, eh?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I don't think it treated upon it very much in the Canadian papers. I don't remember seeing any of it at all in the Canadian papers.

Mr. KERR. What was your impression of the case?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, I didn't have much of an impression of it; I didn't form any opinion about it at all. I was not familiar with it enough for that, Harry.

Mr. PIERCE. You say you did not form any opinion at all?

Mr. BAILEY. I have not formed any opinion in regard to the outcome of the case or anything like that. That is what I thought Mr. Kerr meant by his question there.

Mr. KERR. No; I just wanted to know what your opinion was on it. I probably should not have asked that question—about the only thing I could think of at the time.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION—continued.

Mr. KERR. I was a little nervous when I first went on the stand, but after I was on a short time (break) composed.

STRANGE VOICE. (Break.) Lorimer case. The papers all over the country.

Mr. BAILEY. I read some of the testimony at different times, but I never followed it closely (break) not till after (break) of course I followed it more or less closely (break) then I could not very well follow it. I don't think they had very much in the Regina or Moosejoint papers.

Mr. BAILEY. I suppose you would call it closely.

Mr. KERR. What was your impression on the case?

Mr. BAILEY. I did not have much of an impression. (Break.) I was not familiar with it enough, Harry (break) regard to the outcome of the case.

Mr. KERR. I just wanted to know what wour opinion on it was. (Break.)

SECOND TEST.

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY OFFICIAL REPORTER.

Mr. WARD. To begin with, I want to get the opinion of you if this is a case of forced hospitality?

Mr. BAILEY. If this is a case of forced hospitality?

Mr. WARD. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I don't know. It looks a little bit like that to me.

Mr. WARD. What has been your connection with this case other than Mr. McGowan?

Mr. BAILEY. Why, I have made the investigation on Mr. McGowan. That is about the extent of my work on this case.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION.

STRANGE VOICE. What has been your connection with this case other than McGowan?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, I have been making an investigation with McGowan (break) has been about the extent of my work on this case.

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER—continued.

Mr. WARD. Well, now, to begin with, I want to ask both of you gentlemen if it has occurred to you that it is a long time between drinks?

Mr. KERR. Yes. I suggest that we have a bottle of Budweiser.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I second the motion.

Mr. WARD. What was that banquet in Detroit?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, there are so many banquets around the New Year's, you know, that I couldn't remember just any particular banquet that took place there.

Mr. WARD. Was that on New Year's eve?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, on acount of New Year's coming on Sunday, the conditions of the law there in regard to selling liquor, some held it on Saturday and some on Sunday; different places held it on different occasions, you see.

Mr. WARD. Who is the mayor up there now?

Mr. KERR. Billy Thompson.

Mr. WARD. Who is the police magistrate?

Mr. KERR. Frank Crowell.

Mr. WARD. Is there any talk up there on general politics?

Mr. KERR. Is there any talk on general politics?

Mr. WARD. Yes; presidential politics.

Mr. KERR. Oh, there naturally would be.

Mr. WARD. What is the sentiment up in that country for Col. Roosevelt?

Mr. KERR. Why, I believe Roosevelt has a pretty good following up there.

Mr. WARD. Considerable advertising?

Mr. KERR. I don't know of any advertising.

Mr. WARD. Have the papers said anything about him?

Mr. KERR. Oh, there is more or less in the newspapers regarding the candidates on the Republican ticket, or whatever you want to call it. I believe Mr. Taft is very strong up there. I don't follow politics very closely, although I should judge that I am in the prosecuting attorney's office two or three times a week. My attorney is in that building and is assistant prosecuting attorney.

Mr. WARD. Who is the prosecutor now?

Mr. KERR. Mr. Shepard—Hugh Shepard.

Mr. BAILEY. Where are you from?

Mr. WARD. Chicago.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, you live in Chicago, do you?

Mr. WARD. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. That is a pretty nice city, isn't it?

Mr. WARD. Yes; it is quite a large city.

Mr. BAILEY. Have you been living there very long?

Mr. WARD. Yes; four or five years.

Mr. BAILEY. You like it better than your previous place of abode, do you?

Mr. WARD. Oh, yes; yes.

Mr. BAILEY. It is funny I never met you around Chicago, sir.

Mr. WARD. Well, I am pretty busy most of the time, on the way from Chicago to Washington and back again. I generally have been with the Senator on his trips back and forth, and of course while this investigation has been going on I have been connected with that more or less all the time.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I meet so many people around Chicago that I remember an awful lot of faces around there after seeing them a time or two, you know. Anyway, I am pretty good at remembering faces.

Mr. KERR. You could pretty nearly make your home here, couldn't you, Mr. ——, I have forgotten your name.

Mr. WARD. My name is Ward.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Ward?

Mr. WARD. Yes. No; I could not—not if I had my own way about it.

Mr. KERR. Well, I mean you are here so much.

Mr. WARD. Oh, I am here a great deal of the time; yes. I spend my time entirely between here and Chicago.

Mr. KERR. Do you like this?

Mr. WARD. Oh, very much, as a city. It is a beautiful place, and all that; but there is not enough going on here, as a rule, to interest a person who has lived in a large city.

Mr. KERR. I see.

Mr. WARD. And particularly a person who has been connected for the last two years, as I have, with every phase of this investigation, both here and in Chicago and in Springfield. I happened to be with the Senator at the time. That is, I was his secretary at the time that he was elected to the Senate.

Mr. KERR. I see.

Mr. BAILEY. Was not this matter taken up in Chicago at one time?

Mr. WARD. In some of its phases; yes. What have you reference to particularly?

Mr. BAILEY. To the Lorimer investigation.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION—continued.

STRANGE VOICE. (Break.) It has occurred to you it is a long time between drinks.

STRANGE VOICE. (Break.) With this investigation, both here and in Chicago and at Springfield.

Mr. BAILEY. Was not this matter taken up in Chicago at one time?

STRANGE VOICE. (Break.) Yes.

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER—continued.

Mr. WARD. Yes; yes; it has been taken up there on two different occasions, as I remember; first, in October, or late in the fall of 1910, and then again this committee went out there this summer and sat there for a number of weeks taking testimony there in Chicago.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I have reference to the October session, I guess, when Mr. McGowan and I came back from the West.

Mr. WARD. Oh, yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I think, if I remember rightly, they were in session there at that time.

Mr. KERR. Did you come back in October?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; in October.

Mr. WARD. What time in October?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, I forget; somewhere around about the 18th, 19th, or 20th. I think, if I remember rightly, I was in Milwaukee on the 18th. I seem to remember that very distinctly.

Mr. WARD. The 18th of October?

Mr. KERR. Have you got a match?

Mr. BAILEY. No; I have not got a match just now.

Mr. KERR. Do you care for a cigar?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I will take a cigar. Is it a good one?

Mr. KERR. Not this one.

Mr. WARD. At that meeting in the King Edward Hotel, how many rounds of drinks did you fellows have?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, it is pretty hard to say. Neither of us are very heavy drinkers, you know.

Mr. WARD. Do you recollect how long the discussion ran on the McGowan matter?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, I could not recall. We talked, I think, for about an hour and a half in that room that first time Mr. McGowan came up there; but the LORIMER matter was not discussed, you know, only a certain limited time.

Mr. WARD. Did it occur to you at that time that it was rather cold weather?

Mr. BAILEY. Very cold. We had the windows closed. I know that the room was closed up very tight, and I think we had the transoms closed, if I remember rightly.

Mr. WARD. How cold does it get there at that time of year; do you know?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I heard them say it was 12 or 14 below.

Mr. WARD. Oh, it gets that cold in Chicago. It was 16 or 17 in Chicago, as I recollect it, and about 12 or 14 below here in Washington, even.

Mr. KERR. I believe on the Sunday it was 8 or 9 below zero.

Mr. WARD. Was that the Sunday you were in the room up there?

Mr. KERR. Yes; we were in a room that Sunday, but we went down to the Walker House with Mac for luncheon, and I remember we walked down, and I remember distinctly that I thought my ears were frozen on the way down. It was awful cold, and there was an awful sharp wind off the lake, and we took that route down; that is, we did not go down King Street; we went down—I believe we took the street down that the Walker House is on. I don't just recall that street.

Mr. WARD. How far is the King Edward Hotel from the lake?

Mr. KERR. Oh, it is three or four squares; maybe it is five or six, but not any more, I don't think. It is pretty close to the lake.

Mr. BAILEY. Were you ever in Toronto?

Mr. WARD. No. Now, on that occasion when you were all together and going down to the lake, did you stop on the way to get any drinks or anything to eat?

Mr. KERR. Not on a Sunday. We went to the Walker House and had a luncheon; no.

Mr. WARD. Is Toronto a "dry" town?

Mr. KERR. Well, I always was under the impression that all Canadian towns were pretty "dry" for this reason: that the law provides over there for all hotels and bars to close their sample rooms or barrooms at, I think, 11 o'clock week nights and 7 o'clock on Saturday night, and all day Sunday. Now, I never can recall an instance where there have been any prosecutions, you know, or read any articles, or where you could ever get a drink in Canada on a Sunday, unless you got it in a high-grade or first-class hotel in your own room.

Mr. WARD. I always understood that—that the Province of Ontario was very strict in laws of that kind, in what you might call in this country the "blue laws"; but that was what set me to wondering, when the testimony came out in this case down here, that there were drinks in the hotel on that Sunday night; I didn't suppose that they could be gotten.

Mr. KERR. Oh, yes; you can get a drink; I think, at some time about 2 o'clock in the morning, isn't it, that you can't get any? Then you can get it at 6 o'clock. I remember that now. They have a kind of a subbar, as I understand it, that they

Mr. BAILEY. To the LORIMER investigation?

STRANGE VOICE. Yes; it has been taken up on two different occasions; first, in the fall of 1910 (break), taking testimony in Chicago.

Mr. BAILEY. I have reference to the October session.

STRANGE VOICE. I say, if I remember right, they were in session there at that time.

Mr. KERR. Did you come back in October?

STRANGE VOICE. Yes; in October.

Mr. BAILEY. (Break.) I think, if I remember rightly, I was in Milwaukee on the 18th.

STRANGE VOICE. Eighteenth of October?

STRANGE VOICE. (Break.) In the King Edward Hotel. (Break.)

Mr. BAILEY. (Break.) Pretty hard to say; neither of us are pretty heavy drinkers.

Mr. KERR. We went down to the Walker House with Mac for luncheon, and I remember distinctly I thought my ears were frozen on the way down (break), and we took that (break) I believe we took (break) that the Walker House is on.

serve from to the rooms, but I believe the other is served from the bar. While I am not sure about it, I believe——

Mr. BAILEY. Well, we had no difficulty in getting a drink in our room at any time, without it was after 2, or something, very late in the morning or early in the morning, whichever you would call it.

Mr. WARD. Do the drug stores sell it up there?

Mr. BAILEY. I never got any at the drug store. They may do it. I know they do in lots of places—for medicinal purposes, though, I think, as a rule.

Mr. WARD. I know of a little town in Illinois that had local option, and I think they started up about 20 drug stores in a town of 2,000 people. It was a common saying around there that everybody in town sold it, and every institution sold it except the post office.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, that may be a fact. I don't know anything about that.

Mr. WARD. Did you work on the McNamara case?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I worked on the McNamara case to some extent; not to any——

Mr. WARD. Out on the coast—any features of it out on the coast?

Mr. BAILEY. I never went on the coast on the McNamara case at all; no. I went to Milwaukee and made the investigation up there for the Milwaukee Fuel Co, when that explosion took place up there.

Mr. WARD. You travel around a good deal, don't you?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I travel around a great deal.

Mr. WARD. On the road a great deal?

Mr. BAILEY. A great deal.

Mr. WARD. That was true in the last year, the early part of the year, was it?

Mr. BAILEY. Why, I travel around a great deal all of the time. Of course I can't recall whether I was traveling around just at the first of the year or not, but I travel around a great deal at all times. I don't spend very much time in one place, without the operation is a lengthy operation, a drawn-out operation.

Mr. WARD. I suppose in your travels around you probably run on little incidents in connection with the McNamara case, and probably in connection with your Columbus case, or whatever that was, and you pick up information generally, don't you, wherever you go around the country, and even when you are on those trips you pick up things connected with this investigation?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, anything that I would pick up connected with any investigation I would report it to our office, you know. That would be natural. We don't overlook any bets, if we can help it, you know, in our line.

Mr. WARD. Yes; I guess not. The conversation seems to be flagging.

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I don't know what seems to be the trouble. I can't find much to talk about.

Mr. KERR. You were on the Columbus case, weren't you—that is, didn't you spend a long time on that Columbus case?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; I think I was on the Columbus case probably three or four months; I don't know just how long. I think I took it up some time in May, and worked on it until about the middle of July—something like that. It might have been longer. I think we went—I think we went to Columbus and testified later than that. The operation was really over as far as getting the evidence.

Mr. WARD. What time was that?

Mr. BAILEY. That was in—the operation, I think, terminated in July. Then I think we went to testify some time in September. It was the latter part of August, I think, when Diegle was tried there.

Mr. WARD. What year was that?

Mr. BAILEY. That was 1911.

Mr. WARD. Did you carry that work along in connection with your work on this case?

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. WARD. When did you go tc Toronto?

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I left Detroit for Toronto, I think, on the—on the 2d of January, 1912, if I recall rightly.

Mr. WARD. Now, then, I want to ask you a question about that meeting there in the hotel that night. I do not want to encroach on the prerogatives of the committee in asking these questions, and I do not intend any discourtesy to them in doing it, but there is a feature of it that I would like to know about, and that is, if you gentlemen had anything there in the way of refreshments in the room at that time?

Mr. BAILEY. At what time?

Mr. WARD. At the time this conversation took place.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION—continued.

STRANGE VOICE. Pick up things in connection with this investigation.

Mr. BAILEY. That would be natural.

STRANGE VOICE. Did you carry that work along in connection with the work in this case?

Mr. BAILEY. No.

STRANGE VOICE. When did you go to Toronto?

Mr. BAILEY. (Break.) I went to Detroit. (Break.)

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER—continued.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, yes; we had a bottle of beer there, I think—Budweiser, I think. Mac and I generally drank Budweiser if we could get it.

Mr. KERR. I believe we had two bottles each.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, that may have been so, Harry.

Mr. WARD. What was that story you related up there that evening, Mr. Kerr? Do you recollect what it was about?

Mr. KERR. Oh, I related a couple of stories. I related a story that pertained to George B. Cox, of Cincinnati. Do you want me to tell it to you?

Mr. WARD. Why, no; I don't believe I care. I just want to know if it had any bearing on this case, or if it had any connection with this case in any way.

Mr. KERR. No; it had no connection with it, but I was always a great admirer of Mr. Cox, for this reason, that I understood that—that is, they told me when I went to Cincinnati that he worked himself up from a bartender.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I don't think we want to go into that, discuss that thing, because we want to talk here and not discuss that thing at any length. I don't think we want to do that.

Mr. WARD. Well, that is all right. I don't care to know about it.

Mr. KERR. Well, anyway, it was only told in the form of a story. There was really no object in telling the story.

Mr. WARD. Did you have in mind, at the time this conversation was going on, that you gentlemen would go out that evening around the town?

Mr. BAILEY. I don't remember whether we did or not. We may have. I don't recall that just now at this time. We may have. Charlie generally wanted to take a run around, and I generally fell in line with him.

Mr. KERR. I did not personally care about going out, because I don't go out on excursions of that kind. I have only been married a little over two years.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I have been married considerably longer than that. Of course business sometimes calls you in ways that you wouldn't go otherwise, don't you know. [After a pause.] Well, we were discussing the LORIMER case. Do you think it will last very much longer?

Mr. WARD. Oh, I can't tell. I don't have any means of knowing how long it would last.

Mr. BAILEY. It has been going on now for some 9 or 10 months, has it not?

Mr. WARD. The present investigation has been going on since last June.

Mr. BAILEY. And have you been on the case ever since that, Mr.——

Mr. WARD. Even before that. I was, as I stated before—I was connected with the Senator when he was elected to the United States Senate, and came down here as his secretary, and have been with him constantly ever since; and, of course, I was with him when the first investigation was had, in the fall of the year 1910, when Senator Burrows was chairman of the committee, and that case was debated in the Senate last spring; and I believe it was either on the 1st or 2d day of March, 1911, that the committee took a vote on a resolution submitted by Senator Beveridge in the Senate declaring that Senator LORIMER had not been legally elected to his seat. The result of that vote was 46 nays and 40 yeas, by which Senator LORIMER was seated. Following that session——

Mr. BAILEY. You are going a little too rapidly. I can't quite understand you there, sir.

Mr. WARD. Well, following that session of that Congress a resolution was introduced in the present Congress, the first session, by Senator LA FOLLETTE, in which he raised the question that new evidence had been——

Mr. BAILEY. Pardon me just a moment. You are talking so fast that I can't hardly get a word that you are talking about. You just go along as though you were reading a book.

Mr. WARD. No; I am not reading a book.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, you are——

Mr. WARD. I am just stating about this case in answer to your question. You asked me how long——

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, I didn't want you to go in it quite so far.

Mr. WARD. I did not want to detain the committee here, and that is the reason I was just skimming over——

Mr. BAILEY. You surely will not, if you go along at that rate; you won't detain the committee.

Mr. KERR. Pardon me, Mr. Ward. Mr. Burrows was a Michigan man, wasn't he?

Mr. WARD. Yes; he lived in Kalamazoo, Mich.

Mr. KERR. Oh, yes.

Mr. WARD. And he has been Senator from Michigan for a great number of years. I think he has been in public life for about 33 years, as I recollect. He started in the Civil War.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION—continued.

Mr. BAILEY. We were discussing the LORIMER case. Do you think it will last much longer?

STRANGE VOICE. No; I can't tell.

Mr. BAILEY. It has been going on now for some 9 or 10 months, hasn't it?

STRANGE VOICE. (Break.) Ever since last June.

STRANGE VOICE. In the fall of the year of 1910, when Senator (break) was chairman of the committee (break). I believe it was on the 2d of March (break) declaring that Senator LORIMER had not been legally elected to his seat (break). Senator LORIMER was (break) following that action of Congress a resolution was introduced (break) by Senator LA FOLLETTE, in which he (break).

WHAT WAS SAID AS REPORTED BY THE OFFICIAL REPORTER—continued.

Mr. BAILEY. It is pretty hard to stop this gentleman. He wants to do all the talking, doesn't he? I don't know why he wants to rattle along that way. We can't understand that rapid conversation.

Mr. KERR. How do you spell his name—B-u-r-r-o-w-s?

Mr. WARD. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. KERR. He has no connection with the Burroughs Adding Machine Co. in Detroit?

Mr. WARD. No; the names are spelled in an entirely different manner. I don't know whether he has any connection with them or not.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you know the Burroughs Adding Machine people?

Mr. WARD. No; I do not. I probably——

Mr. BAILEY. They have a big plant in Detroit, you know.

Mr. WARD. I probably know an agent of the company, but I don't know any of them.

Mr. BAILEY. They are quite a large concern. They build these adding machines, you know.

Mr. WARD. Yes. Who is connected with them?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Lauver, for one. I know him very well.

Mr. WARD. Whom?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Lauver—L-a-u-v-e-r.

Mr. KERR. I know a couple of the heads of that concern who were, rather, in the mechanical department. One is now. Let me see. I think a gentleman by the name of Bannard.

WHAT SHERIDAN REPORTED OF THE SAME CONVERSATION—continued.

Mr. LORIMER. As I have said, the William J. Burns Detective Agency had been employed for six weeks by the Senate committee on this same phase of the case, and though paid a large amount by the Senate, had not produced any results. The committee, at the suggestion of its counsel, thereupon terminated its employment. Subsequently the Burns agency was employed by the Chicago Tribune and the International Harvester Co. on the same job. Thus Burns and every employee of his had a double incentive—to relieve himself from the odium of his own complete failure and to meet the demands of his new employers, the arch enemies of LORIMER.

Sheridan and the forged notes were the result. What was staged to be a dramatic-climax conclusion of the hearings before the committee collapsed into an anticlimax and laid bare the methods of the prosecution.

Now, where do we come? Charles A. White, bought by the Tribune; nobody denies that. Glavis got $750 to get something to be given to the committee on which to create an impression that LORIMER was corrupting officials in the departments in Washington, and, if it was so, he ought to be in the penitentiary. That would convince Senators that he was not fit to be in the Senate; and that would be so if it were true. After they got through turning him out here then they would start him on the road for Leavenworth, which is the nearest place of the kind to the town in which I live.

Then they did not have enough. So the Tribune bought William J. Burns's Detective Agency to commit perjury. What I have shown you here is the proof of it; nobody will doubt it. While bought to perjure his soul, Glavis bought to perjure his soul, but he did not have nerve enough to go through with it. Then, when they found that Glavis would not go through, what did they do? They had him indicted here in Washington. Of course, after they got him indicted they could say that Glavis was the crook; they could swear to anything that they wanted, and they would have sworn to anything; in other words, they had him indicted to make him shut his mouth, to make him hold his tongue. All that we know about the Glavis case is what I have stated to you, that he did get $750 to try to produce something to help destroy LORIMER with the Senators of the United States and ultimately to land him in the penitentiary.

Burns was employed by the attorneys of the committee. He sent his men out after McGowan and they were with him for many weeks, I have forgotten how many. Burns was employed by the attorneys of the committee at the suggestion of the Chicago Tribune. After he had been out for about six weeks the committee met in Chicago to examine into what Burns reported, and they concluded that he had nothing, and so they discharged him.

After the committee had discharged him Mr. Funk, of the International Harvester Co., and the Chicago Tribune, and Bancroft, of the International Harvester Co., told the Burns Detective Agency to go ahead. So all these conspirators are shown by the testimony to have been working together, not getting people who had sinned and repented to come in and cleanse their souls and purge the country of corruption, but to get others to commit perjury for them. The men they bought and paid were the men that produced perjury. Will anybody believe when these men had gone on the stand and the evidence showed that they had perjured themselves that the Tribune crowd and the International Harvester crowd did not know that they were going to perjure themselves when they bought them and when they paid for them?

Senators, let me ask you this question: If the press of the country had not misled you so much on the testimony in this case, if you knew it as I have stated it to you here since I have been discussing the case, if your minds were not made up because of that misinformation before the committee reported, if you believe what I state, would you turn a Senator out of the Senate on that sort of testimony? Let us have a case without any newspaper trust prosecuting it, without any International Harvester Trust prosecuting it, brought here on its merits, with no public sentiment created by false statements in the press, with no people back home demanding blood, would you then turn out a Senator—I do not care who he may be—on that sort of testimony? I believe if you knew this record, if you had studied the record, as it is impossible for you to do, because I know what the duties of a Senator are; I know that we do not all know all about what is going on, but that we must follow in this body as we follow in the world throughout our lives men in whom we have confidence, and that is what you do here—if you had the information in your minds, as Senator JONES now has it in his mind—and nobody will say that Senator JONES has changed his mind for any reason other than that he is now convinced that he was wrong a year ago—if you only had this testimony in your minds as he has it in his mind, Senators would rise in their places and state that they have had enough of this talk, that there is other business in which the country is interested, that they do not believe this foul perjurer—White—and that they want to settle the case and have done with it. That is the frame of mind Senators would be in if they knew this testimony.

So, Senators, if you drive me hence, I will never charge you with anything except voting upon a case on which you did not have sufficient information to make up a correct judgment.

I want, however, to call your attention—I had no idea of discussing it, but if I had had this information I would have discussed it yesterday—to a telegram which just comes to the Chamber. I did not even know that the sender still lived. He was a member of the legislature of our State years ago. This is not testimony. At the best it is only hearsay, and we do not even know that the man whose name appears as signed to it is the person who really sent it, but I believe that it comes from Walter B. Sayler, once a member of the Illinois General Assembly, a then successful lawyer in the city of Chicago. He wires as follows:

(Telegram.)

CARTHAGE, MO., July 13.

Hon. WILLIAM LORIMER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Sometime since H. H. Kohlsaat sent a man from Chicago to Carthage, Mo., who wanted me to make an affidavit against you charging you with influencing legislation by the use of money. This shows the extent to which he will go to injure your reputation, as there were no grounds for me to make such an affidavit.

WALTER B. SAYLER.

Mr. Sayler was a reputable man and always had a good reputation in Chicago. This is not evidence, but I offer it to the Senate for what it is worth.

I want now just for a moment to address myself to the other side of the Chamber—to the Democratic side of the Chamber. I do not want you to answer the question, but I want you to consider it.

I have lived for about 40 years among the people among whom I reside now. Since I was 10 years of age I have lived with those people, Democrats in a very large majority. Those who live there and own homes, who have charge of business affairs, who are the professional men and the clergymen and the mechanics and the laborers in that community were the boys of my boyhood. I never quarreled with my neighbors, any more than I quarrel with my chums, any more than I have quarreled with Members of Congress in either branch since I have been here. So, I was not quarreling with my Democratic neighbors because they were Democrats. I was brought up among them. Their fortunes were my fortunes, and my fortune was theirs. I have been a Republican all these years ever since I cast my first vote in 1884. My surroundings were overwhelmingly Democratic, but I made up my mind to cast my lot with the Republican Party because, after what I had read and what I had been able to glean of the history of my country, I decided that that party could probably manage most successfully this great Government under which we live.

Since I was 24 years of age, in a lesser or a greater degree, I have been taking an active part in the affairs of my party, aiding in all the campaigns, both local and national, discussing the issues in every campaign, talking about the principles of the party as I understood them, pleading with the people to vote the Republican ticket because, in my opinion, it was to the best interests of every citizen of this country to do so.

Our campaigns were heated, while Republican victories were few in that community; but never in all my experience on the platform have I ever uttered one word of denunciation of the party that I was opposing or of the candidates of the party to which I was opposed. I have always held the opinion that if a party was good enough to manage the affairs of this Government there were reasons enough to present to the people on which they might be convinced without slandering or villifying the other party or its candidates. In season and out of season, when Democrats came to me and asked for favors of any sort, large or small, I never asked them what party ticket they voted, and I never in my life, as Senator KERN stated in his speech—which will not be justified by anything in the record—got a job in a public office for any Democrat because he would serve me.

I have had sense enough to know, I have had experience enough to know, and I have that knowledge now of the human family, that what you may do to-day for an individual may not count to-morrow; it may not count the next day; it may never count; but I have always justified my act to myself on the ground that I was helping a fellow man, and if I wanted his help at some time in the future and did not get it he, not I, was the loser. So it has been; so it will be while the world endures. Every good act has its own compensation, whether the recipient appreciates it or not, and while he might himself have been ungrateful I have the pleasure and the gratification and the knowledge that I have reached out the hand to a fellow man and aided him when he needed aid and when he could not get it elsewhere. Oh, I never asked him whether he was a Democrat or a Republican; it was enough for me to know that he was a man, that he needed help, and I could help him; and if it happened, as it has happened, and if it be true that I have on account of the position that I have been in, whether it was fortunate or unfortunate, helped here and there and elsewhere the friends of my boyhood, my neighbors, and the friends of my neighbors who were in need of my help, and they were Democrats—and there are Democrats by the thousand that I have helped—does that not show that Democrats had valid reasons to support me rather than prove that their votes were secured through corrupt methods and practices?

Will any man with an ounce of sense believe that a man who has that sort of record, as it appears in this record, must resort to bribery and corruption to secure the support of the friends of his boyhood, his playmates, his playfellows, those whom he has helped, and those with whom he has worked? Should it be charged that because they represent the Democratic Party and because I am a Republican that, at the end of a long drawn out deadlock, with the knowledge from the beginning to the end that there was no chance of any kind for a Democrat—should it be charged that I, or somebody for me, must have bought those friends to vote for me in order to secure a seat in this body? I doubt if the people of the country would lay that charge at the door of any citizen under similar circumstances if they were conversant with the history and knowledge of the life I have lived as shown by the record in this case.

And so you gentlemen, many of you who live in States from which a Republican does not now and probably for many years will not come to this body, who know nothing about the politics of our community, even though you do not understand it, it is as I have told it to you, though you can not even conceive of such a condition.

Then may I not invite your attention to the great State of Tennessee that recently elected [LUKE LEA] a Senator to this body. By what? Bribery and corruption? Oh, no; I do not charge that; I do not suspect it; but by 32 Republican and 34 Democratic votes. For what reason? Because of Republican friends of the days of his boyhood, Republican friends who have gone shoulder to shoulder through the world for 40 years with him in all the trials and tribulations of life, friends whom he has helped and who have helped him? Oh, no. Republicans, honest men, just as honest as the 53 Democrats who voted for me, voted for him on account of a political condition in his State, different from the condition in my State, but yet a political condition without any chance in the world of electing a Republican. Nobody could hope for that. Democrats there would not vote for a Republican because the Democrats were in the majority. Each man might not have the man he wanted, but because they were in the majority, they were determined he must be a Democrat, and they would have been there until to-day if they could not have agreed upon a Democrat. Republican leaders, honest men, thought that was the best solution of the situation for the Republican Party—not the Democratic Party, but the best solution of the situation in Tennessee for the Republican Party—as Democrats have sworn they thought it was the best solution of the situation for Democrats in Illinois who were of the minority party there.

Because of that situation, on the recommendation of the leaders of the Republican Party, they voted for Senator LEA. What the detail is I do not know, and it is not of any consequence, any more than it is of any consequence in my case. The fact remains that those were the conditions in the two States; and the result is here as you observe it.

Are Democrats the only corrupt people on the face of the earth? Are they the only people that can be bribed and corrupted? I will not believe it. Nobody will ever make me think that. I know the heads of families in my neighborhood; I know the men who built up our community; I know their families. Two out of every three of them are Democrats; and I know them better, and more of them, probably, than any Democrat in public life in the State of Illinois. And because of what I know of the Democrats in my community, I will not believe that Democrats are the only people that are susceptible to bribery and can be corrupted. Nor will I believe the statement of any man that the Republicans of Tennessee—32 of them, as great a number in proportion as voted for me in Illinois—were corrupted. I believe, Senator LEA, you occupy your seat here with as clean a title as any man that ever sat in this body; but not by your party vote, any more than I occupy my seat by the strict Republican vote of the State of Illinois.

Democratic Senators, unless you are convinced from this record that Democrats were bought to vote for me—and there is no charge that Republicans were corrupted—you ought not to vote to turn me out. I want no answer; but I think what I have suggested to you is worthy of consideration.

I want you to know now that I am not pleading for votes. I would not have the vote of a man that believes I came here corruptly. I do not want your votes unless you believe that my election is as clean and was as clean, and my certificate is as pure, as that of any man that ever sat in this body.

It has been suggested that "the interests" want LORIMER here; that the "the interests" wanted LORIMER elected. Everybody knows what is meant by "the interests." I will not name the corporations. But the evidence in this case, Senators, shows that one of the largest so-called "interests" in the country has left no stone unturned to turn me out. The International Harvester Co. has even gone so far as to continue the Burns Detective Agency in an investigation of this case for the purpose of turning LORIMER out.

I never did anything to the International Harvester Co. I never in my life did them an injury. I never lifted a finger against them. The only thing I ever did was to do my duty as a Member of Congress and prevent them from closing up a navigable stream in the city of Chicago that would serve a territory about 6 miles long on either side of the river, which some day in the future will be one of the largest industrial centers in the world. I was not doing anything against the International Harvester Co. I was keeping open for navigation a highway of commerce that has been used ever since Marquette and Joliet traversed the Desplaines Valley, and in parts is now navigable for ships drawing 12 feet of water. They wanted it closed. I, as a Member of Congress, felt that it was my duty to keep it open. Since long before the McCormicks were members of the International Harvester Co. this contest has been going on, but without malice on my part. At any time, in my capacity as a Member of Congress, I would have served them if it had been to the interest of the industries in my community. But I could not sit as a Member of Congress and see destroyed forever a section of the great city from which I come, which some day will be the center of commerce, the center of industry of the world.

That is a broad statement, and Senators probably think a rash statement. But consider the Central West and the Mississippi Valley in connection with the position Chicago occupies, and you can not fail to understand what the future of that great city is to be. I was to destroy one of the best portions of the town or have the ill will of men who should not have viewed the matter in that way. They have more money than they will ever spend—millions piled upon millions. The interest on their income they never can consume. Yet their greed for more prompted them to try to shut out their neighbors from the same advantages that they still would have had if their neighbors had been shut out. And, in addition to that, they themselves own the only artery of commerce which could have served that community in the future—a railroad which they own and control and which parallels the waterway they would close.

That is not reason enough for men to turn in with the enemies of another man to aid in destroying him. It did not seem to me that men could stoop so low. But that is all that I have ever offended them in. Whether or not they are bitterly opposed to me the record will tell. And so I say that if there is evidence here that "the interests" were taking a hand, the largest "interest" in the country, or one of them, was taking a hand on the other side.

But there is one question that I want to put to Senators on this proposition of electing LORIMER with the money of "the interests." Who was the candidate against me? Who was the candidate that LORIMER beat? LORIMER beat Hopkins. The day before LORIMER was elected Hopkins had 95 votes. All he needed in order to have a majority of the General Assembly, or of the members that were alive at that time, was seven more. That is all. Only seven more. When LORIMER started out he did not have a vote—not a vote. He had friends in the legislature, but no votes—nobody voting for him.

Did "the interests" want to get LORIMER into this body? Let us see. There is reason in all things; there should be logic in everything; or, at least, logic can be applied to everything, regardless of the results.

Fifty-three Democrats voted for LORIMER. Were they bought? Senator KERN, in the first part of his speech, intimates that they were. A little further on he says he does not think they were all bought. But the impression is general over the country that 53 Democrats would not have voted for a Republican unless they were bought. Then, if they were bought, they were corrupt; they were cattle; they were not fit to sit in a legislature.

Hopkins needed seven. LORIMER required 53. Will you tell me that "the interests" were going to spend enough money to buy 53 corrupt men, when they could just as easily have elected Senator Hopkins by buying seven of these alleged corrupt Democrats? Do you mean to say that if they were there for money, if money was the all-powerful influence, if money brought about the result, they could not have been purchased for Hopkins?

Ah, no! Men that can be bought can be bought for anything or for anybody, in my opinion. I have had no experience in it, but I would not trust anywhere a man that could be bought for anything.

If they could have bought seven, why not buy them? What about Hopkins? What about LORIMER? If LORIMER had been owned body and soul by every "interest" in the city of New York on Wall Street, could he have been under any conditions a stronger protectionist than Hopkins? In any way in the world could he have been described as a more conservative man than Hopkins? Hopkins always voted with the Republican Party. He believed in the principles of the party. He was a sound-money Republican. He was a protectionist of the stalwart kind. He was an anti-injunctionist. He was for constitutional and representative government, and against the initiative and referendum, and the recall of judges. On the fundamentals of this Government, Hopkins and I stand together. We may both be wrong, but there is no difference in opinion.

If that be true, if I do not differ from Hopkins on those questions, Hopkins was known to be an able man, a good lawyer, with long congressional experience, able to defend himself against men on the floor, in every way equipped for service in this Chamber or any other legislative body. If Hopkins and I think alike, believe alike, and vote alike on governmental questions, he with more ability, a well-educated man, will anybody who knows the facts believe that the interests bought 53 votes for LORIMER when they could have bought 7 votes and had in the Senate Hopkins, who believes on all important public questions just as LORIMER believes? Oh, no. That fallacy will fall of its own weight when people know the truth, when people know what Hopkins and LORIMER stand for.

Much has been said in this debate; many beautiful things for which a Senator should be grateful and he must feel glad that men felt they were justified in making the statements—much has been said that LORIMER has lived a pure private life.

I hope the record will show in the closing days that their statements have been justified. But every man who lives a pure private life, as far as the weaknesses of humankind will permit, has his own reward. Every correct act and every good deed have their own compensation. I ask nothing from Senators on that account; it is no part of this case, and I hope it will not influence any Senator in making up his judgment. Much has been said of an ideal home life. Oh, yes; ideal. When I return to my home, one glance into the beautiful faces, one kiss from each and caresses from all, is compensation enough for the trials and the efforts of a lifetime. They will not feel that they are disgraced with me if I am turned from this Chamber. It will draw them closer about me; they will love me the more; they will form a hollow square around me and defend me against the world. In them am I not blessed beyond my merits? Such blessings are not always bestowed upon men; and in all this strife and in all these trials and tribulations—in the last two years when they have been fiercer and more ferocious than ever before—with all this, surrounded by them I am the happiest of men living under God's sun. Oh, yes; I have been abundantly rewarded, and I ask nothing because of them or because of the ideal home life.

It has been said by Senators that the worst enemies of LORIMER have not impeached his integrity; that they have not challenged his honesty. They have said, and it is in the record, that his word is as good as his bond; that he never turned on a friend; that he has always been consistent, right or wrong. I ask nothing for that except the consideration on the part of Senators of that statement when they are making up their judgment to pass on this case, when they are deciding as to whether or not they can believe LORIMER, whether they will believe LORIMER or Charles A. White; and this whole case is centered around the question as to whether or not White told the truth when he stated that Lee O'Neill Browne bribed him to vote for LORIMER on the 24th day of May, 1909, and that never until that time did he speak of it to another soul and never did he state to another person that he would vote for LORIMER. All I ask is that you consider that in connection with the record of 40 years for truth and veracity, not on my statement, but on the statement of my enemies as printed in the record. I ask that consideration. Will you believe the professed bribe taker, the man who admits that he has time after time lied and perjured his soul, or will you believe the three other men—Shaw, O'Neil, and Gloss—and use in connection with that consideration my word?

Much has been said about LORIMER's resignation. The question comes every day, Will LORIMER resign? When I introduced the resolution over two years ago inviting the Senate to investigate as to whether or not I was corruptly elected to the Senate by the General Assembly of Illinois, I had no more knowledge of the facts, no more information than any other Senator, except as I knew the conditions under which my election was secured; and I did not believe that my Democratic friends could be bought, and I did not believe that they would take money to vote for me; and I so stated upon the floor of the Senate. If I had found when the testimony was written that one man had been bribed, Charles A. White himself, not enough to reduce the majority to a minority, but one bribed vote, the first day thereafter I would have walked into this Senate and laid my resignation before this body.

But I know the history of this case. I know the history of my State. I know the history of the people who have followed me, lo, nigh unto death, for 25 years. I know the record. As God is my judge, and some day I must be judged by Him, I know that no man cast a corrupt vote for LORIMER.

Resign in the face of that knowledge? Resign in the face of that conviction? Why? Because they say the Senate has been canvassed and, right or wrong, enough votes have been secured to turn LORIMER out.

Resign when and why? Because defeat stares you in the face? Oh, such an argument; run from defeat which stares you in the face. What sort of a man is he who will do an act like that? If the men who built this country and made it what it is, had run when they saw defeat staring them in the face, we would have had no history to boast of; we would have no Stars and Stripes to pray for and to praise. We would have no country. He who is so cowardly as to run because defeat stares him in the face surely has no place in this body. This is not a Chamber for cowards. It was not built on fear or cowardice. No man who will run because defeat stares him in the face or because there is danger ahead is fit to occupy a seat in this body.

Oh, Senators, you may vote to turn me out. If every vote in the Senate had been canvassed and been declared against me, I am still, while I have strength and am alive, going to continue to try to make a character and reputation of never having been a coward.

Oh, no, no, no, I will not resign. If I go from this body it will be because more Senators vote in favor of that resolution than against it. My exit will not be from fear. My exit will not be because I am a coward. It will be because of the crime of the Senate of these United States.

I am ready.

Mr. LEA. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I hesitate about detaining the Senate even for one minute, but on Thursday of this week, while I was absent from the Chamber, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LORIMER] in the course of his remarks had read from the clerks' desk an affidavit, or paper purporting to be an affidavit, in which my name was mentioned. As a matter of common decency, as a matter of truth, that may go into this record before the vote is taken, I must make the statement which I now make.

The Senator from Illinois—I quote from the RECORD of Thursday—said:

> Mr. President, I do not introduce those affidavits as proof that I am in any way entitled to a seat in the Senate. They have no bearing on this case at all, and should have no influence on anybody's mind; they should have no controlling influence over any United States Senator; but I merely introduce them that the people of the country may have an opportunity to observe the hypocrisy that is running rampant through this country.

I do not have the full remarks of the Senator from Illinois, but, quoting from a New York paper, printed the morning after, I read:

> It was here that LORIMER declared his sole purpose in introducing the affidavit was to reveal hypocrisy. "They prove," he shouted, "that Col. Roosevelt would have been nominated for the Presidency at Chicago if his friends could have obtained it for him by corruption."

Here is the affidavit read at the request of the Senator from Illinois, which he stated had been made by a negro delegate from the State of Georgia, so the Senator informed me, to the Chicago convention, and handed to him, so he told me, by a negro who was an alternate delegate from Georgia. Here is the statement as presented by the Senator from Illinois:

> On this 27th day of June, 1912, before me, J. A. Fouche, clerk superior court, appeared R. A. Holland, who, after being duly sworn, deposes and says that he was elected a delegate to the National Republican convention from the State of Georgia; that on the 21st day of June, 1912, while in attendance at said convention in the city of Chicago, he was approached by Dr. L. Brinson, at Chicago, Ill., who carried him to the Roosevelt headquarters, where he was met by Senator DIXON, McHarg, and Kincaid. DIXON went out. McHarg introduced Kincaid as a millionaire, who said: "We are to represent Mr. Roosevelt—are ready to do business, and whatever you boys want we are ready to give it to you; if you will vote for us to-morrow for the nomination of Mr. Roosevelt, whatever you want I will see that you get it." I refused to name any amount or to accept one cent from him.
> Further this deponent saith not.
> R. A. HOLLAND.
> Subscribed and sworn to before me this 27th day of June, 1912.
> J. A. FOUCHE,
> Clerk Superior Court.

I now say to the Senate as a United States Senator and on my honor as a man that the whole statement contained in this so-called affidavit is a malicious and a deliberate falsehood. I know no such man by the name of Holland, the so-called colored delegate. I never heard of any man by the name of "Kincaid." No such man was ever directly or indirectly connected with the Roosevelt headquarters at Chicago. No such colored delegate ever came to the Roosevelt headquarters. No man by the name of Kincaid, to my knowledge, ever came into the Roosevelt headquarters. I never knew or heard of "Dr. L. Brinson."

No such thing took place at "Roosevelt headquarters at Chicago." No agent or friend of Col. Roosevelt ever authorized, sanctioned, or tolerated any such thing as is set forth in this so-called affidavit.

Whatever may have been the consideration for the execution of this affidavit by this negro from Georgia or the motive of the Senator from Illinois in introducing it into the record at this time I do not know.

Undoubtedly the motive behind its introduction into this debate was to try and poison men's minds and to strike blindly at Theodore Roosevelt, whom the Senator from Illinois says is his enemy. Whatever the motive, I now say to you that the whole statement is a malicious, a deliberate, and a premeditated falsehood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. REED. I ask that the resolution may be read.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to make a statement before the vote is taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am too weak to read it. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I desire to explain the reasons which will control my action on this vote. I was unwilling to expel Mr. LORIMER from the Senate when this matter came up the first time, because there was no direct evidence showing that he knew of the bribery or had advised or connived at it. Our laws recognize the righteousness of giving the man accused the benefit of the doubt, if there be any doubt, and I did not think it right to send Mr. LORIMER from the Senate disgraced when there was strong doubt as to his guilt. I myself have been the object of so much newspaper persecution and false accusation I did not like to expel him when I found that the Chicago Tribune was the principal prosecutor in the case. I find nothing in the so-called "newly discovered evidence" to justify a change in my attitude, and I shall give him the benefit of the doubt and vote against the resolution.

When it was first proposed to reopen the Lorimer case upon the plea of newly discovered evidence, although I was not in the Senate at the time, I favored the idea, desiring the fullest exposé of the corruption, if any existed. But the more I think about it, the more convinced I am that each succeeding Senate ought not to have the power to exercise the right to reopen cases that have already been tried by their predecessors. There ought to be some time when a case will be settled once for all. I have changed my mind and come to believe that the Constitution ought to be interpreted to mean that the Senate to which a man is elected "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members." Otherwise a man's title to his seat here will always be in jeopardy, and if it is worth while Senators may be driven by public clamor and newspapers to persecute rather than prosecute a Senator. The changing currents in our political life are sometimes so rapid and violent that there is danger in giving way to them, and I say this believing religiously in the right of the people to govern themselves, and having faith that ultimately they will right all wrongs of which we now complain.

That there is corruption at Springfield, I have no doubt whatever. That there is corruption at Chicago, I have no doubt whatever. No large city has ever escaped the "boodlers" that naturally spring up where millions of men are assembled together and the strong are led to prey upon the weak; and in any State where there is a large city under our scheme of government there may be expected corrupt politics. The only exception, if it be an exception, is in Massachusetts. I never have believed that Boston exercised the corrupting influence upon the Massachusetts Legislature that New York City does on New York, or Philadelphia does on Pennsylvania; and I attribute New England's exemption from corruption in politics to the large size of the State Legislatures. It is much easier by use of money or other corrupt instrumentalities to debauch a small legislature than a large one; and then, too, our "Yankee" friends, while they always seem willing and anxious, under the forms of the law, to put their hands in other men's pockets, are always very careful to guard their own. The corporations in New England I have sometimes thought controlled the legislatures enough to send their attorneys here, but in my 18 years of service I do not believe there has ever, in my time, been a Senator from New England who was corrupt.

I know that my vote in this case before has given great umbrage to a large number of my constituents in South Carolina, because the newspapers there have a fellow feeling for the great Chicago dailies, and have howled about LORIMER'S corruption until they believe him to be corrupt, and the people knowing nothing about the record and the evidence in the case have imbibed the same idea.

Two men are now canvassing the State for my seat and the primary comes off on the 27th of August; but if I knew my vote would cause my defeat, I would still cast it in his favor. Since I was stricken with paralysis, 30 months ago, I have thought often and seriously about death and the hereafter. That I am here at all is in some respects a miracle, and I know I must go hence and meet the Great Judge face to face very soon. Knowing that, I can not do otherwise than vote as my conscience dictates, and I believe this man is innocent of the charges brought against him.

If he be driven from the Senate, as seems probable now, I hope he will consecrate his life and great talents—for we all recognize what a phenomenal orator he is—to the purification of politics in his native city and the uplift of his fellow citizens in Illinois to the realization of their duty and their danger. But whether he is expelled or not, he ought to do this, and I believe if he does bravely fight for a purer and better government in Illinois, God will strengthen his arm and he will return to the Senate vindicated by the people of that great State. I know, for I have been all over it, that there are many millions of the native American stock there, men as high and patriotic as those in any other State, and they ought to assert their manhood and prove their patriotism.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution upon which the Senate is about to vote will be read from the desk.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 315, by Mr. LEA:

Resolved, That corrupt methods and practices were employed in the election of WILLIAM LORIMER to the Senate of the United States from the State of Illinois, and that his election was therefore invalid.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators who are in favor of the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay." The roll will be called.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama (when Mr. BANKHEAD'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay"; the Senator from West Virginia would vote "yea."

Mr. RICHARDSON (when Mr. DU PONT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. DU PONT] is absent, indisposed. He has a general pair, I understand, with the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. If my colleague were present and voting, he would vote "nay."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). The occupant of the chair is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS]. He transfers that pair to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], and votes "nay." The Chair has been requested by the Senator from Idaho to state that if he had the privilege of voting, he would vote "nay," and that the Senator from Arkansas would vote "yea." The Senator from Idaho is detained from the Senate by serious illness, and he requested that this statement be made.

Mr. GAMBLE (when his name was called). Mr. President, during my recent absence from the city a pair was arranged between the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and myself. I do not regard it as binding in this particular case. I am, however, anxious to protect him, and I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). During his absence from the Senate I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I am, however, authorized to state that, if the Senator from Connecticut were present, he would vote on this question in the same way that I shall vote. I am therefore released from my pair with him on this question and shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (when Mr. OWEN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. OWEN] is necessarily absent from the Senate. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming (when Mr. WARREN'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WARREN] has been called from the city by serious illness in his family.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). In view of my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], who has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCCUMBER. It is perhaps proper for me to state that I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. PERCY]. I have a letter from that Senator relieving me from that pair. I, however, would not have considered the pair as binding in a case of this kind.

The roll call resulted—yeas 55, nays 28, as follows:

NORRIS, of Nebraska, Members of this House, have been appointed such managers.

IMPEACHMENT OF ROBERT W. ARCHBALD.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I now submit to the Senate an order, which I ask the Senate to make, and for which I ask present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. GALLINGER). The Senator from Georgia submits an order, for which he asks present consideration. The order will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Ordered, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the order? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, the order is agreed to.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 21969, known as the Panama Canal bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut. The bill will be stated by its title.

Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will suggest that the motion is not debatable.

Mr. McCUMBER. I rise to a parliamentary question, as to whether or not that motion makes the Panama Canal bill the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will if the motion is agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota can not object. The question is upon the motion.

Mr. REED. I ask for a roll call on the motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state his inquiry.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it in order to move to substitute another bill for the bill named by the Senator from Connecticut?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is my desire to substitute for the bill moved by the Senator from Connecticut, the wool tariff bill; and so I hope the motion to take up the Panama Canal bill will be voted down.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 21969, known as the Panama Canal bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FOSTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. On this question the pair holds good. Therefore I refrain from voting. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BROWN (after having voted in the affirmative and when Mr. OWEN's name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. He is absent from the Senate Chamber, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS], and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not answer to my name when it was called because I was not certain whether the Senator from Montana [Mr. DIXON], with whom I have a pair, was in the Chamber. I desire now to inquire whether or not he has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JOHNSTON of Alabama. My colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. BRADLEY (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted without observing the absence of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER], with whom I have a pair. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I desire to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. WARREN] because of serious illness in his family. He has a general pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. MYERS. I rise to inquire if the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] is recorded as having voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that that Senator has not voted.

Mr. MYERS. Then, I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHILTON] is absent from the Chamber on account of personal illness. He is, however, paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM].

The result was announced—yeas 40, nays 34, as follows:

So Mr. BRANDEGEE's motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 21969) to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, which had been reported from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals with amendments.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I had intended to ask that the bill be read this afternoon and then laid aside, but I find quite a disposition among Senators to hold an executive session, which is said to be necessary, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, a communication from the Secretary of State transmitting a résumé of a note received from the British Government in relation to the Panama Canal tolls.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 12, 1912.

The Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Chairman Committee on Interoceanic Canals,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to bring to the knowledge of your committee the fact that a communication dated the 8th instant, just received from the British chargé d'affaires, indicates that the attention of the British Government having been called to various proposals from time to time made for the relieving of American shipping from the payment of tolls on vessels passing through the Panama Canal, that Government has studied carefully those proposals and the arguments in support of them, with a view to the bearing thereon of the provisions of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain of November 18, 1901. The communication sums up the proposals mentioned as (1) one to exempt all American shipping from tolls, (2) one to refund to all American ships tolls which they might pay, (3) one to exempt from the payment of tolls American ships engaged in the coastwise trade, and (4) one to repay to the last-named class of American ships tolls which they might pay.

The communication indicates it to be the opinion of His Britannic Majesty's Government that to exempt all American shipping from the payment of tolls would involve an infraction of the treaty, and indicates further the opinion that there would be no difference in principle between charging tolls only thereafter to refund them and remitting such tolls altogether. The opinion is expressed that the method of charging but refunding tolls, while perhaps complying with the letter of the treaty, would still contravene its spirit. The communication admits that there is nothing in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to prevent the United States from subsidizing its shipping, but claims that there is a great distinction between a general subsidy either to shipping at large or to shipping engaged in any given trade and a subsidy calculated particularly with reference to the amount of use of the canal by the subsidized lines or vessels. Such a subsidy, if granted, would not, in the opinion of His Britannic Majesty's Government, be in accordance with the obligations of the treaty.

With respect to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, the communication states that it may be that no objection could be taken if the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for American vessels, would be benefited by this exemption; but that it appears to His Britannic Majesty's Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting in a preference to American shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty. I have the honor to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

P. C. KNOX.

Mr. BACON subsequently said: While the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is on the floor I should like to make an inquiry of him. There was so much noise at the time that I really could not hear anything that was said. I desire to know what was the paper that the Senator had put in the RECORD.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The document I asked to have printed in the RECORD was a communication from the Secretary of State giving the views of the State Department as to the contentions of the British foreign office concerning the right of the American Government to exempt its vessels from tolls in the Panama Canal. I thought it would be convenient for Senators to have it in the RECORD, and I therefore asked to have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BACON. I may be mistaken, Mr. President, but I do not think that is the usual way in which the Senate is informed as to the attitude of foreign nations upon diplomatic questions which may arise.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think it is, Mr. President, and it was not so intended. The communication was addressed by the Secretary of State to the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals for the information of the committee. I thought it might also interest other Senators, and therefore I asked that it be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BACON. I think this is a matter of some little importance. I can very well understand that the Secretary of State might make an informal communication to the committee in order to give it information which might be of service to it in its deliberations on the question as to what it would recommend to the Senate. But it seems to me the communication of that information to the Senate is an altogether different matter. I do not think it ought to come to the Senate by indirection. It seems to me that while it might be free from criticism if it were limited to a communication to a committee, it would not be free from criticism if it were a communication intended to reach the Senate. This method does bring to the Senate and puts the Senate upon official notice of a very grave matter, a grave international matter, which it seems to me should come to the Senate in another way.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the Secretary of State is not responsible for the way in which this matter has come to the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not offer it to the Senate because the Secretary had requested me to do so. I asked that it might be printed in the RECORD because the committee to which it was sent had already reported the bill, and I thought the information contained in the correspondence would be of some interest to the Senate. Therefore I asked unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD, as I have understood that communications from the departments concerning all matters of legislation are almost daily inserted in the RECORD.

If any Senator objects to its being printed in the RECORD, I have done what I thought was my duty; and it will go out on a single objection if it is not proper.

Mr. BACON. I am not going to object; but I was unwilling that the matter should pass in that way and grow into what might be considered a precedent for the future as to the manner in which the Senate should be informed of grave international matters. I disclaim any purpose to criticize the Secretary, because the Senator himself says the Secretary did not send the matter to the committee for the purpose of its being submitted to the Senate.

Therefore I am not criticizing the Secretary in the matter. But I think the practice, if it should be followed hereafter, would be a very objectionable one. For that reason I wanted to voice this much of a criticism, if such it may be termed, of bringing to the attention of the Senate a matter of very grave international importance except in the most formal way that the Constitution contemplates such matters shall be brought to the attention of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, having been a member of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals ever since I came to the Senate, I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of that committee with reference to his purpose as to taking up the canal bill for actual discussion by the Senate. Is it his purpose to press the matter on Monday, or to defer it to a later date?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Owing to the fact that it is now in the position of the unfinished business, I suppose it will automatically come up each day, two hours after the convening of the Senate. If any Senator is then ready to proceed with it, it will be held there, unless it is displaced by appropriation bills or other privileged matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then it is the purpose of the Senator to ask the Senate to proceed to its actual consideration on Monday?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; that is my purpose, unless it is displaced. The bill should be read. I think there will be no great hurry about its final disposition; but I think we ought at least to start with it. I think very early in the reading of the bill there will be discovered something that will furnish all the debate necessary to occupy whatever time the Senate has to devote to it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I had hoped that the Senator would not desire to press the canal bill on Monday and Tuesday, but that we might take the wool bill at that time and dispose of it.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no.

ALLOTTEES OF THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4948) to amend an act approved May 27, 1908, entitled "An act for the removal of restrictions from part of the lands of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes, and for other purposes," which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That conveyances of inherited allotments by full-blood Indian heirs members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma made subsequent to May 27, 1908, in cases of allottees dying prior to May 27, 1908, shall have the same effect as if the allottee had died subsequent to May 27, 1908, and shall not require the approval of the Secretary of the Interior; and to amend the title so as to read: "An act relating to inherited estates in the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma."

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate concur in the substitute amendment of the House of Representatives, with certain amendments, which I shall offer. I send one to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, with certain amendments which he offers. The Secretary will state the first proposed amendment to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the House amendment, after the words "Secretary of the Interior," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That no conveyance of any interest by a full-blood heir of inherited allotted lands heretofore or hereafter made shall be valid unless approved by the county court of the county where the deceased allottee was a resident at the time of his death.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this a House bill that is now being considered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a Senate bill with a House amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator move to accept the House amendment?

Mr. GORE. With certain amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He moves to accept the amendment of the House of Representatives with an amendment, which is in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if there is any report upon the proposed amendment from the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the bill previously passed the Senate and was amended in the House. Now I am offering an amendment providing that conveyances of claims of deceased Indians by full-blood heirs shall be approved by the county court of the county in which the deceased allottee lived.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if there is no special hurry for the passage of the bill, I believe that it should go to conference.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say to the Senator that I expect to leave the city to-morrow afternoon and may not return during the session. I will also suggest that the amendment I propose makes the pending bill conform with the existing law, and makes it correspond with what the existing law was supposed to be with reference to these particular claims when the bill was passed, May 27, 1908.

The bill was construed originally by the Secretary of the Interior to mean what the pending bill undertakes to make it mean. Subsequently the Attorney General placed a different construction on the act of May 27, 1908, from that placed upon it by the Secretary of the Interior. The United States District Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma, however, construed the act of May 27, 1908, to mean what the pending bill undertakes to make it mean, but for commercial purposes it is desired to clarify the situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if the amendment has ever been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior for a report?

Mr. GORE. I am not able to answer the question, and I really do not know whether the bill as it originally passed the Senate contained this provision, as it was introduced by my colleague and not by myself.

Mr. SMOOT. It does seem to me that the approval ought to be by the Secretary of the Interior rather than a county court. The Senator can have it referred to a committee, and the committee will report it out anyhow.

Mr. GORE. I think if I make a brief statement the Senator will not object.

The act of May 27, 1908, provided that conveyances by full-blood heirs of allotted lands which belonged to deceased Indians should be approved by the county courts of the counties in which they were situated. The Secretary of the Interior construed that act to apply where the death occurred prior to the passage of the act as well as where the death occurred subsequent to the passage of the act. That is the law now. Where the death occurred subsequent to the passage of the act of May 27, 1908, those conveyances are approved under existing law by the county courts.

The Attorney General afterwards construed the act of May 27, 1908, to apply only to conveyances of land where the death occurred subsequent to the act of May 28, 1908. The United States Court for the Eastern District of Oklahoma, as I have suggested, has construed the law of May 27, 1908, to apply in both instances, where the death occurred prior to the act of May 27, 1908, as well as where the death occurred subsequent to the act of May 27, 1908. There is simply that confusion. All conveyances of land where death occurred subsequent to that date are now approved by existing law by the county courts of the several counties.

This amendment is intended to make it uniform with reference to deaths that occurred prior to the act as well as those that occurred subsequently.

Mr. SMOOT. Just a question, Mr. President. If the amendment is accepted by the Senate, will the matter go back to the House?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as amended will go back to the House, unquestionably.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a very, very dangerous way of legislating.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think it is a wise way to legislate on any bill. The Senate has passed the bill and the House has amended it, and it is now proposed that we, without consideration, without understanding the purport of it, in a complicated matter, shall amend the amendment and send it back to the House. It seems to me it ought to take the regular course.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma whether or not this bill, as proposed to be amended by the Senator from Oklahoma, if it should become a law, would affect any proceedings or suits now pending?

Mr. GORE. It would have the effect of removing the cloud from certain titles, resulting from the decision of the Attorney General, that the act of May 27, 1908, did not apply to deaths preceding that date. It has confused and clouded titles in the State, and for that reason it is extremely desirable that the cloud should be removed. This bill conforms to the construction placed on the act by the Secretary of the Interior. It conforms to the construction placed upon the act by the United States court for the eastern district.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me the matter is of enough importance at least to go to conference, and I certainly must object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion that an objection would not lie. The Chair desires to state that while there is no direct rule of the Senate governing the motion made by the Senator, Jefferson's Manual covers it:

A motion to amend an amendment from the other House takes precedence of a motion to agree or disagree.

The Chair therefore entertains the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. BAILEY. I did not quite understand the ruling of the Chair. If I understood it aright, I think it is not now the accepted rule of parliamentary law. Will the Chair be good enough to again state the ruling?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ruled that the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma was in order.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it is in order; but I understood the Chair to say that a motion to concur with an amendment takes precedence of a motion to concur.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what Jefferson's Manual says.

Mr. BAILEY. That rule has been long since abandoned, and the rule everywhere practically now is that a motion to concur, removing all the differences between the two Houses, takes precedence of a motion to concur with an amendment, because the latter may introduce a still more violent difference than the former one.

Mr. SMOOT. Then a motion to refer to a committee would be in order?

Mr. GORE. It would have to be sent to conference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes. A motion for a conference would be a proper motion. The Senator from Oklahoma, however, has made a motion which the Chair feels constrained to entertain.

Mr. GORE. I should like to say to the Senator from Utah that the bill as amended by the House does not require these conveyances to be approved either by the Secretary of the Interior or the county court. I can not get my consent to suffer a measure of that sort to pass. I think they ought to be approved either by the Secretary or by the county court. They are now under existing law approved by the county court.

The act originally intended that all these conveyances should be approved by the county court, but owing to the construction to which I have referred, a different policy has been instituted, and it is simply to harmonize and make uniform the practice that this amendment is offered.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. CLAPP, Mr. GAMBLE, and Mr. STONE conferees on the part of the Senate.

ALIEN AND SEDITION LAWS (S. DOC. NO. 873).

Mr. BAILEY. I ask unanimous consent that this book containing the "Debates in the House of Delegates of Virginia, in December, 1798, on resolutions before the House, on the acts of Congress, called the 'Alien and Sedition Laws,'" shall be printed as a public document.

This book includes, in addition to the debates in the Virginia House of Delegates, what are known as the Kentucky and Virginia resolutions, and also the responses made by the several States to those resolutions.

I will say, Mr. President, that the book will never again be printed by any publishing house. The demand for it would not justify that, and I doubt that it will be very widely read, even if printed as a public document, because the disposition in this day is to go no further back than the last issue of the muckraking magazines; but there are a few of us who still delight in this kind of literature, and in order to have this book reprinted I am willing to furnish to the Printing Office my individual copy, which I found 10 or 15 years ago in a second-hand bookstore.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the book will be printed as a public document.

SUPPLY BILLS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, some weeks ago the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and I fell into a sort of debate about the constitutional right of the House of Representatives to originate money bills—supply bills. At that time I got the permission of the Senate to insert in the RECORD, later on, references to certain occurrences and comments upon them by me. I agreed at the time not to put the matter in the RECORD without previously giving notice. I now want to notify the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Wyoming that upon Monday or Tuesday next, one or the other, I will have the matter to which I refer inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. I am very glad the Senator is going to print it.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 24565) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. PERKINS, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. TILLMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

STATISTICS OF COTTON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19403) authorizing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of cotton, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and consent to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. GUGGENHEIM, and Mr. BAILEY conferees on the part of the Senate.

DRAINAGE OF LANDS IN OKLAHOMA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4913) to enable the Indians allotted lands in severalty within the boundaries of Little River drainage district No. 1, in Pottawatomie County, Okla., to cooperate with the officials of said State in the protection of their lands from overflow, and for other purposes, which were to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to approve the assessments, together with maps showing right of way and definite location of proposed drainage ditches made under the laws of the State of Oklahoma upon the allotments of certain Absentee Shawnee and Citizen Pottawatomie allottees in Little River drainage district, in Pottawatomie County, Okla., and upon the allotments of certain Sac and Fox allottees in Deep Fork drainage districts, in Lincoln County, Okla.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to pay the amount assessed against each of said allotments: Provided, That said assessment shall not exceed $15 per acre on any allotment or portion thereof; and there is hereby appropriated for said purpose, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40,000, to be immediately available, the said sum to be reimbursable from the rentals of said allotments, not to exceed 50 per cent of the amount of rents received annually, or from any funds the said allottees may have in the United States Treasury, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to approve deeds for right of way from such said allottees or their heirs as may be necessary to permit the construction and maintenance of said drainage ditch upon the payment of adequate damages therefor.

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to approve the assessments upon all other restricted allotments located within any proposed drainage district located and made under the laws of the State of Oklahoma.

That in the event any allottees shall receive a patent in fee to an allotment of land in any lawfully constituted drainage district within the State of Oklahoma, before the United States shall have been wholly reimbursed as herein provided, the amount remaining unpaid shall become a first lien on such allotment, and the fact of such lien shall be recited on the face of each patent in fee issued and the amount of the lien set forth thereon, and the receipt of the Secretary of the Interior, or of the officer, agent, or employee duly authorized by him for that purpose, for the payment of the amount assessed against any allotment as herein provided, shall, when duly recorded by the recorder of deeds in the county wherein the land is located, operate as a satisfaction of such lien.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect, and to amend the title so as to read:

An act to provide for the payment of drainage assessments on Indian lands in Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I present the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 630 (H. Rept. 997).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall proceed to consider H. R. 56, "A bill to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between the States and Territories and foreign nations."

That there shall be two hours' general debate on said bill, after which the bill shall be read for debate and amendment under the five-minute rule, and at the end of one hour's consideration a vote shall be had upon the bill and all pending amendments.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. MANN. I suppose 20 minutes' debate will be on a side if anybody desires to be heard.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, this resolution brings before the House what is known as the Beall bill, making it unlawful to use certain instrumentalities of interstate commerce in gambling in cotton. I am informed that H. R. 56 is practically the same as the Scott bill, which was passed by a former House of Representatives. It will be observed that the rule does not cut off amendment, and also allows reasonable opportunity for discussion on this floor.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I do.

Mr. DUPRÉ. May I ask why the Rules Committee, when it brought in this rule, did not take into consideration the fact that the Committee on Agriculture reported a bill by Mr. LEVER, of South Carolina, prohibiting similar transactions in other agricultural products—wheat, corn, and oats?

Mr. POU. Why, the Committee on Rules did take into consideration that fact, and for that very reason framed this rule so that the Beall bill will be open to amendment. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not care to consume further time in the discussion of this rule, and I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire some time in opposition to the rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will not take the floor, but I will ask that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the adoption of the rule. In the first place, it provides for the consideration of a bill which purports to do certain things that the Supreme Court has held in quite a recent case that Congress has no power to do; and, in the second place, while the rule purports to afford opportunity for amendment, gentlemen who are interested in passing this bill, and who have been interested in preparing the rule, are fully aware of the fact that it effectively prevents this bill being considered for amendment. I might, Mr. Speaker, be challenged for making this statement, if in the past the House did not have an opportunity to demonstrate the impossibility of considering under the five-minute rule a bill considered under an identical rule from the Committee on Rules.

This rule purports to be manifestly fair. It is very unfair and unjust to those opposed to the bill. It provides that there shall be two hours of general debate and that the bill shall then be considered under the five-minute rule for amendment, and that at the end of one hour the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all pending amendments. A similar bill was reported two years ago last month to this House under an identical rule, and by the simple process of various gentlemen offering amendments to the first paragraph of the bill and consuming one hour's time in discussing those amendments, the House never got beyond the first paragraph. The first paragraph of the bill amounts to nothing. It is not a vital part of the bill. It is not a part of the bill Members wish to discuss or to amend. There is no opportunity at that point to suggest that this bill be so enlarged in its scope as to include operations in wheat, grain, and other matters which are included in the so-called Lever bill.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman undertake to convey the idea that the friends of the bill are going to enter into a conspiracy to try to amend the first section of the bill to prevent the reaching of the other sections?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not.

Mr. GARNER. Then if the first section amounts to nothing, who is going to offer the numerous amendments to take up the hour—the friends of the bill?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman will have his doubts cleared on that point when the bill is read for consideration. The gentleman was present two years ago, if my recollection is accurate, when the bill was considered; I was not here because I was ill at home.

The friends of the bill and the enemies of the bill in disguise occupied the time under the five-minute rule in perfunctory discussions of immaterial amendments, so that the Clerk never read beyond the first paragraph. I believe that the friends of the bill do not wish it read beyond the first paragraph. They do not wish to have submitted to this House an amendment to include in this bill the same restrictions upon wheat, corn, and other products contained in the Lever bill. I have no intimation that the Committee on Rules intends to bring in a rule for the consideration of that bill.

If the legislation proposed here relative to speculative contracts in cotton be proper, it should be applied to all other commodities which are dealt with in the same way. There can be no excuse to legislate especially for the benefit of, or for the protection of, or for the injury of, the class of persons engaged in these speculative future contracts in one line of commodities and permit those doing business in the same way and the same manner as to a number of other commodities to be foot free to continue their methods. If their methods be improper, they should be stopped.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman submit to an interruption?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has expired.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BURLESON. You say the same conditions obtain in the exchanges dealing in other farm products that exist with reference to cotton?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sufficiently familiar with either class of exchanges to know. I am speaking of the legislation reported by the same committee affecting all of these commodities, and I assume the condition must have been similar in order to have induced the reporting of this bill.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, if, as a matter of fact, the conditions are entirely dissimilar, will the gentleman contend the same legislation could be directed against grain speculation as against cotton speculation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BURLESON. Notwithstanding the conditions are entirely different?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it be improper to deal in contracts for future delivery of cotton upon exchanges, it is improper, illegal, and unrighteous to deal in future contracts for the delivery or for the purchase or sale of wheat and corn. There can be no distinction drawn whatever between dealings in one commodity in a certain way and similar dealings in other commodities. If these gentlemen profess to be anxious to stop what, in their opinion, is a great wrong, why should they limit their activities, why should they restrict this legislation to cotton? Why should they not, at least, give the House an opportunity to pass upon the question as to whether they would not include similar dealings in these other commodities?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I know the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is as familiar as anyone in this House with the necessities or the exigencies for certain legislation; and it must occur to the gentleman from New York that if there should be as large a percentage in opposition to the grain proposition as there is as to cotton, that we would likely not get a bill through including both of them. Whereas if we take them up one at a time we can put them through, and we could not put them through with the two in; and I imagine that is the reason the gentleman wants to put grain on the list.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know this, that two years ago in June, approaching the election, some gentleman interested in this cotton bill had a special rule brought into the House and it passed the House, but nothing further was done. It slumbered along without any special effort to have the bill taken up.

Now, when we are approaching, within a few months another election, the same gentlemen have brought in another rule to consider this bill at this time, knowing that there is no possible chance for its enactment into law before election.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If the gentleman will yield a minute, I want to set him right. If he will read the platform adopted at Baltimore, he will find it declares in favor of this legislation we are now providing for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I doubt that.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. One moment. We can discuss that at another time, because the Democratic platform could not have declared in favor of legislation which, as clearly as it is possible to declare, the United States Supreme Court says Congress has no power to enact.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. It has declared for it in specific terms.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it refers to this particular bill, it is one of those things that slipped into the platform in the dark hours, when it was considered without knowledge of the convention.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then the gentleman ought to withdraw his opposition to this bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I decline to withdraw my opposition to the bill. The gentleman can make his own statement in his own time. I believe it is unwise legislation and improper legislation. I believe that the Congress has no power to enact it. A declaration in a platform adopted at Baltimore or anywhere else will not control my action in a legislative capacity when I believe, as I do believe, on the subject of such legislation that it is beyond the power of Congress. I doubt, however, that anything in the Democratic platform can be construed as an indorsement of this particular bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY].

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I am requested by my colleague, Mr. LAMB, who is unavoidably absent from the House, to make a statement for him as to his attitude on that bill. That statement, which is very brief, I will now read:

"The Democratic Party in its platform at Baltimore having declared in favor of antioption legislation in relation to cotton and grain dealings, it becomes my duty as a loyal Democrat to support this measure, notwithstanding I have made a minority report in opposition to the same. I shall therefore yield my individual judgment to the combined wisdom of the Democratic Party, as set forth in its platform, and vote for the bill."

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, as the debate seems to be exhausted on both sides, I will call for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] wish to dispose of his time?

Mr. LENROOT. Does not the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] wish to use further time?

Mr. POU. I do not know that we can, unless there is a desire for further debate on that side.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, it is somewhat refreshing to hear a Member on the Democratic side of this House assault, as he has just done, a rule reported by the Democratic majority as a rule that does not afford this House an opportunity fully and adequately to consider a bill pending in the House. Permit me to say, however, that the argument made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] would have, I think, greater weight in this House if it were not for the fact that the gentleman himself has voted in this session of Congress for rule after rule that did not permit the House to offer any amendment at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am in sympathy with the purposes and objects——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin enumerate some of these rules prohibiting the offering of any amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. The other day there was one prohibiting the offering of amendments, except a motion to recommit with a substitute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What bill?

Mr. LENROOT. The contempt bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that I did not vote for that. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not vote for it. Perhaps the gentleman can name another.

Mr. LENROOT. If I have misquoted the gentleman, I withdraw that statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman should not make that sort of a statement concerning me. I have been criticized enough for things that I have done without having the gentleman from Wisconsin attempt to criticize me for things I have not done.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but I want to ask the gentleman—because I have no desire to place him in any false light—if he also voted against the resolution bringing in the injunction bill, which was a rule similar to that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I voted for that. And let me say to the gentleman from Wisconsin I would have voted for the contempt rule if I had been present.

Mr. LENROOT. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to find, after all, that I was not mistaken in my first statement. But even if I had been mistaken, in so far as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] is concerned, it would be entirely excusable, because upon these gag rules that have been brought in from time to time the vote on the Democratic side was so nearly unanimous in favor of them that one had every reason to believe and to think that the gentleman from New York was included in that vast majority that voted for such rules as only a short year ago the Democratic majority, then the minority, was opposing.

But, Mr. Speaker, this rule does afford some opportunity for amendment, and it is so much better than we have reason to expect from the Democratic majority lately that I am disposed to accept and vote for the rule myself.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that this opportunity for amendment, with one hour's consideration under the five-minute rule, relates to a bill that primarily concerns the Southern States. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that as time goes on the Democratic majority may be broad enough to permit opportunity to amend bills that affect the Northern States as well as the general welfare of the entire country.

I am disposed to vote for this rule, because although it is a small concession in the public interest, it is some concession, and we ought to be grateful for it. As time goes on I hope that we may have opportunity to amend important bills that are brought before the House.

Let me say for the information of the House that the Committee on Rules has acted upon certain other bills, and that they propose to give reasonable opportunity to offer amendments. I hope that this repentance on the part of the Democratic majority is not manifest because an election is approaching. I hope that that attitude will be evident upon their part at the next session of Congress after the November election as well as now, but I fear that that will not be the case.

I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of the rule, this bill will be up for amendment for one hour. It is quite probable that section 3 will not be reached for amendment within that time. I call the attention of the House to the danger and absurdity of the rule which forbids an amendment to every part of the bill, and which puts the House in the attitude of doing something that nobody wants to do. On page 4, begining in line 19 of this bill, it reads:

> And in any prosecution under the provisions of section 2 or 3 of this act the proof or failure to make any affidavit herein required shall be prima facie evidence that said message or messages related to a contract prohibited by section 2 of this act.

Of course what was intended was—

> The proof of failure—

But gentlemen will be called upon to vote upon the passage of a bill which provides that the proof or the failure either one shall be considered prima facie evidence against the man. Whether you do or do not, you are damned. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. POU. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] was about to join me in protesting against this rule. He has been so vociferous in denouncing special rules brought into the House that when an obvious defect in a rule was pointed out to him I assumed that he would unhesitatingly enlist in my cause. It appears from the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin, however, that he is not so much interested in the substance of the rule as he is in its form. It is immaterial to him whether opportunity be given to the Members of the House really to offer amendments to a bill, so long as the rule in its form pretends to give Members that opportunity; and in view of this attitude of the gentleman from Wisconsin I have no doubt that hereafter the Committee on Rules will be able so to frame special rules for the consideration of measures that, although they will give him no privilege and no right of amendment, still he will be satisfied, because he may be able to pretend that he is obtaining some such privileges and rights.

I suppose that some of the constituents of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] are interested in corn, wheat, and oats. They have some interest in legislation designed to prevent the so-called gambling in those commodities. If the gentleman opposed this rule and marshaled his forces in opposition to it, it might be possible to have this bill considered in such a way that the provisions desired by his constituents might be included within the bill before its passage through the House; but since he is about to support the rule, because in form it apparently makes possible the offering of these amendments, while everyone knows it really will not permit the offering of them, he is, in effect, preventing any attempt being made to include in this bill wheat, corn, and oats, as provided in the Lever bill.

The gentleman says that this rule is designed to help one section of the country as against the other.

Why not join with us, who would be pleased to include provisions in the bill making it apply equally to commodities raised in all parts of the country by perfecting the bill so as to include oats, corn, wheat, and so forth?

Mr. HOBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HOBSON. I desire to ask the gentleman if he would favor a bill that included all of the commodities, or, to put it in another form, does he favor a similar bill for corn, wheat, oats, and the commodities he enumerates?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not; because, as I have stated, under the decision of the United States Supreme Court, Congress has no power to enact this legislation.

Mr. BURLESON. In what case?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In the case of Ware & Leland against the State of Alabama, Two hundred and ninth United States, where, in the State of Alabama, a tax was levied on certain brokers in cotton. They resisted the tax on the ground that they were engaged in interstate commerce. The United States Supreme Court upheld the Supreme Court of the State of Alabama in holding that such contracts were not interstate commerce, but purely State transactions, and could be controlled by any State in the United States. In view of that decision, which is the law of the land, I am unable to find authority for Congress to enact this legislation.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. RUBEY. If the bill were constitutional, would the gentleman be in favor of it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman can prepare a bill which is constitutional and which is designed to eliminate what are considered certain abuses connected with transactions in futures, I certainly would support it; but I do not believe that this bill is designed to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON].

Mr. HOBSON. Mr. Speaker, I have only a few suggestions that I wish to make. The first is that the purpose and effect of the bill is simply to promote honesty. No legitimate transaction of broker or merchant will be interfered with. On the contrary such legitimate transactions will be facilitated. The second is that the nature of the instrumentalities invoked is interstate, and therefore clearly within the jurisdiction of the United States, and this act, like similar acts dealing with interstate commerce, is clearly constitutional. The next is that such a measure prohibiting gambling in the interest of plain honesty and facilitating real contracts and the observance of real contracts has merits and is entitled to the support of all good men, whether it embraces one commodity, another commodity, or all commodities.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOBSON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I concur in the statement which the gentleman has made, but I want to call attention to the fact that this is a rule that we are debating, and not the merits of the bill.

Mr. HOBSON. I am coming to that. The limitations under the five-minute rule are very reasonable, and create no prejudice against other commodities. This is really one of the fairest rules reported to the House for many years, fairer than any similar rule ever reported by a Republican committee within my memory. The next suggestion or point I was going to make is that cotton is special; if we were going to take up the whole question we ought to take it up with cotton alone and then with the other commodities.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Why?

Mr. HOBSON. I will explain that to the gentleman and the gentleman from Nebraska. Cotton is the monopoly production of the United States alone. Of course I do not mean absolutely, but the bulk of the cotton of the world is produced, and must continue to be produced, in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the gentleman, if he will allow me to interrupt him.

Mr. HOBSON. If the gentleman will permit me, he must realize that I have not the time to answer another question. Now, as a Nation we export yearly $500,000,000 worth of this staple. We have exported food products; but the export of food products is dwindling. The day is fast approaching when America will have to import food products. Cotton, though, will remain continually and perpetually, as far as we can see, to the end of time, the one great permanent export of America. This is the commodity, above all commodities, in which America is interested, and especially interested in seeing that the economic laws should be allowed to have their way. The gambling in cotton futures interferes with the working of economic laws and entails heavy losses not only upon the cotton States but upon the whole Nation. If these economic laws hold as the years go on, as the population of the world multiplies, and prosperity of men multiplies, and the demand for cotton increases in proportion, it means the steady balance of trade ever increasing on the side of the United States.

Every patriotic American citizen ought to be a bull, if he can conscientiously be one, on the cotton market, and this body ought to welcome, like the German legislative body welcomes anything that legitimately increases the price of potash—so every legislator here ought to welcome anything that will legitimately increase the price of cotton. It is now and will then become more and more a fundamental factor in promoting the prosperity of the whole Nation. Thus cotton merits individual and special consideration at the hands of this House. I do not agree with the gentleman from New York that we ought not to invoke on this side of the House the support that comes from our platform. It would come with poor grace for any Democrat, it comes with particularly poor grace from the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], to begin to criticize our platform or a section of it, superficially declaring it unconstitutional before it is even cold from the convention. This bill carries out a plank of that platform—a plank that is regularly and legitimately in that platform, and therefore binding on Democrats.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman from North Carolina give me any time?

Mr. POU. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, my time is all parceled out.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, of course I can not say what I would like to in two minutes' time. I agree with a great deal of what the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] has said, but I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is the rule and not the bill that we are first called to vote upon. This rule provides that this bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule for one hour. That is a little better than as if the rule did not give any consideration to the bill under the five-minute rule. There is no reason, however, why the bill should not be considered clear through under the five-minute rule, without regard to limitation of time. It may not take an hour. We ought to consider it so that any Member may have an opportunity to offer an amendment to any part of the bill, that we may consider every section of it. As has been well pointed out, if this rule is adopted it is possible for gentlemen to consume the whole hour on the first section or first two or three sections of the bill, and thus absolutely cut off amendments to the balance of the bill. I am not speaking as an enemy of the bill, but rather as the friend of it. I am not opposing it, but I would like to give every man here an opportunity to offer an amendment to any part of the bill; and in a short bill like this, containing only seven pages, there is no reason why it should not be done. Common fairness would dictate that it ought to be done. It seems to me that the Committee on Rules is at fault when it puts this limitation of one hour in the rule. Why not let us consider it under the five-minute rule clear through to the end of the bill, and thus give a fair opportunity to everybody to offer any amendment that he may see fit? It will not delay the legislation. It is only a method of consideration that ought to be given to every bill unless there is some reason why we should not give that consideration. If this body were going to adjourn to-day without date, there would be some reason for this kind of a rule, but there is no reason why we should not go clear through the bill. Of course, it may not be done; but why should we make it possible for Members to prohibit the offering of an amendment to anything except the first part of the bill?

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker several matters this morning have pleased me very much, and one of those things is that my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has begun the study of constitutional law. He is opposed to the passage of this bill because he finds it to be unconstitutional. I do not remember to have seen him very often bring a law book into the House, but if he will study the law books a little further he will find that this measure is constitutional. If Congress can pass a law prohibiting the transmission of lottery tickets from one State to another as interstate commerce and break up lotteries and kindred transactions, it certainly has the power to prohibit the making of contracts which impede interstate commerce. Mr. Speaker, it grieves me to see the gentleman oppose his party in this matter, and I hope that he will yet change his attitude, for I think we can convince him that the bill is strictly within the limits of the Constitution. Indeed, it is identically the same bill that practically every Member of this House voted for when it passed as the Scott bill. Nearly all of you gentlemen on the other side voted for this bill in identically the same language which is contained in the measure to-day.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I have not much time, but yield for a question.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee why his committee saw fit to bring in this one bill when he had knowledge, or should have had, that a similar measure with regard to other agricultural products had been favorably reported from the Committee on Agriculture? The gentleman is now invoking the Democratic platform in support of this bill, when a similar measure in respect to other agricultural products has been overlooked.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. We may bring in that bill very speedily and give the gentleman an abundance of time to consider it.

Mr. Speaker, I want to read just a few lines from a paper in which the Democratic creed is printed, as it always prints Democratic doctrine, the Commoner.

Mr. MANN. Made by the Commoner, not printed. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I accept the amendment. This is from the Democratic platform adopted in the recent convention at Baltimore, and I commend it to the consideration of the gentleman from New York and am sure he must have overlooked or forgotten it. I appeal to all Democrats to begin now to carry out the pledges of the party as made at that convention and we will have the confidence of the American people from one ocean to the other.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I really have not the time, but go ahead.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Would the gentleman vote for a bill which is insisted by some carries out the provisions of a platform which bill in the gentleman's opinion was unconstitutional?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; I would not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman any right to criticize me for opposing a bill which in my opinion, though I may not conform to the gentleman, does not come within the power of the Congress under the decisions of the United States courts?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Conceding that this bill is constitutional, then would the gentleman from New York support it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I can not conceive that; that is assuming an impossibility, because if it should be constitutional it would be in an entirely different category. The gentleman is asking me to assume an act that we have no power to do.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Well, I can not yield further. It is apparent there is scant opportunity for the gentleman and myself to get together on this proposition. Now I will read the Democratic creed and commend it to gentlemen on this side of the House and to gentlemen on the other side if they wish to get on the proper side of the question:

> We believe in encouraging the development of a modern system of agriculture by a systematic effort to improve the conditions of trade in farm products, so as to benefit both the consumers and producers and as an efficient means to this end we favor the enactment by Congress of legislation that will suppress the pernicious practice of gambling in agricultural products by organized exchanges or others.

Mr. Speaker, there is the expressed pledge of the Democratic Party, inserted not by inadvertence, but deliberately with the intention of being redeemed by the representatives of the American people, and we intend to do it to-day by the passage of this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired; all time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 56) to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations.

Be it enacted, etc., That certain words used in this act and in proceedings pursuant hereto shall, unless the same be inconsistent with the context, be construed as follows: The word "message" shall mean any communication by telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means of communication from one State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia to any other State or Territory of the United States or the District of Columbia or to any foreign country. The word "person" shall mean any person, partnership, joint-stock company, society, association, or corporation, their managers and officers, and when used with reference to the commission of acts which are herein required or forbidden shall include persons who are participants in the required or forbidden acts, and the agents, officers, and members of the boards of directors and trustees, or other similar controlling or directing bodies of partnerships, joint-stock companies, societies, associations, and corporations. And words importing the plural number, wherever used, may be applied to or mean only a single person or thing, and words importing the singular number may be applied to or mean several persons or things.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton without intending that such cotton shall be actually delivered or received, or offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party thereto, or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made, acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or delivery of cotton without being thereby obligated to accept or to deliver such cotton; and the transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations. Any person who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or shall be imprisoned for not more than six months nor less than one month, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and the sending or causing to be sent of each such message shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of any person sending any message relating to a contract or to the making of a contract for future delivery of cotton to furnish to the person transmitting such message an affidavit stating that he is the owner of such cotton and that he has the intention to deliver such cotton; or that such cotton is at the time in actual course of growth on land owned, controlled, or cultivated by him and that he has the intention to deliver such cotton; or that he is, at the time, legally entitled to the right of future possession of such cotton under and by authority of a contract for the sale and future delivery thereof previously made by the owner of such cotton, giving the name of the party or names of parties he has the intention to deliver such cotton; or that he has the intention to acquire and deliver such cotton; or that he has the intention to receive and pay for such cotton: Provided, That any person electing to do so may file with the telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, or cable company an affidavit stating that the message or messages being sent, or to be sent, for the six months next ensuing by such person do not and will not relate to any such contract or offers to contract as are described in section 2 of this act, and any such company shall issue thereupon a certificate evidencing the fact that such affidavit has been duly filed, and such certificate shall be accepted in lieu of the affidavit herein required at all the transmitting offices of such company during the life of said affidavit. Any person who knowingly shall make a false statement in any affidavit provided for in this act shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 nor less than $500, or shall be imprisoned for not more than two years nor less than one year, or by both such fine and imprisonment. And in any prosecution under the provisions of section 2 or 3 of this act the proof or failure to make any affidavit herein required shall be prima facie evidence that said message or messages related to a contract prohibited by section 2 of this act, and the proof of failure to deliver or receive the cotton called for in any contract for future delivery of cotton shall be prima facie proof of failure to deliver or receive the cotton called for in any contract for future delivery of cotton shall be prima facie evidence that there was no intention to deliver or receive such cotton when said contract was made.

SEC. 4. That any agent of any telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, or cable company to whom messages herein described may be tendered is hereby required, empowered, and authorized to administer any oath required to be made under the provisions of this act with like effect and force as officers having a seal, and such oath shall be administered without any charge therefor.

SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person owning or operating any telegraph or telephone line, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means of communication, or any officer, agent, or employee of such person, knowingly to use such property or knowingly to allow such property to be used for the transmission of any message relating to such contracts as are described in section 2 of this act. Any person who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished for each offense by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $500, and the sending of each message in violation of the provisions of this section shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 6. That every book, newspaper, pamphlet, letter, writing, or other publication containing matter tending to induce or promote the making of such contracts as are described in section 2 of this act is hereby declared to be nonmailable matter, and shall not be carried in the mail or delivered by any postmaster or letter carrier. Any person who shall knowingly deposit or knowingly cause to be deposited for mailing or delivery any matter declared by this section to be nonmailable, or shall knowingly take or cause the same to be taken from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing thereof, or of aiding in the circulation or disposition thereof, shall be fined not more than $5,000 nor less than $500, or shall be imprisoned not more than five years nor less than one year, or both. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section may be proceeded against by information or indictment and tried and punished either in the district at which the unlawful publication was mailed or to which it is carried by mail for delivery according to the direction thereof, or at which it is caused to be delivered by mail to the person to whom it is addressed.

SEC. 7. That the Postmaster General, upon evidence satisfactory to himself that any person in sending through the mails of the United States any matter declared by section 6 of this act to be nonmailable, may instruct the postmasters in the post offices at which such mail arrives to return all such mail to the postmaster in the post office at which it was originally mailed, with the word "unlawful" plainly written or stamped upon the outside thereof, and all such mail, when returned to said postmaster, shall be returned to the sender or publisher thereof under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

SEC. 8. That in any proceeding under this act all persons may be required to testify and to produce books and papers, and the claim that such testimony or evidence may tend to criminate the persons giving such testimony or producing such evidence shall not excuse such person from testifying or producing such books and papers; but no person shall be prosecuted or subjected to any penalty or punishment whatever for or on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence of any character whatever.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any understanding as to how the time shall be divided? If there is no objection the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] will be recognized for one hour in favor of the bill and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] will be recognized for one hour in opposition to the bill. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

[Mr. BEALL of Texas addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RUBEY). Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] desire to consume any more time on his side?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. REDFIELD. Mr. Speaker, even if this bill, up to the close of section 5, were, in my judgment, everything that is to be desired, I could not vote for it or for any bill, no matter for what purpose designed, that carried with it so extraordinary a clause as section 6 contains. It seems to me, whatever it be founded upon, that it creates a situation that is peculiar and astonishing. The language of section 6, when it is read with care, carries with it, I am sure, such a conclusion as to make it seem that this section could hardly have been intended to be taken seriously.

If this thing be supposed to be a poem or a work of the imagination, then section 6 has a place in it. But for sober-minded and thoughtful men to attempt to enact into law, no matter upon what precedent, such language as section 6 contains, is, to my mind, so amusing as to prove it to be impracticable and not to be taken seriously. For it says, among other things, that every letter, writing, or other publication containing matter "tending to induce" or promote the making of such contracts as are described in section 2 is unmailable; and then it proceeds to provide penalties for the crime of mailing and penalties for him who takes out of the mails that which is unmailable. It does not provide any means for finding out what a letter contains in order to make it unmailable. If a letter is written containing the fearful and new crime which may be entitled "tendency to inducement" created in this bill, and the act be found out, it is made a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment. Is it to be the duty of the postmaster to examine letters mailed in order to see whether this crime of "tendency to inducement" really exists?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. I can not yield.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I will give the gentleman two minutes if he will yield.

Mr. REDFIELD. Very well.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. The gentleman criticizes section 6, does he not?

Mr. REDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. That is modeled exactly after the antilottery section of the statutes which was enacted some years ago.

Mr. REDFIELD. I am interested to hear that. But, no matter what it is modeled after, it is absurd, because it creates a situation which is simply impossible. A letter containing this "tendency to inducement" is not to be mailed. Who is to find out whether it contains that inducement before it is mailed? It is impossible to find that out.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. REDFIELD. I regret I can not yield further. Furthermore, what is it that is meant by "tends to induce"? Does the young man, when he writes a letter to a young lady and signs himself "Yours, sincerely," tend to induce her to accept an offer of matrimony? Does it tend to induce her to take him as hers, sincerely? What is the crime of "tendency to inducement," which is made subject to a maximum fine of $5,000 or five years' imprisonment and to a minimum fine of $500 and one year's imprisonment, or both, to the writer and to the person who innocently receives a letter in which this crime of "tendency to inducement" is committed? Suppose, for example, that this has been a law for six months. In perfect good faith, a man writes to his counsel or a friend in the business and suggests that this law be tested in the courts, and, in order to be tested in the courts, recommends that a case under this law be brought. Then, in so doing, he may commit a crime for which he may be fined $5,000 and subjected to five years' imprisonment, and the man who gets the letter may be fined $5,000 and be subjected to five years' imprisonment, and all for the tendency of inducement, which is not defined, nor is any person given authority to state what the crime of tendency to inducement is.

The whole thing is so vague that, if it be conceded that the purpose of the bill and its language is in every other respect wise and right and sound, this whole matter of the unmailability of articles under seal, protected by law from examination before mailing, is so absurd, and the whole indefiniteness of the tendency to inducement is so plain, that it is too drastic a power to put into the hands of a postmaster or a postmaster general.

I think that really, no matter what it is founded upon, a bill containing this language in section 6, and also the language in section 7, based upon it, is therefore made both laughable and unworkable and wrong in principle and calculated to bring perfectly innocent parties who may merely get letters or pamphlets through the mail into the position of committing a criminal act, which is absurd. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. REDFIELD] to use the two minutes that I gave him.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to detain the House but a short time with what I have to say in reference to this bill, because I believe that it is thoroughly understood, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL], who has already addressed the House, has in a very forcible, succinct, and pointed way discussed the specific sections of the bill and demonstrated their effect. As was stated by him, this bill is intended only to forbid and prohibit gambling in cotton futures. There is no desire on the part of anybody and there is no provision in this bill which prevents honest dealing in cotton. If a man wants to buy a hundred bales of cotton, to be delivered to him at a specific and definite time in the future, he can buy the product itself under this bill and demand it, and it can be delivered to him, and he can pay for it and get possession of his property. The bill is simply intended to prevent the gambling to which the people of this country are opposed and which ought to be prohibited, not only in reference to this product, but any other product of any kind or description.

As was stated a moment ago, section 6 is modeled after the lottery statute, which has been sustained by the courts of the country and is to-day the law of the land in reference to matters of that character, and it is invoked in this bill because of the fact that experience has shown that it can be enforced and that it is in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution which permit its enactment and enforcement.

So far as the demand for this legislation is concerned, the people who are more directly interested in this great product than anybody else, the producers themselves, have for years come to this Congress and asked for this legislation, and so far as I know or believe there is a universal demand on their part for the enactment of this law. They are perfectly willing that their product should be sold in the market for what it is actually worth, and they are willing to have it go into the markets of the world and to secure the price which the demand for it will fix; but they are opposed, and every honest man ought to be opposed, to having their products dealt in in a gambling way so that the value may be fixed by fictitious, unlawful, gambling transactions, when there is no intention or purpose on the part of the purchaser to accept the cotton or on the part of the seller to deliver the cotton, but it is simply bought and sold on the exchanges with a view of settling upon the basis of margins.

As the rules of the cotton exchanges are fixed to-day, if a man demands the cotton itself, any character of cotton can be delivered without regard to the classification, and a small amount is kept on hand for the purpose of meeting such demands, with no idea or view of delivering any grade which may be demanded or purchased at any time, but simply cotton of any character, description, or order. These transactions affect the price of the product detrimentally to the producer, detrimentally to the man who brings it upon the market by his own effort and energy. Hence he does not have the opportunity to secure the real value, but the price is fixed by these fictitious and gambling transactions.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CANDLER. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Is the combination of cotton growers in the South understood to be a combination to raise prices or to lower prices?

Mr. CANDLER. They are no combination at all. They simply want an opportunity to sell their product upon the markets for its value as may be fixed by the demand for it, at a price which may be fixed in accordance with that demand—nothing more and nothing less.

When they can secure its actual value they are content, and they do not want that value affected by these transactions, which should be unlawful and that are merely engaged in in a speculative or gambling way. This bill forbids dealing in futures, which it ought to prohibit in the interest of honesty and fair dealing with the producers of this great product. I was on the subcommittee that reported this bill to the full Agricultural Committee, and we gave it careful consideration, after extensive hearings, and it comes to this House with the approval of the Agricultural Committee, which also gave it serious consideration; and it ought to pass this House, and I hope and believe it will pass by a large majority. [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, but I was in hopes that there might be some result from several meetings by Representatives of this House and the Senate when we agreed upon an amalgamated bill covering the grain products as well as the cotton. For some reason, I do not know what—and I am not charging any ulterior motive in regard to it—these bills have been separated and the cotton bill, which in my judgment is less defensible from the standpoint of gambling than the grain bill, has been brought in here first. I am assured that when this other bill is presented it will have the same votes that this bill received. I thoroughly hope that there is no deception in this matter because I have been put on record with reference to this grain bill. I was appointed as one of the Members of the House, and my friend over here at my left as another Member, to canvass Congress with reference to whether these two bills should be at the same time considered, and whether they would receive the same votes.

I want to say, gentlemen, that cotton grows up from the seed to its blossom, but I do not believe you have any more complaint to make against the gamblers than we grain men have. The gamblers sell your cotton before it blossoms. The gamblers sell our grain before the seeder has gone over the soil. It does not even crop out of the earth in the way of a spear, and hence it is just as necessary to legislate against the gambler in the grain as it is to legislate against the gambler in the cotton. There can not be any difference. If one is right the other is right; if one is wrong the other is wrong. Therefore I say here to-day, and I want to serve notice on you gentlemen who are voting for this bill, that we have agreed among ourselves—because we got everybody here we could find—that these two bills should come here amalgamated. But it appears that they have been separated, and I shall demand a vote from every one that votes for the cotton bill to vote for the grain bill when it comes before the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to attempt, within the brief time at my disposal, a general discussion of the merits or demerits of speculating in futures in cotton. In my opinion there are abuses connected with the present methods that should be eliminated. I am also of the opinion that if such transactions were entirely prohibited the producer of cotton would suffer as grievously as anybody else from such legislation. The legality of such transactions which gentlemen condemn has been upheld by the highest court in this land, in the case of the Chicago Board of Trade v. Christy (198 U. S., 236).

In that case the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration the question of the legality of the transactions upon the board of trade. The direct question was stated by the court as follows:

> It is said that the plaintiff itself keeps the greatest of bucket shops, in the sense of an Illinois statute of June 6, 1887—that is, places wherein is permitted the pretended buying and selling of grain, etc., without any intention of receiving and paying for the property so bought or of delivering the property so sold.

Mr. Justice Holmes said:

> It appears that in no less than three-quarters of the transactions in the grain pit there is no physical handing over of any grain, but that there is a settlement, either by the direct method, so called, or by what is known as "ringing up." The direct method consists simply in setting off contracts to buy wheat of a certain amount at a certain time against contracts to sell a like amount at the same time and paying the difference of price in cash at the end of the business day. The ring settlement is reached by a comparison of books among the clerks of the members buying and selling in the pit and picking out a series of transactions which begins and ends with dealings which can be set against each other by eliminating those between, as if A has sold to B 5,000 bushels of May wheat, and B has sold the same amount to C, and C to D, and D to A. Substituting D for B by novation, A's sale can be set against his on simply paying the difference in price.

And the legality of direct settlements, ring settlements, and hedging was asserted.

> The sales in the pits are not pretended, but, as we have said, are meant and supposed to be binding. A set off is in legal effect a delivery. We speak only of the contracts made in the pits, because in them the members are principals. * * * The proportion of the dealing in the pit which are settled in this way throws no light on the question of the proportion of serious dealings for legitimate business purposes to those which may be classed as wagers, or pretended contracts. No more does the fact that the contracts thus disposed of call for many times the total receipts of grain in Chicago. The fact that they can be and are set off sufficiently explains the possibility, which is no more wonderful than the enormous disproportion between the currency of the country and contracts for the payment of money, many of which in like manner are set off in clearing houses without anyone dreaming that they are not paid, and for the rest of which the same money suffices in succession, the less being needed the more rapid the circulation.

The court also said:

This court has upheld sales of stock for future delivery and the substitution of parties provided for by the rules of the Chicago Stock Exchange. (Clews v. Jamieson, 182 U. S., 461.)

Some gentlemen have attempted to criticize me for my position on the pending bill because the Democratic platform adopted at Baltimore contains a provision favoring legislation which would prohibit, if I recall the language correctly, "pernicious gambling in farm products." I am in entire accord with that provision of the Democratic platform.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. Does it use the word "pernicious"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection of the language is that it is "pernicious gambling." I repeat that I am in accord with that provision of the platform, and I shall cheerfully support legislation designed to accomplish such a result. I did not recall the exact wording of the platform when it was mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY]. I was quite certain it had not approved this particular bill. The declaration in the platform does not mean, Mr. Speaker, that every bill proposing to accomplish certain results, no matter where the bill originates, no matter who favors it, is legislation which a party man is compelled to support because of such a provision as that contained in the Baltimore platform. I deny that this bill does or can accomplish what the platform favors. Legislation to carry out the pledges of the party will receive my support. I regard party platforms as binding, but I do not agree that this bill carries out the platform pledge or is wise legislation. I know that nobody interested in making the platform desired to coerce men to support a bill which in their honest judgment, based on an opinion of the United States Supreme Court, is beyond the power of Congress to enact. This bill would not stop pernicious gambling in cotton options, but it would completely eliminate important and necessary and proper and legitimate transactions, which are essential for the proper marketing of the cotton crop of the country.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] in his statement a while ago seemed to be somewhat amused at the fact that I had any opinion as to the constitutionality of any proposed legislation; he commented with some surprise upon the fact that I finally had carried into the House a law book. He stated that he had never known me on any other occasion to bring a law book into this body. Mr. Speaker, my experience and observation has been that if many of the so-called constitutional lawyers in this House carried around fewer law books and better and more thoroughly understood a few cases decided by the United States Supreme Court, they would much better comprehend the powers of Congress in many respects. I shall indulge myself in the belief that I am able to understand at least one decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which applies to this bill—a decision which in my opinion points out clearly that Congress has no power to enact this legislation.

Section 2 of the bill provides:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton without intending that such cotton shall be actually delivered or received, or offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party thereto, or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made, acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or delivery of cotton without being thereby obligated to accept or to deliver such cotton; and the transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations.

The section then provides generally for violation of its provisions. That the authors of the bill themselves had very grave doubt as to their ability to make the sending of such a message a crime is evident from the fact that they believed it essential to insert the language:

And the transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations.

The only power that Congress has to make the sending of such messages a crime is the fact that it is interstate commerce. That is why the law affecting the lottery case was upheld, namely, that the transmission of the lottery ticket itself constituted commerce, and Congress could control it. The United States Supreme Court in the case of Ware & Leland v. Mobile County (209 U. S.) had this case before it.

Mr. RUCKER of Colorado. What is the date of it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. October, 1907. The State of Alabama had enacted a law which provided that each person engaged in the business of buying and selling futures for speculation or on commission, either for themselves or for other persons, and each place of business commonly known as cotton exchanges or stock exchanges, and sometimes called bucket shops in towns and cities of 20,000 inhabitants or more, should pay a license fee of $500. The State and county had levied this license tax upon the plaintiffs in error in two cases; they resisted the enforcement of the tax upon the ground that they were engaged in interstate and foreign commerce. The case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appeared that the plaintiffs in error were brokers, with offices in Mobile, Ala., and with branch offices in New Orleans, Chicago, and New York. They were engaged in the ordinary business of a broker—of accepting orders for the purchase and sale of cotton and grain, telegraphing these messages from one State to another, and settling, either upon the closing out of the transactions, or, in very few instances, as it appeared upon the deliveries of the commodities agreed to be purchased or sold. The contention of the plaintiffs in error was that they were engaged in interstate commerce, and that the State had no power to levy a tax upon them or upon the business in which they were engaged. The Supreme Court, after setting out the statement of facts, said:

The sole question here presented is whether the statute in question is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, for if the plaintiffs in error are shown by the foregoing agreed facts to be engaged in interstate commerce, then the statute is void, as an attempt by a State to regulate the commerce which the Constitution of the United States places within the exclusive control of Federal authority.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the court then refers to the case of Leloup v. Mobile (127 U. S., 640), where telegraph companies were held to be engaged in interstate commerce. Reference is also made to the case of Paul against Virginia, in which the question as to whether insurance policies are interstate commerce was determined, and to the case of Hooper v. California (155 U. S.), in which it is pointed out that a contract of insurance is not an instrumentality of commerce, but a mere incident of commercial intercourse. It is also shown that—if the power to regulate interstate commerce applied to all the incidents to which said commerce might give rise and to all contracts which might be made in the course of its transaction, that power would embrace the entire sphere of mercantile activity in any way connected with trade between the States, and would exclude State control over many contracts purely domestic in their nature.

With the permission of the House I shall insert the complete opinion as part of my remarks.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? Section 2——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish the gentleman would permit me to finish discussing this case and then I shall yield. And then the court comes to the facts in the case at bar:

But how stands the present case—

Said the court—

upon the facts stipulated? The appellants are brokers who take orders and transmit them to other States for the purchase and sale of grain or cotton upon speculation. They are in no just sense common carriers of messages as are the telegraph companies. For that part of the transactions, merely speculative and followed by no actual delivery, it can not be fairly contended that such contracts are the subject of interstate commerce, and concerning such of the contracts for purchases for future delivery as result in actual delivery of the grain or cotton, the stipulated facts show that when the orders transmitted are received in the foreign State the property is bought in that State and there held for the purchaser. The transaction was thus closed by a contract completed and executed in the foreign State, although the orders were received from another State. When the delivery was upon a contract of sale made by the broker the seller was at liberty to acquire the cotton in the market where the delivery was required or elsewhere. He did not contract to ship it from one State to the place of delivery in another State. And though it is stipulated that shipments were made from Alabama to the foreign State in some instances, that was not because of any contractual obligation so to do. In neither class of contracts—for sale or purchase—was there necessarily any movement of commodities in interstate traffic, because of the contracts made by the brokers.

These contracts are not, therefore, the subjects of interstate commerce any more than in the insurance cases, where the policies are ordered and delivered in another State than that of the residence and office of the company. The delivery, when one was made, was not because of any contract obliging an interstate shipment, and the fact that the purchaser might thereafter transmit the subject matter of purchase by means of interstate carriage did not make the contracts as made and executed the subjects of interstate commerce.

We are of the opinion that the Supreme Court of Alabama correctly held that the transactions of the plaintiffs in error were not interstate commerce, and the judgments in both cases are affirmed.

The very contracts themselves are not interstate commerce. Upon what theory, then, can the Congress prohibit the sending of a message by telegraph or by telephone or in any other way affecting contracts which are domestic in themselves unless declared illegal in the States and which affect transactions which have been held are not transactions in interstate commerce? It seems to me clear, Mr. Speaker, that the Congress has not the power to enact this legislation. Even if this bill did not do what I believe it will do—go far beyond what it is desired should be accomplished by eliminating whatever improper practices may exist in connection with dealing in cotton futures—I should not be able to support it in view of the case to which I have referred. Here is a case which is as clearly applicable to this bill, and the court differentiates the cases which the gentlemen rely upon in order to support this bill. Whether the purpose be to accomplish desirable results or to carry out declarations in party platforms, no Member of this House can possibly support a bill which clearly is beyond the power which Congress has under the Constitution. Now I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to section 2.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the only section I have discussed.

Mr. ALEXANDER (reading)—

That it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton without intending that such cotton shall be actually delivered or received—

Now, if I understand it, nearly every State in the Union has a statute declaring that kind of a contract to be absolutely void and the supreme courts of the different States have uniformly held that class of contracts to be void, and so with reference to the following:

Or offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party thereto, or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made, acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or delivery of cotton without being thereby obligated to accept or to deliver such cotton.

Now, the statutes of the different States say that class of contract is void and the decisions of the supreme courts of the States say that class of contracts is void.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; the decisions of the United States Supreme Court do not say that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I say the courts of the several States have declared that class of contracts were void. I do not think you can find an exception to it. Now, as I understand it, all this bill does is to say that telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, or cable, and all kinds of communication——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman wish to ask a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. That these agencies of interstate commerce shall not be used——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think the gentleman should make a speech in my five minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I understand the gentleman differentiated——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know, but I do not think the gentleman should consume the whole of my time. Let him take his time to express his own views. I should prefer to express mine in my own time.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield the gentleman from New York another five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman wishes to ask a question I will yield.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I can not ask a question unless I form the premise for the question first.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I concede the decision, but I say it has absolutely nothing to do with this case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And that is the reason I was laying the basis for asking a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman did not attempt to ask a question, but the gentleman attempted to argue the question from his standpoint, and after he had advanced his argument, I assume, would ask if I agreed or disagreed with him.

I will try to state my view of this matter. The gentleman does not agree with it. He apparently will not be converted to my views, and I shall not be converted to his view. I simply ask the privilege of stating my own views. I will answer a question, however, if the gentleman desires to ask one.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Does not the bill, then, simply come to do this, to say that the telegraph and telephone and wireless-telegraph companies and other interstate agencies shall not be used, including the Post Office Department, to carry or disseminate knowledge with reference to these contracts alleged to be illegal? Is not that all?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. This attempts to prohibit the sending of certain messages, and the only ground upon which Congress can do that is that these messages are interstate commerce. I do not think the gentleman will differ with me on that proposition, and that the contract itself, after being made in writing, as was done in the Ware & Leland case, has been held by the court not to be interstate commerce.

I am unable to see how the message being sent for the purpose of making a contract, or the making of a contract itself, by telegraph can be held to be interstate commerce. I do not think there is any question about it whatever. In the case to which I have referred is the following in the agreed statement of facts upon which it was decided:

No actual delivery of cotton or grain was ever made on any such contract except in a few instances when such delivery was made when the contracts were executed, to wit, in New York, N. Y., or New Orleans, La., or Chicago, Ill.

Of course when gentlemen assert a power in the Congress to enact certain legislation they should be able, Mr. Speaker, to sustain their contention by citing decisive authority. I know that men who are anxious to enact this legislation are sincere in their efforts to eliminate certain abuses. In my opinion, some of them are mistaken in the belief that certain features of these transactions are abuses. For many years men have been led to believe that their failure to obtain larger returns for cotton which they produce is due entirely to transactions upon certain cotton exchanges.

From a somewhat extended and as careful an investigation as it has been possible for me to make, the exchanges are an important and valuable instrumentality for making stable and certain the prices of commodities traded in through their members. The existence of the exchanges is of value to the producer as well as to the consumer. Their place is well fixed by economic writers and students. It would be futile to deny that abuses have existed in connection with them. I believe that they have existed. I am informed that legitimate efforts have been made to eliminate the abuses. Whatever can be done by legislation should be done. From careful study and from information furnished me by men competent to judge I am convinced that this bill, even if within the power of Congress to enact, will not give the relief desired. In the time allowed to discuss the bill it is not possible to go exhaustively into the various phases of the subject. I have merely sought an opportunity to refer briefly to the reasons which make it impossible for me to support the bill, which I hope will never be enacted into law.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the way indicated my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. Justice Day delivered the opinion of the court.

These cases were submitted together and are in all respects similar, and involve the constitutional validity of subdivision 40 of an act of the Legislature of Alabama imposing license taxes, "to better provide for the revenue of the State," general acts, 1903, page 207, which reads as follows:

"For each person engaged in the business of buying and selling futures for speculation or on commission, either for themselves or for other persons, and each place of business commonly known as cotton exchanges, or stock exchanges, and sometimes called 'bucket shops,' in towns and cities of 20,000 inhabitants or more, $500; in all other towns and cities, $250; but this shall not be held to legalize any contract which would otherwise be invalid."

In case No. 173 the action was brought by Mobile County for the recovery of the defendants' license tax for the year 1903, for engaging in the business of buying and selling futures on commission for other persons in the city of Mobile. The other case (No. 174) was an action by the State. Plaintiffs recovered in the circuit court and both judgments were affirmed by the Supreme Court. (146 Ala., 163.)

The cases were submitted upon an agreed statement of the facts as follows:

"During the whole of the year 1903 defendants had an office in the city of Mobile, in the county of Mobile and State of Alabama; they also had offices in the city of New York in the State of New York, and in the city of New Orleans in the State of Louisiana, and in the city of Chicago in the State of Illinois, each of which offices was connected by private telegraph wires with said Mobile office.

"Said Mobile, Ala., office was in charge of their agent, one Robbins, and was engaged in the business of buying and selling cotton for future delivery, on commission, for the public generally and for special customers, said business being conducted in the following way and in no other way: They would undertake, through their agent, to buy or sell a cotton future contract for a customer in the cotton exchange in New York or in New Orleans, as he might select, he making at the time a deposit of money with them as a margin to protect them against loss in making such transaction for him. When the customer gave the order to Ware & Leland, either for a sale or a purchase of a future contract, it was not usual for anything to be said between them about an actual delivery of the cotton, but when the transaction was commenced by a purchase or sale of the cotton Ware & Leland would immediately furnish to the customer a memorandum thereof, partly written and partly printed, upon which the following stipulations were printed: 'On all marginal business we reserve the right to close transactions without further notice when margins are about exhausted and to settle contracts in accordance with the rules and customs of the exchange on which the order is placed, it being understood and agreed in all trades that actual delivery is contemplated,' and 'All purchases and sales made by us for you are made in accordance with and subject to the rules, regulations, and customs of the exchange on which the order is placed, and the rules, regulations, and requirements of the board of managers of said exchange, and all amendments that may be made thereto.' Such agent would thereupon transmit such order by their private telegraph line to the defendants' office in the city without the State of Alabama selected for such transaction; that such order would be thereupon executed by defendants by the purchase or sale, as directed, of a future cotton contract for such customer in the cotton exchange of the city to which such order was sent, and subject to the rules and regulations of such cotton exchange, which rules and regulations may be introduced in evidence by defendants in this cause; that said contract would be held by defendants for such customer until he ordered the same closed out, when they would sell or buy another cotton contract against it as might be necessary to cover the same or close it out, or receive or deliver the cotton on said contract. If a profit was made on the transaction, defendants remitted the same to its agent in Mobile, who paid it over to the customer; if a loss was made, it was taken by the agent out of the customer's margin, or, if that was insufficient therefor, the customer was called on for the balance. Said business was done on a commission paid defendants by the customers.

"No actual delivery of cotton or grain was ever made on any such contracts, except in a few instances, when such deliveries were made where the contracts were executed, to wit, in New York, N. Y., or in New Orleans, La., or Chicago, Ill. When any such delivery of cotton was made to defendants for the customer on a purchase by him, it was held by the defendants for account of the customer at the place of delivery, either in New York, N. Y., or in New Orleans, La., until ordered sold by the customer, and was then sold by them there for the account of the customer, and the proceeds accounted for by them to such customer. When they made delivery of cotton on a sale of futures made by them for a customer, the cotton was shipped by the customer for whom such sale was made from Alabama to the place of sale and there delivered through defendants to the buyer.

"A similar future grain business was done by defendants at their said office in Mobile, Ala., for customers through their office in Chicago, in the State of Illinois, said orders being executed on the Chicago (Ill.) Board of Trade, and subject to its rules and regulations, which contemplated and provided for the actual receipt or delivery of grain bought or sold therein, such delivery to be made in Chicago, Ill.

"During the whole of the year 1903 said city of Mobile, Ala., was a city of more than 20,000 inhabitants.

"Defendant paid to plaintiff a license tax of $100 for doing such business in said city for the year 1903, which payment was made prior to the 4th day of March, 1903; they have not paid any further license tax to plaintiff for doing such business in said year."

Upon the trial of the action, in addition to the foregoing agreed facts, the counsel for the plaintiff admitted that the rules and regulations of the New York Cotton Exchange, New Orleans Cotton Exchange, and Chicago Board of Trade, respectively, provided "that contracts executed therein should be in writing; and also provided that in every cotton or grain contract for future delivery executed and entered into in said exchange or board of trade it should be stipulated, agreed, and understood that an actual receipt and delivery of the cotton or grain was to be had, and that said contracts were transferable and assignable."

The sole question here presented is whether the statute in question is an attempt to regulate interstate commerce, for if the plaintiffs in error are shown by the foregoing agreed facts to be engaged in interstate commerce, then the statute is void, as an attempt by a State to regulate the commerce which the Constitution of the United States places within the exclusive control of Federal authority.

Interstate commerce must be such as takes places between States as differentiated from commerce wholly within a State. It must have reference to interstate trade or dealing, and if the regulation is not such, and comprehends only commerce which is internal, the State may legislate concerning it. In each case the recurring question is, On which side of the line does the commerce under investigation fall?

It is unnecessary to review the former decisions of this court, as that has been done in very recent cases, such as the Lottery case (188 U. S., 321), where it was held that the transportation of lottery tickets was interstate commerce and as such subject to regulation by act of Congress. In that case the Federal act prohibiting the transmission of lottery tickets was sustained because of the actual carriage in interstate traffic of the tickets themselves; and in concluding the opinion of the majority of the court Mr. Justice Harlan said (p. 363):

"The whole subject is too important and the questions suggested by its consideration are too difficult of solution to justify any attempt to lay down a rule for determining in advance the validity of every statute that may be enacted under the commerce clause. We decide nothing more in the present case than that lottery tickets are subjects of traffic among those who choose to sell or buy them; that the carriage of such tickets by independent carriers from one State to another is therefore interstate commerce; that under its power to regulate commerce among the several States Congress, subject to the limitations imposed by the Constitution upon the exercise of the powers granted, has plenary authority over such commerce and may prohibit the carriage of such tickets from State to State; and that legislation to that end and of that character is not inconsistent with any limitation or restriction imposed upon the exercise of the powers granted to Congress."

And in Leloup v. Mobile (127 U. S., 640) it was held that a telegraph company, whose business is the transmission of messages from one State to another, invested with the powers and privileges conferred by Congress, could not be compelled to pay a license tax by the State. And in Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co. it was held that interstate telegraphic communications, conducted by companies organized for that purpose, was commerce within the regulating power of Congress. The Pensacola case was affirmed in Telegraph Co. v. Texas (105 U. S., 460), in which case Mr. Chief Justice Waite, speaking for the court, said (p. 464): "A telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods."

While the general principles applied in these cases are not to be denied, there is a class of cases which hold that contracts between citizens of different States are not the subjects of interstate commerce simply because they are negotiated between citizens of different States or by the agent of a company in another State where the contract itself is to be completed and carried out wholly within the borders of a State, although such contracts incidentally affect interstate trade.

As in the cases involving insurance policies, it has been held that issuing them in one State and sending them to another, to be there delivered to the insured upon payment of premium, is not a transaction of interstate commerce. Paul v. Virginia (8 Wall., 168), Hooper v. California (155 U. S., 648), New York Life Insurance Co. v. Cravens (178 U. S., 389).

In Paul v. Virginia Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion of the court, said (p. 183):

"Issuing a policy of insurance is not a transaction of commerce. The policies are simple contracts of indemnity against loss by fire, entered into between the corporations and the assured for a consideration paid by the latter. These contracts are not articles of commerce in any proper meaning of the word. They are not subjects of trade and barter offered in the market as something having an existence and value independent to the parties to them. They are not commodities to be shipped or forwarded from one State to another and then put up for sale. They are like other personal contracts between parties which are completed by their signature and the transfer of the consideration. Such contracts are not interstate transactions, though the parties may be domiciled in different States. The policies do not take effect—are not executed contracts—until delivered by the agent in Virginia. They are, then, local transactions and are governed by the local law. They do not constitute a part of the commerce between the States any more than a contract for the purchase and sale of goods in Virginia by a citizen of New York whilst in Virginia would constitute a portion of such commerce."

In Hooper v. California (155 U. S., 648) it was said:

"If the power to regulate interstate commerce applied to all the incidents to which said commerce might give rise and to all contracts which might be made in the course of its transaction, that power would embrace the entire sphere of mercantile activity in any way connected with trade between the States and would exclude State control over many contracts purely domestic in their nature. The business of insurance is not commerce. The contract of insurance is not an instrumentality of commerce. The making of such a contract is a mere incident of commercial intercourse, and in this respect there is no difference whatever between insurance against fire and insurance against 'the perils of the sea.'"

These cases are not in conflict with those in which it is held that the negotiation of sales of goods in a State by a person employed to solicit for them in another State, the goods to be shipped from the one State to the other, is interstate commerce. Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing District (120 U. S., 489); similar cases are Rearick v. Pennsylvania (203 U. S., 507) and Caldwell v. North Carolina (187 U. S., 622). In these cases goods in a foreign State are sold upon orders for the purpose of bringing them to the State which undertakes to tax them, and the transactions are held to be interstate commerce because the subject matter of the dealing is goods to be shipped in interstate commerce—to be carried between States and delivered from vendor to purchaser by means of interstate carriage.

But how stands the present case upon the facts stipulated? The appellants are brokers who take orders and transmit them to other States for the purchase and sale of grain or cotton upon speculation. They are, in no just sense, common carriers of messages, as are the telegraph companies. For that part of the transactions, merely speculative and followed by no actual delivery, it can not be fairly contended that such contracts are the subject of interstate commerce; and concerning such of the contracts for purchases for future delivery as result in actual delivery of the grain or cotton, the stipulated facts show that when the orders transmitted are received in the foreign State the property is bought in that State and there held for the purchaser.

The transaction was thus closed by a contract completed and executed in the foreign State, although the orders were received from another State. When the delivery was upon a contract of sale made by the broker, the seller was at liberty to acquire the cotton in the market where the delivery was required or elsewhere. He did not contract to ship it from one State to the place of delivery in another State. And though it is stipulated that shipments were made from Alabama to the foreign State in some instances, that was not because of any contractual obligation so to do. In neither class of contracts, for sale or purchase, was there necessarily any movement of commodities in interstate traffic, because of the contracts made by the brokers.

These contracts are not, therefore, the subjects of interstate commerce, any more than in the insurance cases, where the policies are ordered and delivered in another State than that of the residence and office of the company. The delivery, when one was made, was not because of any contract obliging an interstate shipment, and the fact that the purchaser might thereafter transmit the subject matter of purchase by means of interstate carriage did not make the contracts as made and executed the subjects of interstate commerce.

We are of the opinion that the Supreme Court of Alabama correctly held that the transactions of the plaintiffs in error were not interstate commerce, and the judgments in both cases are affirmed.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I shall only discuss the legality or constitutionality of this bill. The vital part of this measure is contained in the following section, viz:

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton without intending that such cotton shall be actually delivered or received, or offering to make or enter into a contract whereby any party thereto, or any party for whom or in whose behalf such contract is made, acquires the right or privilege to demand in the future the acceptance or delivery of cotton without being thereby obligated to accept or to deliver such cotton; and the transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations. Any person who shall be guilty of violating this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or shall be imprisoned for not more than six months nor less than one month, or by both such fine and imprisonment, and the sending or causing to be sent of each such message shall constitute a separate offense.

When the Constitution of the United States was framed every State in the Union under the Articles of Confederation had the right to prohibit the importation or entrance across its borders of anything in the world it pleased. Now, when these States possessing these sovereign powers came together in constitutional convention the question of interstate commerce bothered them greatly. They had to surrender that power which they formerly had to somebody, and finally they did surrender it, and they surrendered it in the Constitution to the Congress of the United States in these words:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with Indian tribes.

Over and over again the Supreme Court of the United States has held that that clause in the Constitution gives this body, or, rather, Congress, plenary and absolute power and control over not only the commerce itself but over all the instrumentalities of interstate commerce.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. How about the insurance case and the transfer of insurance policies from one State to another?

Mr. WEBB. You can, under the Constitution, prohibit the transportation of the insurance policy itself. The court says the making of the contract is not interstate commerce, but Congress can prohibit the transportation of the policy. In the lottery case it was held we could prohibit the transmission of a little bit of card with a few words printed thereon. The Congress has the power to prohibit the transmission in the mails and in interstate commerce of that little card on which the contract was printed. It is the physical thing which we prohibit and control in interstate commerce. Now, as I say, when these States yielded up this power they reposed it in Congress not only to control the commerce that goes through interstate channels, but to control the instrumentalities of such commerce. Now, I never wanted to believe the power of Congress under the Constitution was that broad and plenary, but any gentleman who will read decisions of the Supreme Court from the beginning of the Government to the present must come to the conclusion that the only and the sole power to regulate all objects of interstate commerce and instrumentalities of commerce resides in the Congress of the United States. We have exercised that power pretty freely recently.

The lottery case is one in point. We exercise that power in prohibiting the shipment of whisky through the mails in the United States; we exercised it in prohibiting the shipment of dead birds when killed in violation of the law of the State from which the birds are shipped. There is nothing wrong with the birds. They are good and wholesome, and all that, but we prohibit the shipment of them because they were killed in violation of the law of some State. We prohibit the importation of English sparrows. We do not allow a vessel leaving the ports of the United States to carry loose hay. We passed a few years ago a bill prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of certain jewelry misbranded, and with certain words upon it. And I do not know of a case where the courts have held that Congress has not this plenary power over commerce and the instrumentalities of commerce. It has been held over and over again that the States can not under the present Constitution hamper or in any way regulate commerce which is interstate.

Now, if that is the law, and I take it that it is, as a case in point I will refer to Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (96 U. S., p. 1):

The powers conferred upon Congress to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and to establish post offices and post roads, are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce, or of the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances.

That quotation is from the syllabus, and in the opinion itself the court say:

The powers thus granted are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce, or of the postal service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country, and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances. They extend from the horse with its rider to the stagecoach, from the sailing vessel to the steamboat, from the coach and the steamboat to the railroad, and from the railroad to the telegraph, as these new agencies are successively brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth. They were intended for the government of the business to which they relate, at all times and under all circumstances.

No one can doubt that the Congress controls the telegraphs, the telephones, and railroads of this country, if those telegraphs, telephones, and railroads are interstate and do an interstate business. This section 2 of the bill prohibits a telegraph company or one of its agents from transmitting an unlawful proposal on its wires.

We do not declare that the message is commerce. We say what this interstate instrumentality shall do and shall not do, and in this section 2 of the bill we provide that it shall not transmit over its wires this contract which the Congress declares is in the nature of a gambling contract. Therefore, if they want to continue interstate business they are prohibited from sending over their wires this kind of a message.

In One hundred and fifth United States, page 460, you will find it expressly held—

In respect to its foreign and interstate business a telegraph company is, as an instrument of commerce, subject to the regulating power of Congress.

I do not know whether my friend from New York heard that or not. Chief Justice Waite, in writing the opinion, said:

In Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (96 U. S., 1) this court held that the telegraph was an instrument of commerce, and that telegraph companies were subject to the regulating power of Congress in respect to their foreign and interstate commerce.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I called attention to the case in which the court said that if telegraph companies were engaged in interstate commerce that was true, but the plaintiff in error in the case to which I referred was not so engaged.

Mr. WEBB. Section 2 of this bill does regulate the conduct of telegraph companies, and if Congress wanted to, we could provide by law that no interstate telegraph company should send a message on its wires signed by a particular individual.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That might come in conflict with the provision that guarantees equal protection to all persons.

Mr. WEBB. No; the Congress has absolute control over these interstate facilities.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They can not discriminate against individuals in that way.

Mr. WEBB. I say, again, this section 2 simply regulates the conduct of interstate telegraph and telephone companies, and Congress has the power to say to them what they shall transmit and what they shall not transmit. According to my view of it, this has been decided in substance many times by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that Congress has the power to require a telegraph company to furnish a service for nothing? In other words, does he think Congress has the power to require that a telegraph company shall take an affidavit without charging for it?

Mr. WEBB. Well, I have not considered that.

Mr. MANN. Swearing a man without charging for it?

Mr. WEBB. I doubt that. Of course that is not a material question.

Mr. MANN. That is just as important as any other question in this bill.

Mr. WEBB. Not at all. That is incidental to the main feature of this bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WEBB. I do.

Mr. CULLOP. As I understand, it is the gentleman's contention that Congress has the right to pass a law making it a crime for a telegraph company to transmit from State to State any message that it defines to be a crime. Would it not, then, be the proper way to meet this whole question by simply affixing a penalty making it a penal offense for telegraph and telephone companies, and also to make it unlawful to transmit in the mails, either messages or contracts to be made between citizens of different States for future delivery of products grown in one State to be transported to another State?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no. I think a man ought to have the right to buy for future delivery when he actually intends to have the product delivered, and this bill does not interfere with that right.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not mean the future delivery, but to deal in options, in other words.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I would like to have just two minutes more in which to answer this question.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. In answering this question, I think we ought to reserve the right to a man to buy for future delivery and not for the purpose of gambling and speculation. That is the only kind of a transaction that this bill denounces as an offense, and provides that the telegraph lines can not transmit that kind of a speculative, gambling contract.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, if Congress simply passes a law defining that act to be a crime, and penalizing both the sender of the message and the company which carries or transmits it, will not that solve this whole problem?

Mr. WEBB. Well, I think that sections 1 and 2 of the bill do that very thing.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, the case read by the gentleman from New York settled only the one question as to whether a cotton firm doing business and having an office in the State of Alabama, and having its principal office in the city of Mobile and branch offices in New York and New Orleans, was subject to a State tax. The privilege tax levied against men engaged in cotton business of that character was $500 in a city of the size of Mobile, and in smaller cities the privilege tax was less. Now, the courts simply held that because they sent messages in reference to cotton from the city of Mobile to New Orleans and New York that did not cause that concern to cease to be under the control of the laws of the State of Alabama and subject to taxation by the State of Alabama.

Now, this bill does not in any way seek to affect the legality of a contract made under the laws of New York with respect to the rules of the cotton exchange. It is not necessary for the purposes of this discussion to talk to this House about the contract itself, because the courts have held that on their faces these contracts are legal, because under the rules of the exchange a party buying cotton on exchange can demand the spot cotton. But it is an evasion of a statute in the State of New York. It is an evasion of the laws of that State, because it is admitted by all parties that many of these transactions are not transactions in substance. And, in fact, the proof before the Committee on Agriculture shows that when we had a 7,000,000-bale crop of cotton over 56,000,000 bales of so-called cotton were sold on the cotton exchange, and when we have a ten or eleven million bale crop over 100,000,000 bales are sold on the exchange in the city of New York, showing that the greater amount of these transactions, where three or four million bales are sold actually, were transactions where no actual delivery was ever contemplated.

And it will be admitted by every lawyer here that these contracts are contracts which are controlled entirely by the State of New York; but when the cotton exchange assumes the right to use the instrument of interstate commerce, when they use one of the avenues of communication established by the United States Government, it is absurd, to my mind, for anyone to contend on this floor that this Congress has not the right to regulate what shall be transmitted through and by that means. If the Congress has the right to establish means of communication, it has the absolute right to control it and determine what shall go through the mail, and that was decided in the Lottery case which has been referred to so often during this debate.

It is equally true that one can not establish interstate communication and put himself within the jurisdiction of Congress, that Congress has the right to regulate that means of interstate communication because States have no right to do so, and the right to regulate it is absolutely in Congress. And because a man does business in a State which has its location within the boundaries of the State, doing business under a State charter and under control of the laws of that State, because he seeks to use the means of interstate communication, does not mean that Congress can not regulate the manner in which he shall use the means of interstate communication. That is all there is in the case referred to by the gentleman from New York.

This bill does not interfere with the legitimate contract. I could get on the train, go to the city of New York, and there buy or sell cotton futures, and I would violate no law if this bill should become a law. But the very moment I buy cotton futures by telegram, or the very moment I use means of interstate communication, I then become guilty of a violation of this act—then and then only.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose I went to the telegraph office and telegraphed to a broker in New Orleans to buy me a thousand bales of cotton, to make that contract, and did not say anything else in the telegram about where it was or when it was to be delivered. Would that be a legal contract?

Mr. SISSON. I do not see how the gentleman could buy cotton if he did not tell how or when it was to be delivered.

Mr. MADDEN. I was supposing that case.

Mr. SISSON. If you buy cotton to be delivered on a certain day, specifying the time and the character of the cotton, you might get your order filled, but you could not buy a thousand bales of cotton without specifying when.

Mr. MADDEN. Why not?

Mr. SISSON. You would have to state what month you wanted the cotton bought, or else the broker would not handle it.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose I simply asked him to buy me a thousand bales.

Mr. SISSON. He would not buy it at all unless you told him what month, because the price would vary in accordance with the various months. He might go down and buy spot cotton.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what my telegram would mean, I suppose.

Mr. SISSON. Well, that would not violate this statute.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose I refused to take the cotton?

Mr. SISSON. If you contemplated and intended at the time to take the cotton, if you bought the cotton in good faith, if you were worth it, the broker could compel you to take it.

Mr. MADDEN. Or pay the difference in the price.

Mr. SISSON. The broker could tender you the cotton, and if you did not take it he could dispose of it and sue you for the difference.

Mr. MADDEN. In the arrangement of the brokers their contract contemplates the purchase of the cotton.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, I am not talking about the rules of the exchange. They provide that there shall be a margin, and then they turn it over to the exchange, and when a loss occurs they turn the margin over to the party entitled to it under the rules of the exchange.

Mr. MADDEN. But suppose the gentleman and I were both brokers; that I was a broker for the man that wanted to buy and the gentleman was a broker for the man that wanted to sell. Would a contract between us brokers have any legal force?

Mr. SISSON. It would.

Mr. MADDEN. Would it not be considered interstate commerce?

Mr. SISSON. A contract, if sent from the District of Columbia to a broker in New York, and the New York broker accepts the contract, it becomes a New York contract. But the means established to make the contract would be interstate means of communication over which Congress would have control. That is the point involved in this bill, and that is all that is involved in the bill.

Mr. MADDEN. So persons in one State could not buy commodities from persons in another State at all under the construction the gentleman puts on it?

Mr. SISSON. Not at all; you could always buy commodities, but you could not gamble in them; you could not go and buy or sell something that did not exist.

The gentleman is not as familiar with the cotton business as he is with the grain business, and I am less familiar with the grain business than with the cotton business. I do know something about the cotton business, because I am engaged entirely in that. Under the rules of the New York Cotton Exchange if you buy a thousand bales of cotton from me on exchange basis middling, for November delivery, and 10 days before the date of delivery you notify me, under the rules of the exchange, that you want the spot cotton, I tell you that I am going to deliver you the meanest grade of cotton, and you say, "Mr. SISSON, I bought basis middling; I bought cotton that was merchantable; I endeavored to buy cotton that I could use in my factory." I reply that I do not care anything about that, and you go and consult your lawyer. He will tell you that under the rules of the exchange I have the right to deliver you the meanest grade of cotton; cotton you can not handle. What is the result? You are compelled to settle in margins with me or I will unload on you a lot of cotton that you do not want.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there not a standard fixed?

Mr. SISSON. There is a standard fixed, basis middling, and there is an arbitrary rule that where you deliver a man cotton below middling you have the right to deliver him the cotton at so many points off, and if it is above middling cotton it is so many points on; but the man who has bought the cotton has nothing on earth to say as to what shall be delivered to him. You can buy shoes and demand that they be delivered to you, and so in every business of that kind. You can buy clothing of a certain character and demand that clothing, but when you buy cotton, under the rules of the New York and New Orleans exchanges, the man who sells the cotton can determine for you what you shall take, and that is the wicked means of manipulation in the stock market.

Mr. MADDEN. Is there not any standard of inspection?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. If you go to deliver spots there is a standard for grading the cotton.

Mr. MADDEN. How many grades of cotton are there?

Mr. SISSON. Twenty-eight.

Mr. BURLESON. There are 9 standard grades and in all about 28 grades.

Mr. MADDEN. Can not a man buy any grade of cotton that he desires?

Mr. SISSON. He can buy any grade of cotton he desires; but under the rules of the New York Exchange the man who sells has the right to deliver either one of the 28 grades, or he can deliver him a portion of the cotton which would fall under all of the grades. For example, if there are 28 grades, he could deliver one twenty-eighth of one grade and one twenty-eighth of another grade, and so on until the whole contract is filled.

Mr. MADDEN. I assumed that when a man undertook to purchase cotton of a certain grade he could do it and have it delivered to him.

Mr. SISSON. And the gentleman did that because the grain exchanges in Chicago made that provision; but the cotton exchanges of New York, Liverpool, and New Orleans do not do that, and that is why it is that every factory engaged in manufacturing cotton and every man who produces cotton wants Congress to relieve them from this iniquitous situation where cotton can be put up or down at the will of the cotton manipulator.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I do not blame them if that is the case.

Mr. SISSON. That is the case, and if I had the time I would show you how it is that it is utterly within their power to put cotton up or down, 15 or 20 or 30 or 40 points at any time they desire to do it, and there is no power on earth to prevent them from doing it if they agree among themselves.

Mr. MADDEN. I supposed the different grades of cotton were sold at different prices.

Mr. SISSON. There is an arbitrary rule that provides that all cotton shall be sold on basis middling.

Mr. MADDEN. What does that mean?

Mr. SISSON. That is a certain grade of cotton, and from that one grade they fix a price arbitrarily on all grades above or below it. For example, we will take the first grade. I do not know whether that is in accordance with the rule exactly, but we will take 100 bales of cotton at basis middling, and 50 bales of that is below middling. The whole middling cotton will be arbitrarily fixed in that contract at a certain price, but I could only demand of you under that arbitrary rule the amount that the 50 bales were worth less than what middling cotton was worth. In other words, there is an arbitrary rule that fixes the number of points on or off.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, the measure now under consideration meets with my approval. There can be only one valid objection to it, and that is that it does not go far enough. Its provisions should be so extended and enlarged as to include grain and all agricultural products. I shall take but a few moments of the time of the House on the discussion of this question, but in that time I want to refer briefly to the history of this kind of legislation in this body.

Since the opening of this Congress there have been introduced some 25 or 30 bills the purpose of each of which is to prevent dealing in futures in farm products. Of these bills, 4 or 5 seek to prevent dealing in cotton alone, while the rest of them, 20 or 25, are broader in their scope and include, besides cotton, grain and other farm products. The very fact that four-fifths of the bills introduced upon this subject relate to all farm products is sufficient evidence, to my mind, to prove conclusively that a very large majority of the Members of this body, who favor this sort of legislation, desire to extend the provisions of such legislation in the broadest possible way so as to prevent gambling in all farm products.

The Committee on Agriculture, to which all of these bills were referred for consideration, appointed a subcommittee to examine carefully into the matter and to consider the best means of securing the desired legislation. The subcommittee made a very careful investigation. It held extensive hearings; representatives of the exchanges from all parts of the country appeared before the committee, as well as others representing the agricultural interests. At the conclusion of its deliberations it reported back to the full committee two bills, one of which is the cotton bill before you to-day, and the other is the grain bill, covering the products—wheat, corn, and oats. On the same day, and practically at the same time, both of these bills were reported favorably by the Committee on Agriculture. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] was instructed to make a report on the cotton bill, while I was directed to report the grain bill. These two companion bills have been on the calendar of the House now for over two months.

I regret exceedingly that the Committee on Rules, when it brought in to-day the rule to permit us to vote on the cotton bill, did not at the same time report a rule permitting us to vote on the grain bill. These bills should both be considered and passed. It is a mistake to take up one and not the other, and I hope that before this bill is disposed of it will be amended by inserting grain and other agricultural products. If this is done, we will then have an opportunity to vote in accordance with the platform to which my friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] has referred this afternoon.

For the information of the House, and especially the Democratic Members of it, I will read the following extract taken from the platform adopted at Baltimore:

> We believe in encouraging the development of a modern system of agriculture and a systematic effort to improve the conditions of trade in farm products so as to benefit both the consumers and producers. And as an efficient means to this end we favor the enactment by Congress of legislation that will suppress the pernicious practice of gambling in agricultural products by organized exchanges or others.

This is the first opportunity we have had to put into force the provisions of this particular plank of our platform. The whole country demands that we extend the provisions of this measure to include all agricultural products. When we come to consider this bill under the five-minute rule, it is my intention to offer an amendment providing that this legislation shall apply not only to cotton, but also to grain and all farm products. When that is done, I hope that no Member, especially on the Democratic side of the House, will attempt to defeat my amendment by interposing a point of order against it. I doubt very much whether a point of order would be sustained against the introduction of this sort of an amendment; at the same time, I sincerely hope that no Member of the House will seek in this technical manner to prevent this legislation.

The purpose of these two measures—the cotton bill and the grain bill—is to prevent as far as possible what is popularly known as gambling in futures so far as the transactions relate to these commodities. To that end it is made unlawful to use telegraph or telephone lines, cable, or the mails for the transmission of messages and communications purporting to contract for the purchase or sale of these products for future delivery when the actual transfer of the products is not intended by either party. There is nothing in either of these bills that will prevent or hinder the legitimate buying and selling of cotton, grain, or any other product, nothing that will prevent the buying and selling for future delivery, and nothing that will prevent the farmer from contracting or actually selling his product even before it is matured and harvested. These bills do not seek in any way to prohibit or interfere with legitimate transactions in the buying or selling of farm products. They do seek, however, to compel dealing in the actual commodity itself.

By the passage of these measures Congress will prohibit the selling by any person of a commodity which he does not possess, has not contracted to acquire, does not expect to possess, and therefore never intends to deliver. It will prevent the purchase by any person of a commodity which he never expects to receive. It is not believed that the enactment of this legislation will interfere with legitimate transactions on the exchanges. All these bills seek to do is to confine buying and selling to the actual commodity bought and sold, to prevent illegitimate speculation, and the creation of fictitious values, to guard the innocent public against the sharp practices of the trained speculator, and to prevent the violent fluctuations in the prices of the necessities of life by eliminating the purely gambling transactions in them.

For many, many years legislation of this character has been before the Congress of the United States. It has been opposed by the exchanges and the moneyed interests of the country; it has been advocated by the toiling millions who by the sweat of honest labor have produced the very products in which these exchanges seek to traffic. We are told that the exchange is but a great market place, where the buyer and the seller meet. I have visited a great many market places, but I have yet the first one to see wherein there was not an actual transfer of the commodities bought and sold. If the exchanges will conform to this rule and see to it that the cotton and grain bought and sold is received and delivered, then the legislation here sought to be enacted will not affect them.

The farmers of this country want a stable market for their product, one based upon the great law of supply and demand. They are unalterably opposed to the fruits of their honest toil being made the basis of exchange manipulations whereby prices are raised and lowered at will to suit the whims of the speculator and satiate his greed for gain.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let me again express the hope that the pending measure may be amended so as to include grain and all farm products, and in that form passed by this House.

Do this and you will at once redeem to the fullest extent the pledge so recently made at Baltimore, and at the same time forever put an end to the pernicious practice of gambling in the necessaries of life—the foodstuff and the clothing of the people of this great Nation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I taken?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 17 minutes remaining.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 10 minutes of that time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the remarks of my friend from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD]. I am not able to go quite as far as he or to put quite the same construction and give the same effect that he did to the decisions which he read. If it be conceded that the simple making of a contract for the purchase of a bale of cotton is not interstate commerce, nevertheless the shipment of that bale of cotton from one State to another would be interstate commerce, and the sending of a telegraph message, whether upon that subject or any other, from a point in one State to a point in another is interstate commerce. I had the honor to try the case in which that point was first decided in the Supreme Court of the United States in the first opinion ever written and handed down in that court by the late Chief Justice Fuller. I do not know that it has ever been decided that the mere talking across a State line through a telephone is interstate commerce. That point will have to be decided if this bill shall become a law. But while it may be conceded that Congress has the right and the power to regulate the sending of messages by telegraph or mail, and possibly by telephone, there are nevertheless some objections to this bill in its present form to which I wish to call attention. Here is a bill which creates a number of new statutory offenses.

It bristles with fines and imprisonments, and yet is so drawn as to be, to my mind, in many particulars vague and dangerous and possibly to do more harm to legitimate commerce than it would do good in the direction in which it is intended. On the very first page it is declared that certain words shall mean certain things, "unless the same be inconsistent with the context," which gives at once rise for great differences of opinion and construction in many particulars. That it shall mean certain things, "unless inconsistent with the context." That opens the door for doubt and difficulty. I notice again that while Congress has undoubtedly authority in the District of Columbia, this does not refer to or attempt to prohibit the making of such contracts in the District of Columbia or the sending of messages or the delivery of messages within the District of Columbia, not coming from or going to any other State or Territory. Under this bill as now drawn a cotton exchange, with all its alleged gambling features could be conducted right here in this city.

Then, again, on the second page, line 15, it is declared:

Words importing the singular number may be applied to or mean several persons or things.

If you do not put the right construction on them, you may go to the penitentiary for "several things." Now, cotton is a word importing a singular number, yet under the provisions of this act it may mean several things. I do not know whether it would mean corn or wheat or other things, but it may mean several persons or things.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. "Cotton" is singular, and "cotton" in the trade is a well-known term in the trade.

Mr. OLMSTED. It may be manufactured articles commonly known as "cotton" or "cottons."

Mr. ROBINSON. The gentleman does not assume that the word "cotton" could be construed to embrace corn and wheat?

Mr. OLMSTED. I do not know how it may be construed as used in this bill. It says it may be construed to mean "several things."

Mr. ROBINSON. The plural of cotton could not be anything but cotton.

Mr. OLMSTED. This says:

Words importing the singular number may be applied to or mean several persons or things.

Now, what things that means I do not know.

In the second section it makes it unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message. "Messages" applies to messages within a Territory or within a State, as well as to messages from one State or Territory to another. And Congress has no power over messages sent from one point in a State to another point in the same State. It then says:

The transmission of any message relating to any such transaction is hereby declared to be an interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations.

And further:

And the sending or causing to be sent of each such message shall constitute a separate offense.

Strictly interpreted, that section would refer to messages over which Congress has no power or control.

In the third section it is provided that—

Any person sending any message relating to a contract or to the making of a contract for future delivery of cotton to furnish to the person transmitting such message an affidavit—

Setting forth a whole lot of things about his intentions, and where he got it, and what he is going to do with it.

This bill applies to telephone companies. A message is not ordinarily delivered to a telephone company except as it is delivered by the voice into the receiver and transmitted by the voice of the sender over the wire. A telephone operator can not regulate and is not supposed to hear what is talked into the telephone in the telephone booth, and yet the operator and the company is liable to fine and imprisonment under this act unless they require an affidavit. The result would be that the telephone company would have, in order to live strictly up to the terms of this act, to require an affidavit from every person using the telephone for long-distance messages from one State into another.

Any person electing to do so may file with the telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, or cable company an affidavit—

Which shall last for six months the next ensuing.

So that I suppose the telephone company could make itself safe by requiring an affidavit every six months from every person using a telephone.

And here is in line 21, on page 4, the glaring error, typographical perhaps, although it is in here, which was referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which makes a person subject to fine and imprisonment if he shall prove or fail to make an affidavit. In either event he is caught. Like the old hunter's trap, it catches them coming or going.

Now, in section 6, it provides:

That every book, newspaper, pamphlet, letter, writing, or other publication containing matter tending to induce or promote the making of such contracts.

I suppose the report of the Agricultural Department showing a bumper crop or a small crop of cotton might be construed into a publication issued to induce a person to buy or sell cotton.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. I have not heard the discussion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Has he already discussed section 7?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have not yet reached that.

Mr. COOPER. As I read it—and I would like to have the gentleman's interpretation—that gives the Postmaster General unlimited discretion to stop the mail.

Mr. OLMSTED. It certainly does. It gives him discretion to stop your mail or mine or any other mail.

Mr. COOPER. And at the top of page 7 it says:

And all such mail, when returned to said postmaster, shall be returned to the sender or publisher thereof under such regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe.

Suppose it is an envelope that is not marked and they suspect it contains unlawful material. How is it going to be returned to the sender unless the letter is opened?

Mr. OLMSTED. It would certainly be opened.

Then here is this provision in section 6: That if any letter, writing, or other publication is sent through the mails, or—

If any person shall knowingly take or cause the same to be taken from the mails for the purpose of circulating or disposing thereof, or aiding in the circulation and disposition thereof, the person mailing or receiving it shall be fined not more than $5,000 nor less than $500, or shall be imprisoned not more than five years nor less than one year, or both.

If he would even take that letter from the mails for the purpose of disposing of it by chucking it in the wastebasket, he would be subject to fine or imprisonment, or both.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to have one minute more.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to call attention to section 1, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin has already called attention, and point out the danger of such a provision in an act of Congress—the danger to all of us, the danger to commerce.

Then in the eighth paragraph there is another provision—

That in any proceeding under this act all persons may be required to testify and to produce books and papers—

Not only relating to this transaction, but to other transactions. It affords a wonderful scope of inquiry into other people's business, even though they may never have bought a pound of cotton.

Mr. Speaker, it is apparent that there are many provisions in this bill that ought to be amended before the bill is enacted into law. I regret that under the special rule just adopted opportunity is not given to make such amendments as ought to be made to the bill in order that it may accomplish the purposes which its friends desire to accomplish without at the same time doing more harm in other directions than good in the direction that its friends intend.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration makes it unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent over the wires by telephone or telegraph or by wireless telegraph, or through the United States mails, or by any other means, any message for the purpose of making or offering to make any contract for the future delivery of cotton without intending at the time in good faith that such cotton shall actually be delivered. It provides a penalty by fine or imprisonment, or both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court. It further provides that the sending or offering to send such message is an interference with the commerce between the States and Territories and foreign nations. It provides rules and regulations for sending messages for the real sale for future delivery of cotton and prescribes appropriate penalties for the violation thereof. The object of the bill is to suppress the pernicious practice, now so common, of making contracts for the future delivery of cotton wherein no cotton is ever intended to be delivered.

The bill as it comes before the House seeks to suppress gambling in cotton only. The pernicious speculation in other farm products is just as harmful to the best interest of the farmer, and its baneful influence is equally corrupting to the public morals and ought to be prohibited by law the same as the practice now tolerated in cotton. I therefore give notice now, Mr. Speaker, that when this bill comes up for consideration under the five-minute rule I will offer an amendment to make the bill broad enough to include all farm products by striking out the word "cotton" wherever it occurs in the bill and inserting in lieu thereof the words "agricultural products." This amendment, if adopted, will give an opportunity to punish all men who engage in speculating in futures which pertain to agricultural products. I can see no reason why Congress should limit the powers of this bill to only one farm product when it is generally known that the same practice is going on in other products of the farm, which is equally sinful and equally harmful and depressing to the best interests of the people and equally demoralizing to the good name and honor of this Republic.

For this reason, Mr. Speaker, I give notice now of my intentions so that the members of the Agricultural Committee and the Members of the House may have ample time to consider the effects of my proposed amendment upon the pending bill. I take it as a matter of course that the author of the bill and the honorable committee which reported the bill with a favorable recommendation were then and still are prompted by a high sense of duty to the American people and a sincere desire to suppress gambling in "futures." If I am correct in my conclusions, then there remains but one thing which I will be required to do in order that my amendment may receive a favorable consideration by this House, and that is whether such gambling is now going on in other products of the farm and whether the contracts relative thereto are being made by means of messages sent through the United States mails and by wire or by wireless. By way of interlude, permit me to say that such practice has been for a long time, and still is now, going on in every State of the Union, and is so common that it does not require proof. The House will, I have no doubt, take judicial notice of such baneful conduct, thereby releasing me from the necessity of making proof; and when you seek to curb and prohibit gambling in one of the agricultural products your fairness and sense of duty to the people whom you represent will, I know, compel you to make this bill broad enough to include all other agricultural products.

Mr. Speaker, I now turn to the consideration of the bill on its merits. I have been giving close attention to the speeches of gentlemen who oppose the bill, but I am much gratified to see no one opposing it because of its merits. I presume that there will be no opposition to it on this ground. But there are some gentlemen who have served in this body for many years and by reason of their long service have become great constitutional lawyers. They are perfectly familiar with all the powers of that sacred instrument and never fail to defend it whenever it is assailed by bills for the enactment of laws not authorized by the Constitution. These gentlemen are here to-day and are urging with much force the unconstitutionality of this bill. I have been listening with much interest to the speeches of two of these gentlemen, the distinguished gentleman [Mr. FITZGERALD] of New York and the distinguished gentleman [Mr. OLMSTED] of Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I did not say that it was unconstitutional.

Mr. ROBINSON. He did not say that.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not understand the gentleman to use the word "unconstitutional," but I gathered from the body of his argument that he considered the bill subject to such criticism.

The authority under which this bill is drawn relates to section 8 of Article I of the Constitution, which confers on Congress the power "To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." The friends of this bill contend that ample authority is given in this clause of the Constitution for the enactment of this measure. The power to "regulate" commerce with foreign nations and to regulate it among the several States ought to be strong and powerful enough to keep commerce clean and to prohibit demoralizing practices connected therewith. If unwholesome articles of food are offered for transportation from one State to another or to a foreign nation, Congress, under this clause, ought to have the power to pass laws for regulating such practice because of its effect upon the health and life of the people. Upon the same reasoning, if the stream of interstate commerce is polluted by immoral conduct, Congress ought to have the power and does in my opinion have the power to "regulate" such commerce to the extent of prohibiting such immoral conduct in the interest of public morals. The word "regulate" as used in the Constitution concerning interstate commerce does not mean power for partial regulation but it means power for a complete regulation, carrying with it the power to regulate the moral and wholesome effect upon the public as well as the power to regulate the physical transportation of commodities. To give any other construction would seriously cripple the power of Congress over such commerce and leave the citizen to the mercy of spoliation and intrigue.

Were California in the throes of bubonic plague, and were the germs thereof transmitted by means of fleas carried by ground squirrels infesting the State in large numbers, and to get rid of the squirrels suppose that she proposed to ship them out over the various States of the Union and turn them loose instead of killing them, who would doubt the power of Congress to prohibit the same? Or who will contend that Congress could not prohibit Chicago from shipping diseased pork, infested by the deadly trichina, to other States or to other nations, under this clause to "regulate" commerce among the States and with other nations?

The Constitution is an instrument of enumeration of powers and not an instrument of definition of powers. The means of commerce are rapidly changing, and therefore no narrow construction of the term "regulate" would be either expedient or justifiable. At the time when the Constitution was written the commerce was carried on largely between the States by wagons drawn by animal power, or on water by means of flatboats or sailboats, but now we have outgrown these slow methods. Commerce is commerce, regardless of the means by which it is carried on, and the constitutional power to regulate it will always remain the same, whether it be conducted on land by animal power, or propelled on rail by steam and electric power, or whether by water in flatboats and sailboats or by steamships, or whether through the clouds by means of airships, or by some unknown method. The power, therefore, to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations is a living, vitalizing, progressive power, ready to be applied to the unknown means which may become necessary and expedient for the good of mankind as well as to the known means of to-day.

To regulate that which affects public morals is the highest duty of the State, because the State can rise no higher in the scale of national life than the sum total of its public morals. I therefore turn my attention to the consideration of some of the things which Congress has done for the good of our public morals under this clause of the Constitution. On the 2d day of May, 1895, Congress passed an act entitled "An act for the suppression of lottery traffic through national and interstate commerce and the postal service, subject to the jurisdiction and laws of the United States." The violation of this act was made criminal and punished by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court, for the first offense, and by imprisonment alone for any subsequent offense. In February, 1899, in Dallas County, Tex., C. F. Champion, W. F. Champion, and Charles B. Park were indicted for a conspiracy to violate this act. One of the defendants, Champion, was arrested in Chicago and sued out a writ of habeas corpus, upon the theory that this act was unconstitutional. It is known as the Lottery case, and is found in One hundred and eighty-eighth United States, page 321. Justice Harlan delivered the opinion of the court. It involved directly the power of Congress, under the clause of the Constitution, to "regulate" commerce among the States and with foreign nations, to prohibit the commerce itself, instead of regulaing it and permitting it o continue. In his opinion upholding this statute, Justice Harlan said:

We have said that the carrying from State to State of lottery tickets constitutes interstate commerce, and that the regulation of such commerce is within the power of Congress under the Constitution. Are we prepared to say that a provision which is in effect a prohibition of the carriage of such article from State to State is not a fit or appropriate mode for the regulation of that particular kind of commerce? If lottery traffic carried on through interstate commerce is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its powers may be exerted, can it be possible that it must tolerate the traffic and simply regulate the manner in which it may be carried on? Or may not Congress, for the protection of the people of all the States, and under the power to regulate interstate commerce, devise such means within the scope of the Constition and not prohibited by it as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the States? If a State in considering legislation for the suppression of lotteries within its own limits may properly take into view the evils that inhere in the raising of money in that mode, why may not Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, provide that such commerce shall not be polluted by the carrying of lottery tickets from one State to another? What provision in that instrument can be regarded as limiting the exercise of the power granted? What clause can be cited which in any degree countenances the suggestion that one may of right carry or cause to be carried from one State to another that which will harm the public morals?

The object of this statute was not intended to regulate the sale of lottery tickets, but it was intended to prohibit the sale entirely. It drove out of the United States every lottery then in existence and has resulted in the absolute prohibition of the traffic. The wisdom of the law rests on the sound discretion of the State to protect its citizens against immoral conduct which penetrates every quarter of the country. No one would doubt the power of Congress under this clause to prohibit the transportation from one State to another of poisonous reptiles, such as rattlesnakes, and vicious wild beasts, such as tigers, and turning them loose in large quantities to pray upon the lives and property of the people. And yet the danger to life and property from such traffic is not to be compared with the danger to public morals which results from the traffic in such debasing and demoralizing business as lotteries and gambling in "futures."

In the case of Phalen v. Virginia (8 How., 163, 168) the Supreme Court, after declaring that among the most important duties of Government was that of suppression of nuisances which are injurious to public health and public morals, said: "Experience has shown that the common forms of gambling are comparatively innocuous when placed in contrast with the widespread pestilence of lotteries. The former are confined to a few persons, but the latter infests the whole community; it enters every dwelling; it reaches every class; it preys upon the hard earnings of the poor; it plunders the ignorant and the simple." The ravages of the old-time lottery upon the purse of the individual and upon the morals of the public as compared with the enormous ravages which are going on to-day on the exchanges and boards of trade in every State of the Union are in size what the child is to the parent or the penny is to the eagle. If the lottery was so immoral that it became necessary to prohibit it in order to protect the public morals, then all the more is it necessary to prohibit gambling in futures for the same reasons.

Congress has by law excluded intoxicating liquor from commerce with the Indian tribes, and has excluded obscene literature from foreign commerce. We have seen that Congress has prohibited lottery tickets from being sent from one State to another. All of this has been done under the power of the Constitution giving Congress the right to regulate interstate commerce. In each of these three instances the power to regulate interstate commerce has been construed to mean a right to prohibit such commerce in these three articles entirely. This is done under the sovereign police power of the Republic over interstate trade in order to protect the public from the dreadful and demoralizing influences of the dangerous and immoral traffic in interstate commerce.

If Congress can prohibit the interstate traffic in lottery tickets, why has it not the power to prohibit interstate messages by wire or otherwise for the sale of cotton which is not intended to be delivered, but which is primarily intended to be gambling? If Congress can prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors with the Indian tribes, because when under its influence the Indian is more dangerous and more bloodthirsty, why can it not prohibit the making or offering to make contracts by wire or otherwise for the future delivery of cotton or any other article of commerce, whereas, in fact, no delivery is contemplated, but the only thing sought is gambling in futures? If Congress can prohibit interstate commerce in obscene literature because of its immoral effect upon the public, why can it not prohibit gambling on stock exchanges for the same reason? If the police power of the Republic over interstate trade rests in Congress alone, and if it fails or refuses to prohibit such immoral traffic, when and how will the people get relief? The power does not belong to the several States, but rests now in the hands of Congress, for it was lodged there on the adoption of the Constitution, and has so been construed by the Supreme Court of the United States repeatedly in construing statutes of various States which were broad enough to deal with interstate commerce.

Are interstate messages by wire or interstate wireless messages such traffic as fall under the meaning of interstate commerce? If so, then Congress has a right to regulate them, or it has the right to prohibit them entirely if the good of the public demands it. Let us examine a few decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the question and see whether such messages are interstate commerce. In the case of Pensacola v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (96 U. S., 9) it was held that telegraphic communications from one State to another by companies organized for that purpose is interstate commerce and falls within the legislative jurisdiction of Congress. In the case of Telegraph Co. v. Texas (105 U. S., 460) this decision was reviewed by Chief Justice White and reaffirmed. In the opinion he used these words:

> Telegraph companies occupy the same relation to commerce as a carrier of messages as a railroad company does as a carrier of goods.

In the case of Leloup v. Mobile (127 U. S., p. 640) it was held that a telegraph company with lines extending from one State to another, and whose business was to transmit interstate messages, could not be compelled to pay a license tax sought to be collected by a State, on the ground that the business of the company was interstate commerce and, therefore, without the jurisdiction of the State. These cases put at rest the question as to whether such messages are interstate commerce. Congress has the undoubted right to regulate such traffic, and in the light of the lottery case Congress has the plenary power to prohibit such traffic whenever it sinks to such a low level as to become highly obnoxious to the public morals. If the electric wires or wireless messages should become the instruments through which gambling contracts are entered into on stock exchanges and boards of trade, by means of which interstate commerce in any article of trade is tainted with the foul stench of bribery and gambling, Congress has not only the legislative power to regulate such traffic by prohibiting it entirely, but, as the keeper of the police power of interstate trade, it owes a duty to the people of this country which it will never discharge until it exercises that power by enacting a drastic law prohibiting such traffic entirely. The power to regulate commerce carries with it the power to keep commerce clean and free from corrupting and demoralizing influences.

The Olympic games were instituted among the Greeks for the purpose of developing the physical manhood of the youth in order that he might be the better prepared to defend his country against invasions by the foreign enemy. One of these games was called the Marathon run. It was the extreme test of physical endurance. It is said that the youth who carried the glad tidings of the victory of the Battle of Marathon died with the immortal message on his lips. That was a battle between the well-trained Athenians and the Persian hosts, who outnumbered the Athenians more than 10 to 1; but Athens was fighting for existence as a people and as a nation, while the Persians were fighting for spoils and for revenge. Athens won. Our greatest enemy is not without, threatening to invade our shores, but it is camped within, with well-trained soldiers in every city, hamlet, and town, organized for the purpose of spoils only, and employing means the most demoralizing and destructive to the best interests of our Republic. It is within our power to disarm this mighty enemy by passing this law with my proposed amendment. Will we do our duty now, while the task is easy, or will we wait until the enemy has grown so strong that it will require skillful training in Olympics? Will we wait until it requires the Marathon run in order to have even a chance of winning? Perish the thought that any are here who are recreant to trust and to duty. Let us hope that the most ultra to the passage of this measure will be for it in the final analysis.

Mr. Speaker, the pernicious practice in America of gambling in farm products ought to be stopped. It has brought about more destruction and more financial ruin to helpless individuals than anything I know of which has been tolerated interstate, unless it is the sale and interstate traffic of intoxicating liquors. It is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, species of gambling in the world. While I was a member of the Illilnois State Senate I had an occasion to introduce a bill for the purpose of prohibiting gambling in futures in the farm products in my State. I knew but little about the workings of the board of trade in Chicago, and in order to be more familiar with the business and the methods of conducting the same I quit my office and camped in Chicago for a month and went on the board of trade actively in a small way. I was not there long until I learned one lesson by heart. It almost broke my heart to learn it, for it cost me some good hard-earned cash. Here is the lesson: After you have put up your money and lost several times and won but a few times you get over the scare and dread and become seized with an insatiable desire to win back the money which you have lost, and the more you lose the greater is the desire to remain until you have won at least what you have lost. That becomes your controlling thought and desire. It is worse than your appetite for smoking, or any other bad habit, I am told by those who have been in the business for years. While there I met many men from Indiana and other States, who told a sad story, among which I recall the story told me by an Indiana farmer, who had been on the board for 10 years. He went to Chicago with a lot of fine cattle to compete in the fat-cattle show which is annually held in that city. While there he sold his cattle for a fine price, and the commission merchant told him of the great opportunity to make money on the board of trade. He was flush with money and bit at the bait. He lost and won, but lost more times and in bigger sums than he won. He stayed with the game until he had lost all his cattle money. Then he went home on borrowed money. The next year he took another fine lot of cattle to the fat-cattle show and bucked the game again with like results. He had a good farm, and he was told that if he would sell his farm and move to Chicago and study the game from a scientific standpoint he could win all the money he had lost and much more. He sold his farm and all his personal property, moved to Chicago, remained on the board of trade until he lost all he had, and when I met him he was working by the day on the streets; but still seized with that everlasting desire to win back his lost money, he was dividing his wages with these gamblers who had robbed him of thousands of dollars and reduced him to poverty and want. Many men from the country told me like stories, a bunch of whom were reduced to daily labor, but who were pooling their meager allowances in order to be able to buy a thousand or two bushels of wheat, still hanging on the hopeless thread of good luck and filled with the determination to stay until the tide turned in their favor. You are led on by your commission man, who always holds out to you that all you have to do in order to be a good winner is to stay with the game until you have learned it well. Hordes of men from every State in the Union are kept there the year round by such flattering inducements, and daily haunt the board of trade until they are reduced to poverty and grief, often resulting in suicide. I knew one man who met with a big slump in the market and lost largely; he was seized with a fit of self-destruction, and, on going to the drawer where he kept his razor, he reflected, locked the drawer, and threw the key out of the window.

The Chicago Board of Trade is the greatest Monte Carlo in the world, where more people are held up and annually robbed in open daylight than any other city in the world, without question and without restraint. How long will the patient people tolerate these polluting, stiffling dens of stench? How long will Congress delay relief to public morals? Let us stimulate our moral sensibilities to the point of action by taking a dose of public opinion upon this question. Let us gird ourselves like a strong man to run a race and make one united and determined effort to place upon the statute books before this session of Congress adjourns a law strong enough to break up these dens of sin and hell. [Applause.]

Mr. AINEY. Mr. Speaker, the support and advancement of the great agricultural interests of the country have been one of the announced purposes of the National Government, and in the carrying out of which the Department of Agriculture was established and occasional laws enacted.

Several measures have been proposed at this Congress, some of which have already received the sanction of this House, which, if placed upon the statute books, will violate this established policy and make futile the departmental advice and assistance given to the cane-sugar planter of Louisiana, the sugar-beet raiser of Colorado, and the dairyman of the Nation, and, perforce, seriously cripple, if not destroy, the industries which they represent.

I am unalterably opposed to such a departure from our fundamental position, and my votes as a Member of this House have been and will continue to be cast against such destructive legislation.

I can not but view with anxiety the attacks which the oleomargarine manufacturers and dealers and their allies, the beef interests, are making against the dairy industry of this country, which, if successful, must result in the loss of the dairy cow, with her product of milk, cheese, and butter, now contributing so largely to the healthful food supply of the city and country.

I desire, therefore, to speak particularly concerning the dairy industry of the land, an industry which ultimately affects the entire citizenship of the Nation and which touches with equal force the economic, social, and political realms of our national well-being, and in opposition to those measures which I believe if enacted into law would work national injury.

IMPORTANCE OF DAIRY INDUSTRY.

According to the advance reports from the Bureau of Census (May 6, 1912), there were 1,620,766,000 pounds of butter produced during the census year 1909, valued at $405,000,000. of which 996,000,000 pounds were produced on farms and the balance in cooperative and other factories.

Of these totals, Pennsylvania produced 91,642,000 pounds, valued at $25,282,000, of which 61,158,000 was farm made, while the balance was produced in cooperative and other factories.

According to the census of 1900, the milk produced in the United States was 7,266,392,674 gallons, of which 2,134,915,342 were sold.

For the census year 1909 the cheese production amounted to approximately 320,000,000 pounds, valued at about $44,500,000.

In 1909 there were 21,720,000 milch cows, valued at $702,945,000. These, taken in connection with the vast acreage, buildings, and equipment employed, designate this industry as second to none in importance.

I am pleased to be able to state that the district which I have the honor to represent contributes largely to the Nation's requirements of milk, cheese, and butter. The amount and value of butter and cheese produced during the year 1909 in the four counties constituting the fourteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania are as follows:

Amount and value of butter and cheese produced in the fourteenth congressional district of Pennsylvania in 1909.

County.	Pounds produced.	Value.
Butter:
Bradford	2,334,156	$635,266
Susquehanna	1,020,576	278,449
Wayne	1,078,675	295,401
Wyoming	532,647	140,968
Cheese:
Bradford	86,075	11,544
Susquehanna	42,759	5,172
Wayne	2,321	163
Wyoming	650	81

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

Any competition, no matter how honest or otherwise legitimate, calculated to depopulate the farms or drive the farmer into other lines of activity, would result in great national loss. When, therefore, this Congress is asked to pass measures subjecting butter, the most important dairy product of the farm, to unequal and unfair competition at the hands of a so-called cheaper substitute, and to confer upon that substitute by law the right to clothe itself in the well-known garb and habiliments of butter, I propose to object and to proclaim it a departure from the Government's avowed policy of helpfulness to agriculture, and violative of the first principles of common honesty, and fraught with danger.

When it is proposed to permit the manufacturer of oleomargarine not only to color his product in imitation of butter, but to mix with it a sufficient quantity of genuine butter to impart the real butter taste and appearance, all barriers are destroyed. Man's elemental senses, given him for the purpose of protection and discrimination, are of no avail against such deceit, for neither sight, smell, nor taste will distinguish the real from the spurious.

Inherently and by long-established custom the most obvious distinguishing characteristic of butter is its color. It is, so to speak, its trade-mark and designation; prescriptively it is entitled by all equitable considerations to maintain this right against all comers.

The natural color of oleomargarine, so far as an artificial product may be said to have a natural color, is white—not absolutely pure white, but relatively, as the eye passes judgment. So said Mr. John F. Jelke, a prominent oleomargarine manufacturer (Hearings, 1911, p. 88).

Here is a clearly defined basis for distinction which both custom and nature has established and which readily aids the purchaser in his selection, whereby fair competition is assured to producers, and which affords the broadest margin of protection to the consumer.

It is demanded that this clearly defined boundary line be obliterated by law and a merely prohibited fiat be substituted making it an offense to ship and sell oleomargarine other than in marked, sealed, and designated packages.

In surveying, a natural and permanent object on the ground is accepted as establishing a better basis for a boundary line than an imaginary line designated and supported by course and distance. Yellow is the natural visible boundary mark of butter; to obliterate this line by law and substitute a mere legislative prohibition is as unsafe as it would prove unsatisfactory and unwise.

It is generally admitted that oleomargarine has been a most successful and persistent violator of existing laws, 90 per cent of its sales being illegal, as disclosed at the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture. It paid into Pennsylvania nearly $500,000 in fines before it learned respect for that State's law. It is now urged that by removing the 10-cent tax on colored oleomargarine the incentive to fraudulently avoid the tax would be gone and violations would cease. It is hard to conceive that these same violators would take higher ethical grounds when the opportunity and incentive for gain still remained to fraudulently sell colored oleomargarine for butter. Will it be argued that the man who would defraud the Government in order to gain 10 cents would not defraud the consumer in order to reap the same profit?

OLEOMARGARINE DEFINED.

Oleomargarine is a term legislatively adopted to designate heterogeneous mixtures of varying constituents, and with no standard as to quality, composition, purity, or method in manufacture. Included in this definition is "oleomargarine as heretofore known," and all mixtures with itself, including the whole scale of fats from "lard" to intestinal fat and offal fat."

In actual manufacture, as in the legislative definition, there is this same range. This definition of oleomargarine as enacted in the Grout bill is substantially followed in other and proposed measures, and is as follows:

That for the purposes of this act certain manufactured substances, certain extracts, and certain mixtures and compounds, including such mixtures and compounds with butter, shall be known and designated as "oleomargarine," namely: All substances heretofore known as oleomargarine, oleo, oleomargarine oil, butterine, lardine, suine, and neutral; all mixtures and compounds of oleomargarine, oleo, oleomargarine oil, butterine, lardine, suine, and neutral; all lard extracts and tallow extracts; and all mixtures and compounds of tallow, beef fat, suet, lard, lard oil, vegetable oil, annotto, and other coloring matter, intestinal fat, and offal fat made in imitation or semblance of butter, or when so made calculated or intended to be sold as butter or for butter.

In the hearings of 1912 (p. 146) appears a colloquy with Mr. Jelke:

Mr. HAWLEY. I would like to ask Mr. J. F. Jelke, of Cincinnati, Ohio. You heard the gentleman quote the formula for making oleomargarine yesterday, I think it was. Do you agree with the formula he quoted there?

Mr. JELKE. I didn't hear him read them, but there is no man can really fix the formula. There are thirty-odd different patents in the Patent Office and 42 different manufacturers in this country, each making it in a different way.

Mr. HAWLEY. Are those fairly typical?

Mr. JELKE. I didn't hear them. I say there isn't another factory making oleomargarine the way we do in our factory, and I am not going to tell you how we do it.

Mr. George L. McKay, secretary American Association of Creamery Manufacturers, representing 400,000 farmers, in his testimony before the committee (p. 81), quoted from the book "Modern Packing House," edited by the late F. W. Wilder, formerly general superintendent of Swift & Co. and Schwartzchild & Sulzberger Co., published in 1905, as to some of the element going to make up different grades of oleo oil:

COMPOSITION OF OLEO OILS.

Neutral, or No. 1, oleo oil is made from the following:

Gaul fat, ruffle fat, gaul piece of gut end, briskets trimmed from the bed pickings, crotch trimming from the bed pickings, paunch trimmings, pluck trimmings, reed trimmings, heart casing fats.

No. 2, or second-grade oils:

Gut ends—small fat, chipped fat, which is taken off the middle guts; machine fat, which is taken off round gut by the fatting machines; heart trimmings, pluck trimmings, miscellaneous bed pickings of the second grade, kidney fat, clean trimmings from cattle, which are being cut up for canning or sausage, skimmings from scrap vat of No. 1 oil.

No. 3, or third-grade oil:

Head fat, fat trimmed from cattle heads when checking, plucked sweetbread trimming, liver trimmings, bladder trimmings, fat from chilled beef tongues when they are trimmed, miscellaneous fats from other departments which are kept clean, the first washings from the oleo press cloths before soda has been used, scrap-vat skimmings from the second-grade oil.

These may be technically clean and possibly wholesome, and so may be rats in China, but they offend against the sensibilities of the average American stomach.

The same authority gives us the average formula used by manufacturers, together with costs for three grades of oleomargarine:

Formula for and cost of high-grade oleomargarine.

Material and quantities.	Cost per pound.	Total cost.
526 pounds No. 1 oleo oil	$0.0875	$45.19
475 pounds No. 1 neutral lard	.08125	38.57
50 gallons 30 per cent cream	.42	30.24
300 pounds creamery butter	.28	84.00
Labor and package	.01	15.09
Salt and color	.00	1.00
Total		214.00

This formula will yield 1,500 pounds of oleomargarine; therefore the cost per pound is $0.1426.

Formula for and cost of medium-grade oleomargarine.

Material and quantities.	Cost per pound.	Total cost.
525 pounds No. 1 oleo oil	$0.0875	$45.19
475 pounds No. 1 neutral lard	.08125	30.57
40 gallons 30 per cent cream	.42	40.32
Labor and package	.01	12.00
Salt and color	.00	1.00
Total		137.08

This formula will yield 1,200 pounds of oleomargarine. Therefore the cost is $0.1142 per pound.

Formula for and cost of low-grade oleomargarine.

Material and quantities.	Cost per pound.	Total cost.
350 pounds No. 2 oleo oil	$0.08	$28.00
250 pounds cottonseed oil	.04	10.00
450 pounds neutral lard	.08125	36.54
60 gallons 2½ per cent milk, at 12 cents per gallon		7.20
Labor and package		12.00
Salt and color		1.00
Total		94.74

This formula will yield 1,200 pounds of oleomargarine. Therefore, the cost of producing and packing for shipment will be $0.0789 per pound.

From the above it will be seen that the extra prime, yellow cottonseed oil, known as butter oil, is not used in the best grades of oleomargarine. This agreed with what Mr. Jelke stated before the Agricultural Committee, that they did not use cotton-seed oil in their best grades of oleomargarine, as it injured the flavor. Consequently, he said the best grades of oleomargarine were white or light in color.

So far as I have been able to ascertain the oleomargarine manufacturers have entered no denial before the Committee on Agriculture as to the substantial accuracy of these statements concerning oleo oils or the use of these oils in the manufacture of oleomargarine.

The chemists certification of good character as to the wholesome and nutritive quality of oleomargarine will hardly be accepted by the public until it is known as to which of the oleomargarines, varying as they do in the nature of their constituents, it applies.

BUTTER SHOULD NOT BE AN INGREDIENT.

Large amounts of butter are bought by certain oleomargarine dealers and mixed with fat products and sold. Dr. Wiley's views on this subject, briefly stated, appear on page 80 of the 1912 hearings of the Committee on Agriculture, as follows:

I would be heartily in favor of refusing the privilege of mixing any kind of a dairy product with oleomargarine. I do not believe it should be churned or mixed with milk, cream, or butter in any way. The only purpose in doing this is to deceive the people in regard to its taste. If oleomargarine were offered to the people as a pure product, without any suspicion of a butter flavor or taste, the difficulty of controlling it would be considerably lessened.

OLEOMARGARINE LAWS.

Nearly every country of Europe and almost all the States of the Union have passed laws regulating its manufacture and sale, and in several of them mixing of butter with oleomargarine is prohibited except in some instances a percentage of butter fat acquired in the churning in milk or cream is allowed.

Germany, Belgium, France, Denmark, Britain, Norway, and Sweden prohibit the mixing with butter. All of the above and several others have laws prohibiting the manufacture or sale of oleomargarine where butter is manufactured or sold.

Denmark, France, Italy, and Russia prohibit the yellow color. Belgium, Denmark, Germany, Portugal, and Sweden require the addition of sesame oil or other designated ingredient to make oleomargarine more readily recognized when offered for sale.

France, the birthplace of oleomargarine, compels the printing of the ingredients and formula on the wrapper.

POOR MAN'S BUTTER.

If the designation of "poor man's butter," which the oleomargarine people have sometimes applied to their product, is to be treated seriously and dignified as a statement of fact or an argument, and if for the moment it be conceded that the poor man is really urging "colored as distinguished from uncolored oleomargarine and freed from the payment of tax" on the ground of his poverty, because it is butter's equal in nutritive and wholesome qualities, it then follows that this so-called poor man is entitled to get what he wants. Why should this wholesome and cheap product, the equal of butter, be permitted to be adulterated or mixed with its more costly but no better competition, whereby the cost to the poor man is materially enhanced. Dr. Wiley's opinion, which I have elsewhere quoted, and the laws of several European nations is the solution as well as answer.

COST OF BUTTER PRODUCTION.

Prof. Oscar Erf, of Ohio, has carefully analyzed the present cost of butter production, and by comparison shows that that cost has doubled in the last 20 years, averaging in 1910, $108.75 per cow, whereas in 1889 it was only $43 per cow. So that notwithstanding the increased costs to consumer—a considerable portion going to middlemen—the profit to the farmer is not such as to make the dairying business attractive nor cause it to increase to meet the increase of population.

In 1909 there were 21,720,000 milch cows and in 1912, 20,699,000, a loss of over a million in three years.

WEAKNESS OF THE GROUT LAW.

The existing law regulating oleomargarine has many excellent features. It went into effect July 1, 1902, but it has been followed by the most persistent violations on the part of oleomargarine manufacturers, dealers, or retailers. It provides a tax of one-fourth of a cent per pound on uncolored and 10 cents per pound on "artificially" colored oleomargarine.

Notwithstanding the large increase in production and sale, the report of the Treasury Department shows a decrease of 75 per cent in the revenue collected and an increase in fraudulent sales of nearly 100 per cent.

The failure of the law is attributable to three principal causes:

First. It attempted to abolish the color line between butter and oleomargarine and substitute a 10-cent tax on colored oleomargarine.

Second. In its enforcement the revenue officers had not the authority which was granted under other revenue acts to visit, at all times, places where oleomargarine was manufactured and sold.

Third. The wording of the provisions in the law exempting oleomargarine from 10-cent tax when "free from artificial coloration."

When the law permitted oleomargarine to be colored in imitation of butter by the payment of a 10-cent tax, it destroyed the color line, the natural and proper distinguishing mark between itself and butter, and it opened the door to fraud both upon the Government and consumer, for it was colored and sold extensively without the payment of the tax and for butter.

The designation in the act of "artificial" coloring matter was unfortunate; it met the existing conditions, but it failed to take into consideration the ingenuity of the oleomargarine people, with the result that they now produce oleomargarine in imitation of butter without the use of artificial coloring matter by the addition of certain beef fats, June butter, or some highly colored oils which have now become among its common ingredients.

It is interesting to note how the Wisconsin statute, which prohibits artificial coloration of oleomargarine, has thus been avoided. (Hearings, p. 71.)

CONGRESSMAN NELSON QUESTIONS MR. JELKE.

Mr. NELSON. Does not your firm sell uncolored oleomargarine in Wisconsin, and is it not sold notwithstanding that prohibition?

Mr. JELKE. We sell oleomargarine there without artificial coloration.

Mr. NELSON. And you actually sell butter-colored oleomargarine in Wisconsin notwithstanding there is prohibition of coloration in imitation of butter?

Mr. JELKE. No; you miss the whole distinction.

Mr. NELSON. I want to see how you do it.

Mr. JELKE. I want to tell you, and the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has made that very distinction. For a market like Wisconsin we make oleomargarine absolutely free from artificial coloration, but of highly colored oils, and the Supreme Court of Wisconsin has said that where the color comes from essential ingredients it is not in the power of the State to prohibit or stop it.

Mr. NELSON. You actually sell uncolored oleomargarine in the States where they prohibit coloration?

Mr. JELKE. When you say "uncolored," it is colored, but it has no artificial coloration. Remember that distinction.

Mr. LEVER. Do not you put any color in it?

Mr. JELKE. No artificial color in it, but the essential oils out of which it is produced have high color, and it still has color.

CONCLUSION.

Butter as a food product established a place in the early dawn of civilization when history spun but a single thread. It has graced the board of king and peasant, of rich and poor, of high and low, through countless ages.

When Jehovah met the Patriarch Abraham near the oaks of Mamre and through the instrumentality of the three messengers brought the words of hope to his aged heart and perpetuity to his race, it was no menial offering with which he supplied his regal visitants, for he gave them meat and bread, and, as sang Deborah, the prophetess in another age, he set before them "butter in a lordly dish."

The American dairyman believes the consumer of butter to be his natural and proper defender. For years he has passed judgment upon the product of the dairy by the use of his faculties—sight, smell, and taste. In all the ages these have been the commonly accepted and satisfactory tests.

It is now proposed to destroy the value of these tests by permitting the distinguishing characteristics of butter which responds to them to be counterfeited by a cheaper and inferior product, leaving not a single differentiating mark between them. To take away the distinctive mark in the product and substitute for that mark a printed mark on the wrapper is neither good legislation nor good judgment.

In the interest of the consumer of oleomargarine the law should be changed, requiring the formula to be printed upon the wrapper. The method of manufacture and composition should be standardized and perhaps graded. The visible yellow color line should be maintained between butter and oleomargarine, and the question should receive serious consideration as to whether butter should be permitted to be mixed with oleomargarine.

If I mistake not, it was Artemus Ward who expressed great liking for hash, because it was a simple food, and then he always knew what he was eating. It may be that there are those who enjoy the simplicity and purity of oleomargarine.

There is a remote possibility that some of the ardent advocates may be consistent enough to eat it as well as speak for it. In any event, I commend them to the discriminating words, which may lead to real knowledge, as recorded in the Book of Isaiah:

Butter and honey shall he eat when he knoweth to refuse the evil and choose the good.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS].

[Mr. SIMS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Alabama please suspend in order that the House may receive a message from the Senate?

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, owing to the lateness of the hour, I can not hope to make any very extended remarks on this bill. The pending measure shall have my support, because I believe it to be in accord with both the wishes and interests of the great agricultural constituency that I have the honor to represent on this floor. I shall support it for the additional reason that the convention of the Democratic Party, the party to which I owe allegiance, in its recent convention adopted a plank in favor of it.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to receive the managers appointed by the House for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment against Robert W. Archbald, circuit judge of the United States and designated as a judge of the United States Commerce Court, agreeably to the notice communicated to the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to make an observation in regard to the message which has just been received from the Senate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman will be recognized for that purpose.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it is now nearly 3 o'clock, and the managers of the House did not anticipate the action of the Senate to-day. I have been over to the Senate this morning to ascertain when probably the Senate would receive a message from the House upon which this order is predicated, but I was unable to get any information as to when the Senate would receive the message. Probably at this time, although I do not know, the Senate has adjourned or is in executive session, and therefore I wish it to be stated in the RECORD that it is the purpose on the part of the managers of the House to take the articles of impeachment against Judge Archbald over to the Senate on Monday.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from Alabama understands that this is merely a formal communication from the Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. I so understand. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the managers on the part of the House, or I as one of the managers, in the endeavor to get early consideration of these articles of impeachment, have had the cooperation of the gentleman from Illinois and am indebted to him for that cooperation.

SALE OF FUTURES IN COTTON.

Mr. Speaker, as I was saying, another reason that will constrain me to support this bill is that the party to which I owe fealty—the Democratic Party—at its recent convention in Baltimore, in which convention I was a delegate at large from the State of Alabama, adopted a plank covering this matter of the gambling in agricultural products.

I want to quote the platform which bears on this subject:

We believe in encouraging the development of the modern system of agriculture and systematic improvement of conditions of trade in farm products so as to benefit both the consumers and the producers, and as an efficient means to this end we favor the enactment by Congress of legislation that will suppress the pernicious practice of gambling in agricultural products by organized exchanges or others.

And again, Mr. Speaker, the bill shall have my support, because the great Committee on Agriculture in this House, composed, I believe, of 20 members—originally it had 21 members, but I believe there are only 20 surviving members—with but two exceptions, agreed upon a report in behalf of this bill. For the information of Members I will read the report:

The Committee on Agriculture, having had under consideration H. R. 56, a bill to prohibit interference with commerce among the States and Territories and with foreign nations, and to remove obstructions thereto, and to prohibit the transmission of certain messages by telegraph, telephone, cable, or other means of communication between States and Territories and foreign nations, submits the following report:

Section 1 of this bill defines the word "message" and the word "person," and provides that words importing the plural number, whenever used, may be applied to or mean only a single person or thing, and words importing the singular number may be applied to or means several persons or things.

Section 2 makes it unlawful for any person to send or cause to be sent any message offering to make or enter into a contract for the purchase or sale of cotton without intending that such cotton shall be actually delivered and received, and provides penalties for violation.

Section 3 makes it the duty of any person sending any message relating to a contract for the future delivery of cotton to furnish to the person transmitting such message an affidavit to the effect that the message does not relate to the character of contracts described in section 2, and provides penalties for any false statement that may be made in such affidavit. This section also provides that proof of failure to make any affidavit required in the act shall be prima facie evidence that the message or messages related to a contract prohibited by section 2 of the act, and that proof of failure to deliver or receive the cotton called for in any contract for future delivery shall be prima facie evidence that there was no intention to deliver or receive said cotton when said contract was made.

Section 4 authorizes and requires any agent of any telegraph, telephone, wireless telegraph, or cable company to whom messages described in the act may be tendered to administer any oath required to be made under the provisions of the act, such oath to have like effect and force as if administered by officers having a seal.

Section 5 makes it unlawful for any person owning or operating any telegraph or telephone line, wireless telegraph, cable, or other means or communication, or any officer, agent, or employee of such person, knowingly to use such property, or knowingly to allow such property to be used, for the transmission of any message relating to such contracts as are described in section 2 of the act and imposes a penalty for violation.

Section 6 declares every book, newspaper, pamphlet, letter, writing, or other publication containing matter tending to induce or promote the making of such contracts and carries the usual penalties for violation.

Section 7 authorizes the Postmaster General to instruct the postmasters in the post offices at which any matter described in section 6 as nonmailable matter arrives as to the disposition to be made of such matter and is modeled after the fraud-order section of the existing law.

Section 8 provides that in any proceeding under this act all persons may be required to testify and to produce books and papers, but no person shall be prosecuted and subjected to any penalty or punishment whatever on account of any transaction, matter, or thing concerning which he may testify or produce evidence of any character whatever. This action conforms to the immunity clause of the Elkins Act.

The purpose of the bill is to restrict, so far as may be, those transactions on the cotton exchanges of the country which are recognized as dealing only with the fluctuations in the price of cotton and which do not involve the actual transfer of the commodity. It does not seek to prohibit or to interfere with a single legitimate transaction in cotton. It is recognized as one of the world's greatest articles of commerce. Millions of our own people are engaged in its production, and other millions, here and elsewhere, are employed in its manufacture and in the distribution of cotton and cotton products. The demand for cotton is world-wide, and commerce in it is a necessity. Any attempt to restrict or hamper the course of legitimate commerce in cotton would be injurious to the producers and distributors, as well as the consumers of cotton products.

It is not believed by this committee that any injurious effects upon legitimate dealing in cotton will follow the enactment of this measure into law. In so far as the present system of trading in cotton is dependent upon future trading, if it is at all, when actual delivery is not made, a readjustment may be necessary, but such readjustment can be made with advantage to the cotton trade. In effecting the purpose of eliminating gambling in cotton this bill closes the mails and the interstate agencies of communication against those seeking to use them for purely speculative purposes. It is not believed that any serious constitutional objection can be made against its provisions, and it is expected to prevent a form of speculation that is morally wrong and economically hurtful.

The committee therefore recommend that the bill be passed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say in my own behalf that I have been constantly engaged, as Members of this House know, during this session of Congress in trying to work out legislation involving a number of important legal questions. For instance, the anti-injunction bill, which has passed the House; jury trials in certain contempt cases, which the House has passed; and later in the impeachment proceedings against Judge Archbald, which the House has voted upon and has ordered articles of impeachment to be sent to the Senate. These are some of the important matters which have engaged my time and attention.

I have not, Mr. Speaker, had the opportunity to examine all the authorities so as to make a legal argument on this bill. I observe that on the committee that reported the bill are the names of several eminent lawyers, among them the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BEALL, whose name the bill bears; also the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. STANLEY, and my colleague, Mr. HEFLIN, whose opinion I value most highly, and quite a number of other lawyers and a number of farmers and business men on the committee who want this legislation. This bill shall have my hearty support and my vote for the reasons I have given. [Applause.]

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the arguments already made in behalf of the bill by the gentlemen who have preceded me, there are one or two things that I wish to state. The bill will not affect any direct buying or selling of cotton where the commodity is transferred immediately. It will not affect any legitimate speculation where the parties buying expect to receive the cotton and where the parties selling expect to deliver the cotton immediately or at a future time. The committee was besieged by the growers of cotton, stating that certain conditions had grown up in the marketing of cotton that were very embarrassing to them and had cost them a great deal of money. It was alleged before the committee, and, I believe, not disproved by those opposed to the bill, that the exchange is no place for the cotton manufacturer to go to get cotton with which to manufacture his goods, for if he buys cotton on the exchange, any kind of cotton of a very large number of grades may be delivered on that contract, and his machinery is only prepared to handle cotton within a limited number of grades.

But there is another thing stated in evidence. It was specifically questioned and directly answered that the cotton exchanges of the country could not live without what are known as the gambling features of the exchange—that the contracts by persons who wish to buy for speculative purposes, having no intention whatever to receive any cotton, or who wish to sell for speculative purposes, having no intention to deliver any cotton, were necessary to the life of the exchange. They said specifically, in answer to a definite question, that this influx of new blood or new money was absolutely necessary to the continuance of the exchange.

We do not object to the legitimate hedging upon the exchange, but we do object to the maintenance in this country of an institution which says that it can not exist without gambling, and that it can not exist unless there are brought to it continually a stream of people who must lose their money and get out in order to make place for another stream of people to come in and be treated in the same way. This bill proposes to render it impossible for those people who are thus being deprived of their money in gambling transactions to be longer deprived of it. It is the policy of the Government, and has been for a long period, that no gambling should be fostered or tolerated under the law, and many laws have been enacted for the purpose of preventing gambling. The only thing this bill does is to make it impossible for these cotton exchanges to longer be places of gambling. Every legitimate purpose that they can serve and do serve, they can continue, and if, under their present organization, they can not continue to subsist without the gambling features it is no argument that they should be allowed to continue. The argument is that they ought to be compelled to change their organization so that they can continue without the gambling end of their business.

For these reasons, in addition to those already alleged by gentlemen preceding me, I believe the bill ought to pass as a first measure in the general step to prevent illegitimate transactions in all farm products.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I want now to ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken or may speak on this bill be given permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. At this time I shall object.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I yield now five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON].

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, more than 20 years ago the Hon. William H. Hatch, a sturdy Democrat from Missouri, introduced the first bill having for its purpose the elimination of the evil of gambling in farm products. In that bill Mr. Hatch attempted to define options and futures and to impose a tax upon every contract for the sale on exchanges of farm products for future delivery. Afterwards Mr. Hatch was supplemented in his attempt to strike at this great gambling evil by the efforts of Senator George of Mississippi and Senator Washburn of Minnesota, who drafted a bill dealing with this subject along the same lines, eliminating, however, the tax feature and fixing penalties for transactions for future sale of cotton or of other farm products where there was no intention on the part of seller or buyer to deliver or to receive. Since that time innumerable bills have been introduced striking at this practice. The sentiment against this great evil throughout the country even at that time was overwhelming, especially among the farming, spinning, and milling interests, and year by year the opposition to these hurtful practices has become more intense. During the Fifty-ninth Congress a bill dealing with this subject matter was prepared along entirely different lines and was by its author introduced.

Discouraged by the failures of Messrs. Hatch and George and Washburn for years but little effort was made to push this legislation, but when the Hon. Charles F. Scott, of Kansas, was appointed chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, those who favored striking at this evil made a serious effort to secure some action by the Congress. At the request of the author of the bill last alluded to, which as originally drawn applied only to cotton, Chairman Scott took same and made it by appropriate terms apply to all farm products, and introduced it as his bill. This bill, with all other bills directed against the evil, was referred by the Committee on Agriculture to a subcommittee, consisting of Mr. Scott, as chairman, and four of the ablest lawyers on the Committee on Agriculture, Mr. BEALL of Texas, Mr. HAWLEY of Oregon, Mr. PLUMLEY of Vermont, and Mr. LEVER of South Carolina.

This subcommittee, using the Scott bill as a basis for its action, brought great energy and industry to bear in the preparation of the bill, which was rearranged and in some parts rewritten, but retaining every essential provision of the bill as originally drawn, and was subsequently introduced by the chairman of the committee, and became known as the Scott bill.

The subcommittee, however, improved it in many particulars. This bill now being considered is identical in terms with the Scott bill, but it is now known as the Beall bill, which was explained to the House so ably this morning by the gentleman from Texas, my colleague [Mr. BEALL].

Mr. Speaker, I want to direct attention to the fact that this bill strikes at only one character of transaction, and none other. It strikes at "contracts for the purchase or sale for future delivery of cotton without intending such cotton shall be actually delivered or received." Every court in this country, whether Federal or State, which has passed upon a transaction of that kind has declared it to be an illegal contract, a gambling transaction, and absolutely null and void. Now, who will say such transactions should not be prohibited; no man here will arise in his place and say they should be permitted. There has been some discussion as to the constitutionality of this bill. This bill denies the use of certain instrumentalities of interstate commerce to those who want to make these illegal contracts. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], who appeared in the first case that was argued before the Supreme Court of the United States when the same principle upon which this bill is founded was passed upon, has just stated to you in no uncertain language that in his opinion that feature of this bill is constitutional.

Mr. Speaker, I want to state to the House that this bill was written following weeks of laborious study in the Supreme Court Library, and after it was thus carefully prepared it was submitted to the best constitutional lawyer in the United States Senate, who consented to examine it with a view of passing on the question of whether it violated any provision of our organic law. He carefully investigated every section of the bill, and after the expiration of the three months he returned the bill to the man who prepared it, saying: "Introduce it in the House and, to show my confidence in the constitutionality of your bill, I will introduce it in the Senate." It was then the bill was introduced in the House, and Senator CULBERSON introduced it in the Senate. There is absolutely no question about the constitutionality of the bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer to what the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HAWLEY] said a moment ago about the character of transactions aimed at by this bill. There are certain great exchanges in this country where these transactions for the sale of cotton for future delivery—where there is no intent to deliver on the part of the seller and no intent to receive on the part of the buyer—takes place, and, during the hearings before the Committee on Agriculture, members of one of those exchanges admitted that the operations of that exchange could not continue if transactions of that character were stricken down or eliminated. In other words——

Mr. DUPRÉ. May I ask the gentleman to what exchange he refers?

Mr. BURLESON. I will state to the gentleman that I do not allude to the New Orleans Exchange.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I yield the gentleman four minutes additional.

Mr. BURLESON. In other words, Mr. Speaker, the admission was made not only by the members of that exchange, but by the officers of that exchange that these admittedly gambling transactions were essential for the continued existence of that exchange. Now, unfortunately, that exchange—the New York Exchange—because of a change in the transportation conditions of this country which took place about 1880 when the use of the through bill of lading was first introduced, reached the point where a loss of a dollar and a half a bale was sustained upon every bale of cotton that was stopped in the city of New York. And, Mr. Speaker, a moment's reflection will show anyone the reason for this. What would it avail the spinner in New England or elsewhere to stop his cotton in the city of New York when by a through bill of lading he could get the cotton from the South delivered at the doors of the mill itself? To stop cotton in New York City meant a loss for handling, which amounts to $1.50 per bale, and I give the figures of an officer of the New York exchange.

By reason of these changed transportation conditions this exchange was compelled, in order to bring to the city of New York cotton, to use as a reserve, for the fulfillment of its future contracts, to adopt the indefensible and uncommercial system of arbitrarily fixing differences of value between the various grades of cotton, during the month of November, without reference to the commercial values of the grades of cotton that existed then or thereafter. Why were the members of this exchange compelled to do this? They were forced to do this in order that they might overcome this loss of a dollar and a half a bale on cotton stopped there for reserve purposes.

Mr. Speaker, as a result of this condition the Commissioner of Corporations, who made a comprehensive report upon the cotton exchanges of this country, a report which is really the last word on the subject, says in that report that this exchange adopted a practice of uniformly overvaluing the grade of cotton that is in least demand by consumers of cotton in order that the exchange might attract that character of cotton to their reserve in New York, which cotton is largely used for tender upon contracts if, perchance, delivery should be demanded. What is the inevitable effect of this practice? This cotton that is in least demand is assembled there and used as a tender upon their contracts, and whenever they will, by tendering such cotton, they can hammer the price of this great product down below its real value to the great detriment and injury of those who produce it.

Mr. Speaker, there are two rules of this New York exchange under which the principal injuries to the cotton grower are wrought.

First, the rule which enables the revision committee to arbitrarily fix values early in the season, without reference to the differences in values fixed by commercial usage under the law of supply and demand, and under which rule they are tempted to overvalue that grade of cotton in least demand so as to overcome this loss of $1.50 a bale sustained as a result of the use of the through bill of lading. And, Mr. Speaker, I fear they are compelled to adhere to this rule in order to continue the existence of their exchange. I desire to be fair, and I would not be candid if I did not state that I believe the New York Exchange would change this rule if it could, but when it changes it and adopts the commercial system of fixing differences then, in my opinion, the days of the exchange will be numbered, for New York City has, in my opinion, ceased to be a spot-cotton market.

Second, the rule of the exchange under which the seller is given the option of delivery or settling his contract in accordance with the differences which have been fixed by the revision committee, and if he decides to deliver the actual cotton under the rules of the exchange he may deliver any or all of about 30 different grades of cotton, including tinges, stains, and some claim unspinable cotton of as low grade as that commonly known as "dog tail."

Any intelligent person can readily see that one operating under these rules may, if he has the capital, manipulate the price of futures at his own sweet will. The price of spot cotton is largely controlled by the price of futures, if not absolutely so. Many prominent members of the exchange pretend that they favor the adoption of the Government standard of cotton classification, and to so amend the rules as to require tender on contracts to be made of cotton composed of these grades. If this was done and the fixed difference system abandoned then it is my belief the ability of the exchange to manipulate the price of futures, thus controlling the market price of spot cotton and thereby working such great wrong and injury to the cotton grower, would be largely removed.

But, Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, notwithstanding the protestations of many of its members, this the New York exchange will never do until it is forced to do so by law.

Mr. Speaker, during the first hearings on this bill before the Committee on Agriculture the New York exchange was represented by its ablest exponents and defenders. Mr. Samuel T. Hubbard, its former president, was there. Mr. Arthur R. Marsh, its then vice president, afterwards president, was there. Mr. George W. Neville, its present president, was there; and Mr. Luispold Mandelbaum, who is the shrewdest of all its apologists, was there to speak in its behalf. Mr. W. B. Thompson, its president, and others were there to speak for the New Orleans Cotton Exchange.

Everyone knows that within the limited time allowed us under the rule under which we are operating at this time that it is impossible to fairly discuss this bill, but we did have time before the Agricultural Committee to discuss it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by embodying an argument I made before the Committee on Agriculture in 1910 in support of the Scott bill and my cross-examination of Mr. Marsh before that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ARGUMENT OF HON. ALBERT S. BURLESON, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS.

The committee met, pursuant to the taking of recess, at 2 o'clock p. m., the chairman presiding.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. BURLESON, we will now hear from you.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hardly feel that I am addressing this committee in my representative capacity. I am myself a producer of cotton and have been asked by the representatives of the farmers' organizations engaged in the production of cotton to present their views with reference to these bills now before you for consideration. In view of these facts I feel that no different rule should apply in the matter of my being sworn, and I ask that I be sworn as others who have appeared before you.

(The witness was sworn by the chairman.)

Mr. BURLESON. In the outset, gentlemen, I desire to say that it is my purpose to be brief in the discussion of the issues which I think have been made before this committee, and above all things I am determined, and it is possible to do so, to avoid dodging or befogging these issues by indulging in a mere multiplicity of words.

Before I proceed to the main discussion I want to say, in answer to the suggestion made by one gentleman representing the exchange, Mr. Mandelbaum, that I am sure that I am not acting under coercion in my advocacy of this legislation. Long before I received a letter on this subject I had started upon an investigation for myself with a view of reaching a conclusion, if possible, whether the practices of the so-called cotton exchanges were hurtful or beneficial to the cotton trade. After prosecuting this investigation for some time I reached a satisfactory conclusion in my own mind, and my colleague Mr. BEALL will bear me out that a number of years ago, before any action had been taken by the Texas Legislature in this matter, I met with him and one or two others in the city of Dallas for the purpose of taking such preliminary steps as would result in legislation to drive the wire houses, the representatives of the cotton exchanges, from the State of Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The warehouses?

Mr. BURLESON. No; the wire houses.

The CHAIRMAN. Explain what that term means.

Mr. BURLESON. The wire houses, if I may so term them, are branch exchanges, are places—not called bucket shops—but places where representatives of members or firms on the cotton exchanges keep boards for the purpose of quoting prices thereon, noting conditions of the crop, and giving notices of sales or purchases on the exchanges, such information being received on a telegraph wire carried to such place for this purpose.

Mr. LEVER. And giving information to customers.

Mr. BURLESON. And giving general information relating to the cotton crop to those who buy or sell future contracts on the main exchange, through the particular wire house. As I say, I reached a satisfactory conclusion in my own mind about the hurtful result of such transactions, and I then introduced a bill which I thought would correct the evil. And right here, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that if I am mistaken about it, if the practices and rules and regulations and business transacted on the New York Exchange and the New Orleans Exchange are not hurtful to the producer and the consumer of cotton and to the cotton trade, there is nobody more anxious to ascertain that fact than I am, and for that reason—and it will not disconcert me in the slightest—I invite any member of the committee, any representative of the cotton exchanges, to propound queries to me at any time during the progress of my discussion. If the query relates to a transaction or a phase of the business with which I am not familiar, I will promptly say so, but if I can elucidate the subject matter of the query by my answer, or by telling what I believe or think about it, I will glady do so.

Above all things, I do not want to do anything that is going to be hurtful to the cotton trade. The welfare of my people—I represent a cotton constituency—the welfare of my State, yes, of my section of the country—is so thoroughly identified with cotton, the production of cotton, the sale of cotton, and the manufacture of cotton, that if a blow were struck it we would be the greatest sufferers, and for that reason I desire to move in this legislation with the utmost caution and to avoid making a mistake, if possible to do so. Above all, I do not want to do any injustice or wrong to the people who are identified with or interested in cotton exchanges, especially those who think they are serving a useful purpose; and I want to be absolutely fair in every statement that I make and in every conclusion based upon what I believe are the facts that have been established before you.

Mr. Chairman, I gladly say—I cheerfully bear witness to the fact that, in my belief, for 10 years after the organization of the New York Cotton Exchange it served a most beneficial purpose to the cotton trade throughout the world. I believe it was a cotton exchange in the true sense of the word; that it discharged every one of the beneficial functions of an exchange. As a matter of fact, New York at that time was the second great spot-cotton market of the world. Spinners' agents, mill treasurers, exporters' agents were there for the purpose of buying cotton, the actual cotton, in New York City, and many were connected with the exchange. Manufacturers of cotton went there during that period to get their supplies, and then—and I want to absolve the members of the exchange from responsibility for it, because I would not be candid if I did not say so—I believe through no fault of theirs, a condition developed which makes it impossible for New York City to be a spot market for cotton. By the development of a commercial utility it became possible for cotton to be shipped direct from the section where it was produced to the door of the cotton mill cheaper than if it was stopped at New York.

The through bill of lading, undoubtedly—and this fact can not be questioned—when its use became thoroughly perfected and was adopted by the trade, brought about a condition which precipitated an immediate decadence of New York City as a spot-cotton market. What authority have I for this assertion, Mr. Chairman? Out of the lips of the ablest spokesman for the exchange—and I mean no disparagement to the other gentlemen when I say this, for Mr. Marsh, who has been a professor in one of our leading universities, has been the ablest exponent and defender of the exchanges in this country—we have it that a loss of a dollar and a half a bale is sustained upon every bale of cotton that is stopped in New York. Of course, gentlemen, you know even if the improvident southern producer could not and would not take advantage of that situation, the shrewd, smart Yankee cotton spinner, the shrewdest man who lives upon this earth, would promptly take advantage of it, and he did, and the decline immediately commenced, and New York is no longer a spot-cotton market of any importance.

Now, gentlemen, I want to support the statements of fact, which I will utilize before you, by some character of satisfactory testimony. Ordinarily I am going to take it from the lips of these defenders of the exchanges themselves. Before I conclude I intend to make these spokesmen of the exchanges my witnesses and with their admissions drive the conviction home to the mind of every member of this committee, who keeps an open mind, that the New York Cotton Exchange has developed into just what Mr. Parker, the greatest southern spinner, has called it, a curse to the cotton trade.

Now, let us see whether New York has ceased to be a spot market. I am going to read from the report of Mr. Herbert Knox Smith, and with reference to this publication, gentlemen, I want to state in the outset that I accept literally every statement of fact which is found in this report. I do not agree with all of Commissioner Smith's conclusions; in fact, in one very important matter I am in thorough accord with the view taken by Mr. Marsh, which I will discuss later on, but wherever the report of the Bureau of Corporations states a fact I accept it, because there is no motive on the part of this Government official to lie; there is no reason why he should embody in this report untruths. He is not swayed by self-interest; he is without local bias or prejudice; he does not live in a cotton-spinning section, he does not live in a cotton-producing section, he is a native of and lives in Pennsylvania; and, furthermore, I know the man. He is an official of ability and integrity, and every statement of fact he has made in this report he believes to be a fact. Now, has New York fallen into a condition of decadence as a spot-cotton market? The statement made by Mr. Marsh about the loss of $1.50 on every bale going there would show you it had if I did not produce figures to further substantiate the fact. But let me show you the statistics bearing on the proposition. In order to be perfectly fair to the exchange, I will take figures for periods of 10 years apart and then give the average for the 10 years.

In 1870–71 the total sales of spot cotton at New York in proportion to the total crop were 16.9 per cent. Nearly 17 per cent of the whole cotton crop was marketed in New York City. The development of the through bill of lading took place about 1879. I was curious to know exactly when the general use of the through bill of lading took place, and I addressed a communication to the secretary of the Interstate Commerce Commission, who is one of the best posted men in matters of transportation in this country, with a view of ascertaining the history of its development. He replied that it came into free use in 1885, developing from along about 1880. Now, let us see its immediate effect in New York as a spot market. In 1880–81 the spot sales of cotton in New York had fallen off to 4.8 per cent of the crop; in 1890–91 to 1.1 per cent of the total crop; in 1900–1901 to nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the crop; and for 1906–7, the last crop before Mr. Smith's report, nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the crop—the same as 1900–1901. You naturally ask why. Mr. Chairman, there it is going to remain. New York City, as long as this cotton exchange exists, will always have spot cotton come there just about in that proportion to the main crop. Why? Because it is necessary for the exchange to have a certain reserve in New York in order to meet demands for tender upon its contracts, and by long experience through course of business they have reached a knowledge upon the subject, concluding that it takes about nine-tenths of 1 per cent of the crop in order to meet this situation.

Now, as I have said, in order to be absolutely fair I want to give the average of spot sales of cotton in New York for the 10-year periods; this I read from Commissioner Smith's excellent report:

Average for period—	Total spot sales in New York.	Total crop.	Per cent New York spot sales to total crop.
	Bales.	Bales.
1870–71 to 1879–80 (10 years)	434,865	4,397,032	9.9
1880–81 to 1889–90 (10 years)	221,719	6,496,933	3.4
1890–91 to 1899–1900 (10 years)	159,467	8,973,734	1.8
1900–1901 to 1906–7 (7 years)	145,873	11,178,931	1.3

Considering these statistics, if they are based on truth, can anyone doubt that New York has ceased to be a spot cotton market?

But, Mr. Chairman, these figures show that a small lot of cotton does still go to New York. In order to get this cotton to New York it must be brought there by some one—it will not go there of itself; it will not be brought there if it is going to occasion the buyer a constant loss. Everybody is struggling for money. I do not acquit the producers of cotton of a desire to accumulate money any more than I hold up against these exchange gentlemen the desire to accumulate it. Everybody wants to make money, nobody wants to lose money. This cotton is not going to New York at a loss of a dollar and a half a bale, hence it will not reach there unless some artificial condition is created or brought into existence that will draw it there without this loss, and this has been done, and I will tell you in a moment what that artificial condition is. Now, suppose some member of this committee will say, "Well, BURLESON is mistaken about this proposition. The fact that they lose a dollar and a half on each bale would not keep cotton from going to New York, and as to these statistics that Mr. Herbert Knox Smith embodied in his report, these gentlemen, representing the exchanges, have denounced his conclusions as 'a befuddlement of ideas,' and his statement of the facts." I do not remember exactly what was the expression with reference to the facts, but they were thoroughly discredited. Suppose there is some committeeman in that frame of mind; if so, will you accept an emphatic statement by a member of the exchange upon the proposition? When the producers and the consumers come here practically united in a demand that this great incubus be lifted from them, and when they offer you admissions out of the mouths of the members of the exchange, do you propose to reject it? I do not believe you will.

Let me give you an admission deliberately made by one of their own people. But before I give to you his statement let us see who he is? Is he an obscure member, some little insignificant scalper with a desk in another member's office, who plies his avocation upon the floor of the exchange day by day, scalping out a miserable existence through the practice of his knowledge of the rules of the exchange? Oh, no; I do not offer you the testimony of that kind of a member of the New York Exchange. I bring before you the greatest spot cotton dealer to-day in the United States, if not in the world, a man whose firm has been and is represented upon the revision committee, and it is the revision committee, gentlemen, that wields the power that controls the organization, that shapes the action of the members of the New York Cotton Exchange, as I will show you later on. I will bring you the admissions of an exchange member, represented on the revision committee, he or his firm, year after year, and I will read you his own letter, giving his views about New York as a spot market [reading]:

PHILADELPHIA, June 20, 1905.

Mr. ATWOOD VIOLETT,
New York City.

DEAR ATWOOD: I have been intending to write you regarding your circular concerning the certification of cotton in the South, so that it would be a good delivery there against contracts made on the New York Cotton Exchange.

You understand there are two factions in the New York Cotton Exchange, one faction contending that the present system of fixing differences is uneconomical, uncommercial, indefensible, who have expressed the fear that if it was not changed the people of the United States, those people who are really vitally interested in the cotton trade, would ultimately wipe the exchange out of existence. [Continuing reading:]

I agree with your opinion in the matter thoroughly, and if you ever take the matter up again—

Evidently some matter had been taken up before the exchange on a former occasion and had been defeated, I suppose, through the power of the organization, which is possible, as I shall show you later. [Continuing reading:]

If you agree with me, I would go a step further and ask the New York Exchange to change their differences between grades, if necessary, semimonthly or monthly, depending upon the value of the respective grades of cotton.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this comes not from a spinner who wants the contract changed so as to serve his selfish ends. This is not from a spinner, and I regret that whenever anything has been read during these hearings from a spinner, or when the representative of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association came before you to protest against the practices of exchanges, an effort has been made to leave the impression: "Oh, you can't accept what he wants, because he is controlled entirely by selfishness." Gentlemen, this man from whom I read is not controlled by selfishness, at least not from the standpoint of a spinner. I do not mean he has no selfishness in him. We all have selfishness in us. I believe that even these gentlemen are in a measure selfish. But he is one of the great cotton merchants who have been so graphically and so favorably described in the presence of this committee.

Mr. NEVILLE. Won't you add "ably"?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; I do it most cheerfully, because I admit now that every word that can possibly be said in defense of the New York Exchange, its dules, its regulations, and its practices, has been most ably presented by the gentlemen selected by the New York Exchange to appear before this committee for that purpose. [Continuing to read]:

To avoid any effort at local manipulation of these differences it could be arranged upon the average of the differences between grades at five or six of the prominent cotton markets in the South.

My reason for the above is that the efforts of the New York Cotton Exchange for the past five or six years have been to see how poor a contract they could make in New York.

Mr. Mandelbaum says it has attained perfection, that it is without a blemish, there is nothing he would change. Mr. Neville says there is only one slight difference he would make, and he wanted a change so that the spinnable value of cotton should be considered in fixing differences between grades. If I do not forget it—and I hope I will not—I want to say a word about that when I reach that phase of the question. But here is a man who has been represented on the revision committee, as I say, for years, and one of the largest spot buyers in the world. He says:

My reason for the above is that the efforts of the New York Cotton Exchange for the past five years have been to see how poor a contract they could make in New York, and not how good a one or even fair, and I think the time has come when the New York contract should be made a better one than either Liverpool or New Orleans, for with proper differences and the certificate system there is no reason why it should not be. A vital reason for this change comes from the fact that I do not think there is any reason existing why New York should not be a cotton market for the sale of actual cotton.

You know actual cotton is spot cotton. [Continuing reading:]

It has the most perfect coastwise connections with southern ports and very reasonable rates of freight; it has frequent and cheap freight; connections with all the cotton-consuming centers of the world; it is within a night's ride of all the mills in the Middle States and New England, whose consumption is 2,000,000 bales cotton per year, if not more; it has the cheapest storage in America.

GEO. H. MCFADDEN.

But you will say, "He does not say in his letter that New York is no longer a spot market." I will read further in a moment, but in passing I want to ask, Is there a cotton producer in America, is there a cotton spinner in America or elsewhere who could voice before this committee a severer condemnation of the New York Cotton Exchange than has been made in this letter by George H. McFadden?

Mr. NEVILLE. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. BURLESON. June 20, 1905. I will read you exactly what Mr. McFadden said two years later, when Commissioner Smith was making his investigation of the exchange:

Mr. McFadden (the author of this letter), when asked in November, 1907, whether he cared to comment upon his letter said:

"Simply that since that time I have changed my mind regarding the situation. New features and new interests coming into the cotton market, and the development of the manipulations in the different positions and months, make it imposible for New York to be what I once hoped it would. Also, the freight situation, which has remained unchanged, has not operated to the benefit of New York as against New England and other spinning districts."

Now, there you have it. First, there is a loss of $1.50 a bale on each bale of cotton which is stopped in New York, which makes it impossible for it to become or continue a spot-cotton market. Second, the actual statistics—and, by the way, did I tell you the sources of these statistics I read to you a moment ago from Mr. Smith's report? I believe I neglected to do that. In order that Commissioner Smith may not be put in the attitude of going out and cooking up statistics against these exchanges I will say that the figures for the commercial crop are from the Government census publication, and the figures showing spot sales in New York are—but I will read from the report:

An idea of the shrinkage in spot sales since 1870 may be obtained from the following table—

That is, the table I read the statistics from a moment ago—

Compiled from figures furnished by the New York Cotton Exchange.

Their own figures. Now, can the conclusion be escaped that New York has ceased to be a spot market?

Now, Mr. Chairman, not only will I demonstrate that New York has ceased to be a spot market, but I want to show you that it has ceased to perform every function of a legitimate exchange. What are the functions of a legitimate exchange? From the day of Adam Smith, who was referred to so glibly here by the distinguished gentlemen speaking for the exchanges, to the last man who has written upon the subject of economics, it is agreed that the primary function of an exchange is to bring the buyer and the seller, the producer and the consumer, together. That is fundamental. It is to bring them together.

Before I proceed further I will read an excerpt from an article published in the Atlanta Constitution in 1907, which has just been called to my attention by Mr. BEALL, in which it is said:

The New York market, which, as a regular market for spot cotton, was doomed early in the eighties of the last century, found a new reason for being in the immense development of the theory and practice of hedging transactions in cotton goods.

Mr. LEVER. Who said that?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Marsh.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman who testified before the committee?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Arthur R. Marsh, the vice president of the cotton exchange. But I will proceed.

The second important function of an exchange is that it may enable the producer and consumer to market the product at the least expense. The third function of an exchange is to aid in the speedy distribution of the product with which it attempts to deal. I do not think there can be any division of opinion that those are the important functions of an exchange.

Mr. Chairman, I believe I can show you that the New York Cotton Exchange has ceased to perform a single one of these functions.

First. Does the consumer, the buyer, go to the cotton exchange in New York in order to get his cotton supply? Who are the sellers? The producers, the farmers. Who are the buyers of raw cotton? The spinners. Now, if the producer does not go there to sell, if the spinner does not go there to buy, if it can be conclusively demonstrated that they do not go there for those purposes, will you not be forced then to the conclusion that, in so far as that function of an exchange is concerned, the New York Cotton Exchange signally fails? You heard Mr. Parker when he told you that spinners required even-running grades of cotton. He read before you the resolutions that had been adopted by the Cotton Spinners' Association, of which he is the president. I read you yesterday, and I will read it again now, if you want to hear it, what Theophilus Parsons said on this subject. Who is Theophilus Parsons? No antagonism can be aroused in my breast against the consumers of cotton. I am a producer of cotton myself. My entire fortune, nearly, is invested in cotton-producing lands. I realize, and every intelligent farmer realizes, that the value of our cotton depends upon the demand for this cotton for consumption. Who consumes it? As I have said, the spinners, Theophilus Parsons—a man who has been engaged in the spinning business for decades, honored by those with whom he has been associated for years by being elevated to the presidency of the greatest organization of cotton consumers in the world, as has been said by Mr. Neville, expressed himself about his ability to go there for cotton and what he would get if he went there.

You heard me read from Mr. MacColl, the president—I never can distinguish between the two manufacturing associations, the northern and the southern.

Mr. NEVILLE. He is the former president of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers.

Mr. BURLESON. He is the former president of the National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, the northern organization, and you have heard his statement with reference to the proposition as to whether or not they go to the New York Cotton Exchange for the purpose of doing any sort of business. Gentlemen, it is common sense. If you were inclined to believe that Mr. Parker would come here and willfully misrepresent the facts, do you not know that it is stated time and time again in this report that even-running grades of cotton are required by spinners, generally a half grade above or below a specified grade? It is admitted that if you go to the New York Exchange and purchase a future contract and demand delivery on that contract, you will get or may receive 28 different grades of cotton under the same contract if they see fit to give them to you. Gentlemen, don't you know it is human nature that if I have a contract to deliver to you certain property, and I have the option, as the seller, to deliver to you, and I do not want you to call on me for delivery, that I will tender the very character of stuff you do not want to receive, in order to make you run away from the contract? That is human nature. It is conclusively shown in Commissioner Smith's report that these future contracts for the delivery of cotton are formulated, so framed, that a delivery of 28 different grades can be made if delivery is demanded. Every spinner would flee from such a delivery as he would from a pesthouse, a leprosarium.

This legislation has been under discussion for some time. Don't you know that if there could have been found in the United States a spinner who had gone to the New York Cotton Exchange and demanded a delivery for the purpose of using the cotton in his mill he would be here to tell you of it? The buyer, then, does not go there—to the New York Exchange or New York—for his cotton; and I might end the discussion right there, because if the buyer, the consumer of cotton, will not go there, there would be no necessity for the producer to carry his cotton there for sale. But out of the lips of Mr. Marsh we have it that the producer, if he carried his cotton there, would lose $1.50 on each bale, and of course he will not carry it there.

Furthermore—and on this proposition there can be no mistake—Mr. Marsh in his testimony used the language that the New York Cotton Exchange is not a medium through which cotton is either bought or sold. Why? That is literally true; he meant literally what he said. They do not deal in cotton on the New York Cotton Exchange; they deal in cotton-future contracts. And right on that point I want to read you an interview some friend in New York City clipped out of the New York Commercial and mailed me on December 7. It is an interview by Mr. T. Ashley Blythe, a director of the National Cotton Manufacturers' Association. He gave out the following statement:

The commissioner's report—

Speaking of the Commissioner Smith report on the cotton exchange—covers the situation in most respects, but unfortunately does not go far enough. He does not show clearly the unfortunate position that the legitimate spinner or consumer is placed in by the gambling methods of the New York Cotton Exchange.

It is a well-known fact that no legitimate cotton spinner in the world can spin cotton yarn out of cotton futures. The commissioner does not state what is known to every well-posted cotton spinner—that the cotton exchange of New York sells you cotton on a middling basis, and when the money is put up and the cotton demanded, gives you for every 100 bales probably not more than 5 or 10 bales of any particular grade. In other words, and to be as brief as possible, the cotton exchange of New York, as it is now operated, is not only clearly in restraint of trade, but, further than this, obtains money under false pretenses.

Theophilus Parsons, the head of the greatest cotton consumers' organization in the world, gave you his opinion about the danger of consumers going there to purchase. Mr. Parker, the president of the American Cotton Manufacturers' Association, the southern organization, tells you they do not go there. Mr. MacColl, who was the president of the National Association of Cotton Spinners, tells you that thousands and thousands of them never buy futures and that the exchange has been used to a very limited extent. And here is Mr. Blythe, a present director in that great northern association of spinners, expressing his views on the subject. Now, gentlemen, can there be any question about it that, in so far as bringing the producer of cotton and the consumer of cotton together, the New York Cotton Exchange does not perform that legitimate and primarily most important function of an exchange.

Now, does the cotton exchange perform the second function of an exchange? I do not want to forget anything. I certainly do not want to evade any phase of this question, and I repeat again, if any member of the committee or any other gentleman here wants to ask any question about this phase of the question before I proceed, I invite him to do it, because if I am in error I want to know it.

Mr. COCKS. I would like to have you explain what became of all this cotton that has been in New York. You say the spinner does not go there to buy it. Where does it go? The same cotton does not stay there from year end to year end, does it?

Mr. BURLESON. Some of it stays there year in and year out.

Mr. HAUGEN. How much of it?

Mr. COCKS. That is it. How much do you suppose?

Mr. BURLESON. These gentlemen are in a position to tell. I will show you this; I will show you, from one of the certificates from their warehouses, that they certificate more cotton in a year than was brought there, showing conclusively that some of it must have been brought over from the year before. You ask me what becomes of it. Did you not hear Mr. Parker when he stated that when the future contracts were selling so extremely low in New York he thought surely he could go there and accept delivery at a profit; and he went there to one of the great speculators on the exchange, formerly a member of the exchange, a man whom I heard deliver an address in Philadelphia a few years ago? I went over there myself to deliver an address to the cotton spinners, at their invitation, and just before I delivered my address, or just after, I forget which, Mr. Theodore H. Price delivered an address in which he spoke of the New York stock. He said——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I would like to ask Mr. BURLESON one question, and that is, you have laid great stress on the fact that it costs a dollar and a half to bring cotton to New York?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes, sir; so Mr. Marsh has said.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I believe Mr. Neill, one of the parties you represent, has stated that it cost them the first month alone, in Galveston, $1.

Mr. BURLESON. I am neither defending nor explaining conditions in Galveston, Tex. I am explaining the effect of a statement of fact made here by the vice president of the cotton exchange which shows the impossibility, from a commercial standpoint, of spot cotton reaching New York. I do not feel called upon to discuss Mr. Neill's statement about storage charges; it is extraneous matter, and I do not want to encumber the record with it.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I know; but I do. I want to know whether my question is not a question of fact.

Mr. BURLESON. It may be; I do not doubt it. It is immaterial.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. A question of fact that has been brought out at this hearing?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not doubt it, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. That is all.

Mr. BURLESON. I take no issue with you about it.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Do you not know it is so, that it has been brought out?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Mandelbaum, I do not know it, nor do I for the purposes of this argument care.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. You do not know it?

Mr. BURLESON. No.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. You do not know, in other words, what has been going on or what Mr. Neville has been testifying?

Mr. BURLESON. I will accept his statement; I will let it go at that.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Let it go at that.

Mr. BEALL. Regardless of that, it is a fact that spot cotton does go to Galveston in large quantities.

Mr. BURLESON. Undoubtedly; it is a great cotton market.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Is it not a fact that three-fourths, or practically seven-eighths, of the cotton that goes to Galveston goes only through Galveston?

Mr. BURLESON. That may be true; it is also a great export market.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Do you realize that there is nearly as much cotton that goes to the port of New York as goes to Galveston?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; the facts don't show that.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. We will show you.

Mr. BURLESON. I have your own figures upon that proposition.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Never mind.

Mr. BURLESON. Since the question has been raised, I believe it was; but you gentlemen are in the trade; you should know more about that than I do.

Mr. NEVILLE. We will answer you, Mr. BURLESON.

Mr. BURLESON. I say there is more than 2,000,000 bales of cotton that goes to and through Galveston each year.

Mr. NEVILLE. We will give you the whole thing when you get through.

Mr. BURLESON. I will read——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. One million three hundred and fifty-two thousand bales went last year through New York.

Mr. BURLESON. I doubt that, but I will read what Commissioner Smith said in——

Mr. MANDELBAUM. I do not care about Commissioner Smith; I am talking about the facts in the matter.

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN. I would like to hear what Commissioner Smith says.

Mr. BURLESON. I will read the figures given in his report.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does he credit those figures?

Mr. BURLESON. To the New York Cotton Exchange. On page 249 you will find that. Suppose cotton does go through New York for export. Let us admit for the purpose of this argument it goes through there for purposes of export; admit that 2,000,000 or 2,500,000 bales go through there for export. Does that make it a spot-cotton market?

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Just as much as Galveston, when you say that seven-eighths of the crop goes through Galveston without being handled there; just as much.

Mr. BURLESON. On page 249 of this report are given the New York spot sales, "for export," "for consumption," "on speculation," and the total. I will take the last year we have here, 1906–7: For export, 18,464 bales—I really hesitate to read it, because it is incredible—for consumption 99,801 bales. Two years ago I was reading from Shepperson's Cotton Facts, or Latham Alexander's Statistics, that for a particular year there was only, I think, 23,000 bales of spot cotton that reached New York during the year, and dear old Shepperson, who has been in the cotton business a long, long time (he is the exchange's principal statistician), nearly had a spasm when he read my deductions from these figures; and he rushed into the columns of the New York Journal of Commerce making a defense of New York as a spot market, and he was ably supplemented in this effort by Henry Hentz & Co., and even the Evening Chronicle took a whirl at me on the proposition, saying I was either wittingly or unwittingly falsifying the records in order to show that New York had ceased to be a spot market, and yet George H. McFadden, the greatest spot merchant in the United States—and these gentlemen can not deny it—a member of the New York Exchange, admits it has ceased to be a spot cotton market, and that he has abandoned hope of its ever again being a spot market.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. What page did you read those figures off?

Mr. BURLESON. Two hundred and forty-nine, volume 1.

Mr. SIMS. May I ask you a question right there? It was read yesterday by Mr. Neville in reply to a question from something, I don't know what he read from, that the deliveries and redeliveries of cotton in New York on the cotton exchange for a year were about 500,000.

Mr. NEVILLE. Five hundred and six thousand.

Mr. SIMS. And his deduction was that about two-thirds was the cotton that was bought and sold during that current year.

Mr. NEVILLE. We have the spot sales right here.

Mr. SIMS. Now, Mr. BURLESON, if the whole 500,000 bales had been bought and sold on the cotton exchange that year, if they would equal one-twentieth of the cotton crop of that year, I would like to ask if one-twentieth can possibly fix the price of the nineteen-twentieths?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly it should not.

Mr. HUBBARD. Is Bartlett, Tex., in your district?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; and it is quite a cotton market.

Mr. HUBBARD. Do you know a gentleman there by the name of W. B. Cox?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; I know him.

Mr. HUBBARD. Will you be kind enough to write to him and ask him how much cotton he shipped to me this last year?

Mr. BURLESON. Why should I do that? I do not doubt he shipped you cotton, but for the purposes of this discussion, we have the statistics of the exchange itself. If we can not take the statistics of the exchange, if these gentlemen are not willing to stand by their own figures compiled by their own statistician, promulgated in their own defense, we can have no basis for fair discussion, and this controversy would be interminable. Now, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing to answer any questions hereafter propounded, but I want them to be short, because my time is flying.

Mr. MARSH. May I make one simple suggestion, that Mr. BURLESON give the figures for the spot sales in New York and then the figures for the spot sales in Galveston?

Mr. BURLESON. I think I have that right here in this speech of mine—a very comprehensive document, by the way.

I will read, though I believe it does not give spot sales:

In 1906, as I have shown, the entire receipts at New York amounted to 6,575 bales, and in 1907 the receipts reached a total of 23,108 bales. For the same year (1907), the receipts at Galveston amounted to 3,891,695 bales; at New Orleans to 2,296,971 bales. At the end of that season Galveston had 30,820 bales on hand and at New Orleans there remained on hand 31,964 bales.

Now, let's see what stock remained on hand at the end of the same season in New York—169,975 bales. Its receipts during the three years preceding in the aggregate were less than 65,000. Thus, you see, we have the proof of the truth of the charge made by Mr. Price and many others that this low-grade cotton has been accumulated and held in New York for several years for purposes of tender on contracts for futures.

But, gentlemen, for the purposes of this discussion, understand me, suppose I admit that Galveston is not a spot market at all; Galveston is not under discussion here; why should we divert attention from the real issues involved before this committee by weaving in a thread of irrelevant matter to cover up, confuse the real woof and warp of matters in controversy? Why should we do it?

Mr. COCKS. I will tell you one reason why, because I would like to know where in the world there is a spot market?

Mr. BURLESON. There are innumerable spot markets.

Mr. COCKS. All right. If it is not in New York, I would like to know where it is. I am all mixed up on this.

Mr. BURLESON. I will say to the gentleman from New York that Houston, Galveston, New Orleans, Savannah, Memphis, Taylor, Waco, and Greenville are great spot-cotton markets, where men are to be found day by day, week by week, and month by month acting for spinners who want real cotton, buying cotton in even-running grades for purposes of legitimate consumption.

Mr. COCKS. What I would like to know is how does the cotton get from these spot markets you have mentioned to the spinner in New England, for instance; is it shipped there to him?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Cocks, it is bought either by the merchant or some spinner's agent in 100 or 500 bale lots when it is needed, assorted into even-running grades, and that is sent by through bill to the mill.

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Cocks, for fear you get a false impression of that, I would like to ask Mr. Burleson if the farmers sell it to the agents in even-running lots?

Mr. BURLESON. Certainly not. I sell my cotton frequently in what is termed, colloquially——

Mr. NEVILLE. Hog-round?

Mr. BURLESON. Hog-round. I sell it hog-round. For instance, I have a number of bales of cotton that is very bad, low grade; it was the last pickings; it was the last cotton that was scraped together in the ginnery, before it was put through the gin, and finally ripened into a bale, and I make the entire lot of cotton sell this low stuff. I make the good sell the bad, and the man who buys it culls it, selecting that desired by spinners, and the remainder is what is called "overs." The low grades are left over, and it is these overs, as I will show you by admission of the exchange, or the representative of the exchange, which, as a result of the action of the revision committee of the New York Cotton Exchange, finds its ways to the warehouses of the New York Cotton Exchange and acts as a thermometer or a standard by which the value of the product of the farmer, yet unsold, is frequently if not constantly measured.

Mr. MARSH. May I ask a question at that point? I should like to ask Mr. Burleson whether he has been encouraged by the New York Cotton Exchange to produce and pick a low grade of cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; I have not been encouraged to do that, but I will say this, and Mr. Marsh can not escape the conclusion, and every man here will know it is true—that on a big plantation there is not that care exercised about protecting the cotton from trash. You must remember that in white cotton it is trash alone that either lowers or raises the grade, and when I know, and when it is known by every practical farmer in the South, that some one will take this low-grade cotton, that you can force them to take it, and that they take it because of the fact that they know it has been overvalued in New York and can be disposed of, I will show you this cotton is overvalued in New York so that no one can possibly get away from admitting it—that these low grades of cotton or undesirable grades have been constantly overvalued, that it will find its way to New York. Undoubtedly if that opportunity of disposing of this cotton was done away with, was eliminated, the farmer would be more careful in the gathering and treatment of his crop so as to protect it from leaves and trash.

Mr. HOWELL. You state that the mills buy even lots of cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. Yes. Cotton of even running grades.

Mr. HOWELL. And yet there must be a large part of the crop that is inferior cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. No; not a large part, Mr. Howell. It has been estimated at less than 10 per cent.

Mr. NEVILLE. You referred just now to the overs being low-grade cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; overs may be either of themselves, a very low grade of cotton or it may be that in a year where the cotton crop is of a very high grade—the overs may be extremely high-grade cotton. And in a year like that, instead of overvaluing the low grades of cotton the New York Cotton Exchange, because this very high-grade cotton is the least desirable cotton, from the standpoint of the spinner, have overvalued the high grades, and I will show you that stated emphatically in Commissioner Smith's report.

Mr. NEVILLE. One more question on the subject of overs.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEVILLE. Does it ever happen that a buyer in your territory, in buying your run of cotton, hog-round, could happen to have overs running from strict low middling to good middling? I am only asking because I want to get the record straight; these are not antagonistic questions.

Mr. BURLESON. Permit me to assure you in advance that I always regard you as friendly, and you could not ask a question that would arouse antagonism on my part. I want to answer your question in the utmost candor. Mr. Chairman, as incredible as it may sound, for I have been in the cotton-producing business all my life, from the time I was 18 years old, when I commenced to look after and manage my own farm, I have been producing cotton, and I pledge you my honor I can not tell one grade of cotton from another, hence I can not answer Mr. Neville's question.

Mr. NEVILLE. That is all.

Mr. BURLESON. You must have cotton right before you in order to class it, and then you must be able to keep in mind the difference in grade. That is one of the reasons prompting me to introduce my bill a few years ago to bring about a uniform standardization of cotton. I did it in order that the farmers and producers might be able to secure a standard to show the different grades of cotton.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Were you not indorsed by the New York Cotton Exchange, and were not your standards approved?

Mr. BURLESON. No; I do not think they have yet been approved.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Were you not indorsed, and were you not told it would receive the full approval of the exchange?

Mr. BURLESON. I believe that is true; but, as I said before—and I am not saying it just to hear the sound of my own voice; I never was more honest in a statement in my life—I sincerely believe if these gentlemen could conduct a proper exchange in New York they would do it. I have no feeling of antagonism in my heart toward them. I told you just now that geographic conditions, conditions of trade, are such that it is utterly impossible to maintain a cotton exchange in New York, and these gentlemen must recognize that fact. I am not criticizing them harshly; they can not help themselves; and I make that statement believing sincerely in its truthfulness. I do not know whether I have answered the gentleman from New York about how it ultimately reaches the spinner. It is bought by such men as Weld, Neville & Co., McFadden & Co.——

Mr. NEVILLE. And thousands of other parties.

Mr. BURLESON. No; not thousands, but numbers of others. Sometimes they buy it hog-round, as I have described, and sometimes they have their men to buy it in large lots from merchants. They assemble it and make the selection of grades desired. They make the assortment, responding to the demands of the spinner, and then ship it to him direct.

Mr. JOHNSON. You were diverted from what you were about to say about Mr. Parker going to New York to buy cotton. I would like to know if Mr. Parker got any cotton.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes; to return to our muttons, we all recollect about Mr. Parker saying that a few years ago he thought the prices of future contracts in New York were so much lower than spots that he could surely go there and get cotton at a profit that he could use. He said, "I went up there, and I went to Mr. Theodore Price." Theodore Price at that time was conducting a bull or bear raid, I do not know which—and in this connection I will say candidly that I believe I understand the economic effects of certain of the rules of the New York Cotton Exchange, which I am going to discuss, but there are transactions that take place on the exchange with which I am not familiar. I do not pretend to be familiar with them. I can not explain how their rules can be evaded; how this "scalping" process takes place; how "turns" are made; how they "hammer the price down"; how they create or bring about "rings." I do not pretend to be familiar with those. But I know that at the time I speak of Mr. Parker said Mr. Theodore Price had accepted delivery on contract of a large amount of certificated cotton. He was conducting some sort of a transaction on the exchange and had accepted delivery of a large amount of the New York stock. Now, gentlemen, you remember how Mr. Theophilus Parsons described this cotton. What did Mr. Parker say about it? "I went there, and Mr. Price was anxious, of course, to get rid of this cotton in order to effect his corner, or squeeze, or whatever it was." He had taken the small quantum of cotton in New York at that time, and still demanded of these—I will not say gamblers—these merchants, that they come forward and comply with their contracts. Mr. Parker wanted cotton, and looked into some of this Mr. Price had on hand. He opened up some of it, and what did he find? I will not attempt to describe it, but leave it to your recollection as to what Mr. Parker said of it. I will not attempt to quote him, but we all know he said it was useless to him. And I suffered another diversion, Mr. Chairman, when I started to tell you what Mr. Price said in his Philadelphia address about the New York exchange stock of cotton. I will in this connection read what he said. [Reading:]

> There is no limitation in New York upon the delivery of cotton, with a staple so short that it is almost unspinnable. In fact, in my opinion, there is in the New York stock at present a considerable quantity of cotton that approaches dangerously near, so far as its staple is concerned, to what are ordinarily described as "linters." This is cotton which has remained in New York for an indefinite period.

> They sell what they do not have in the hope that delivery of it may not be demanded, and to make sure that it will not be demanded the process of rendering the stuff that was to be delivered less and less desirable, year by year, has continued until to-day there are in New York some 20,000 or 30,000 bales of cotton which I think have been there from three to four years, and some of it longer, and which no one can be induced to buy except for the purpose of redelivering it as a means of depressing the market.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Mr. BURLESON has talked about the geographic position of New York.

Mr. BURLESON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. On that point I want to ask the question again, how it was possible that if the geographic position is so against New York 1,352,000 bales of cotton should go through it in one year?

Mr. BURLESON. Well, I should like very much to be sure of your premise before I answer. If 1,350,000 bales of cotton did go through New York for export purposes, that would not make it a spot-cotton market.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. Your conclusion about the geographic position was incorrect.

Mr. BURLESON. Oh, no; the geographic position alluded to is with reference to the section where the cotton is produced, and I think every member of this committee understands what I meant by that. I think I have shown that the consumer of cotton does not go to New York for his stock, nor the producer to sell. That is one function of an exchange that the New York Cotton Exchange does not meet. I do not think any man can possibly gainsay that proposition. Now, let us go a step farther. Does the New York exchange perform the second important function of an exchange? Does it aid in the marketing of the crops at the lowest expense to producer and consumer?

Mr. HAUGEN. I infer from what you say Mr. Parker said that the cotton carried in New York, in the warehouses of New York exchange, is of very inferior quality—poor quality cotton?

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. HAUGEN, I will give you a clean-cut answer to that query with which these gentlemen will not take issue. The New York stock depends on the general character of the cotton crop. If the general character of the cotton crop is low—I mean low in grade—and the revision committee of the exchange has overvalued the low grades, then the cotton which finds its way to the exchange for certification is low-grade stuff; but if the general character of the crop is of high grade, then the revision committee will overvalue the higher grades of cotton, and instead of being low-grade stuff seeking certification by the exchange, it is the very highest grades of cotton; it is the character of the cotton crop which determines what kind of cotton finds its way to New York. I will put it to you in a word—as was said by Mr. Marsh, the cotton brought to New York is that grade being least freely bought by the spinner.

Mr. HAUGEN. But my inquiry is as to the quality of cotton. I want to know if you contradict the statement made by Mr. Marsh. He says the quality of cotton is good; that is, it comes up to a certain grade. Do you agree with Mr. Marsh as to that statement, the quality of cotton held in the warehouses in New York and sold to the warehouses of New York?

Mr. BURLESON. As I said, Mr. HAUGEN, it depends on the general character of the crop.

Mr. HAUGEN. I do not think you answer my question as to the quality now of the cotton.

Mr. NEVILLE. If you will let me put a word in right there, I think you will make this clear to Mr. BURLESON. Say, if the spinning quality of the cotton in New York is the same.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is not necessary to have spinning quality if it has quality.

Mr. MANDELBAUM. The gentleman's question is whether the cotton furnished if of the correct grade.

Mr. BURLESON. I will answer your question as best I can. I have never seen any of this cotton myself. But if I had to pass on its quality, I would rather accept the testimony of men who spin cotton, like Theophilus Parsons, like Mr. Parker, like Mr. Blythe, or Mr. McCall, than the testimony of men who speculate in cotton. You heard, also, what Mr. Price said on this subject.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then do you except to the statement made by Mr. Marsh that the quality of the cotton is good, and the same quality of cotton is handed out that is received? My question is, Is the cotton dumped on the New York market of that quality? He says that the quality was good, up to a certain standard—I do not remember the term used. Do you except to that statement?

Mr. BURLESON. I do not deny that the character of cotton certificated there is the character of cotton that they turn out, as you put it; but I do deny——
